VILLAGE SKETCHES.

DORA.

BY MISS MARY S. MITFORD.

Few things are more delightful than to saunter along these green lanes of ours, in the busy harvest-time; the deep verdure of the hedge-rows, and the strong shadow of the trees contrasting so vividly with the fields, partly waving with golden corn, partly studded with regular pies of heavy wheat-sheaves; the whole population abroad; the whole earth teeming with fruitfulness, and the bright autumn sun careering over-head, amidst the deep blue sky and the fleecy clouds of the most glowing and least fickle of the seasons. Even a solitary walk loses its loneliness in the general cheerfulness of nature. The air is gay with bees and butterflies; the robin twitters from amongst the ripening hazel-nuts; and you cannot proceed a quarter of a mile, without encountering some merry group of basers, or some long line of majestic wains, groaning under their rich burden, brushing the close hedges on either side, and knocking their tall tops against the overhanging trees; the very image of ponderous plenty.

Pleasant, however, as such a procession is to look at, it is somewhat dangerous to meet, especially in a narrow lane; and I thought myself very fortunate one day last August, it being so near a five-barred gate, as to be enabled to escape from a cortege of labourers and harvest-wagons, sufficiently bulky and noisy to convey half the wheat in the parish. On they went, men, women, and children, shouting, laughing, and singing, in joyous expectation of the coming harvest-home; the very wagons nodding from side to side as if tipsy, and threatening every moment to break down bank, and tree, and hedge, and crush every obstacle that opposed them. It would have been as safe to encounter the car of Juggernaut; I blest my stars; and after leaning on the friendly gate until the last gleaner had passed, a ragged rogue of seven years old, who, with hair as white as flax, a skin as brown as a berry, and features as grotesque as an Indian idol, was brandishing his tuft of wheat-ears, and shrieking forth, in a shrill childish voice, and with a most ludicrous gravity, the popular song of "Buy a broom." After watching this young gentleman—the urchin is of my acquaintance—as long as a curve in the lane would permit, I turned to examine in what spot chance had placed me, and found before my eyes another picture of rural life, but one as different from that which I had just witnessed, as the Arcadian peasants of Pousin from the boors of Toniers, or weeds from flowers, or poetry from prose.

I had taken refuge in a harvest-field belonging to my good neighbour, Farmer Creswell; a beautiful child lay on the ground at some little distance, whilst a young girl, resting from the labour of reaping, was twisting a rustic wreath of enamelled corn-flowers, brilliant poppies, snow-white lily-bines, and light fragile hare-bells, mingled with tufts of the richest wheat-ears, around its hat.

There was something in the tender youthfulness of these two innocent creatures, in the pretty, though somewhat fantastic occupation of the girl, the fresh wild flowers, the ripe and swelling corn, that harmonized with the season and the hour, and conjured up memories of "Dis and Proserpine," and of all that is gorgeous and graceful in old mythology; of the lovely Lavinia of our own poet, and of that finest pastoral of the world, the far lovelier Ruth. But these fanciful associations soon vanished before the real sympathy excited by the actors of the scene, both of whom were known to me, and both objects of a sincere and lively interest.

The young girl, Dora Creswell, was the orphan niece of one of the wealthiest yeomen in our part of the world, the only child of his only brother; and having lost both her parents whilst still an infant, had been reared by her widowed uncle as fondly and carefully as his own son Walter. He said that he loved her quite as well—perhaps he loved her better; for though it was impossible for a father not to be proud of the bold handsome youth, who, at eighteen, had a man's strength and a man's stature, was the best ringer, the best cricketer, and the best shot in the country; yet the fairy Dora, who, nearly ten years younger, was at once his handmaid, his housekeeper, his plaything, and his companion, was evidently the apple of his eye. Our good farmer vaunted her accomplishments, as men of his class are wont to boast of a high-bred horse, or a favourite greyhound.

She could make a shirt and a pudding, darn stockings, rear poultry, keep accounts, and read the newspaper; was as famous for gooseberry wine as Mrs. Primrose, and could compound a syllabub with any dairy-woman in the county. There was not so handy a little creature any where; so thoughtful and trusty about the house, and yet out of doors as gay as a lark, and as wild as the wind; nobody was like his Dora. So said, and so thought Farmer Creswell: and before Dora was ten years old, he had resolved that in due time she should marry his son Walter, and had informed both parties of his intention.

Now Farmer Creswell's intentions were well known to be as unchangeable as the laws of the Medes and Persians. He was a fair specimen of an English yeoman, a tall, square-built, muscular, stout and active man, with a resolute countenance, a keen eye, and an intelligent smile; his temper was boisterous and irascible, generous and kind to those whom he loved, but quick to take offence, and slow to pardon, expecting and exacting implicit obedience from all about him. With all Dora's good gifts, the sweet and yielding nature of the gentle and submissive little girl was undoubtedly the chief cause of her uncle's partiality. Above all, he was obstinate in the highest degree, had never been known to yield a point, or change a resolution; and the fault was the more inveterate, because he called it firmness, and accounted it a virtue. For the rest, he was a person of excellent principle and perfect integrity; clear-headed, prudent, and sagacious; fond of agricultural experiments, which he pursued cautiously, and successfully; a good farmer, and a good man.

His son Walter, who was in person a handsome likeness of his father, resembled him also in many points of character, was equally obstinate, and far more fiery, hot, and bold. He loved his pretty cousin, much as he would have loved a favourite sister, and might very possibly, if let alone, have become attached to her as his father wished; but to be dictated to, to be chained down to a distant engagement, to hold himself bound to a mere child—the very idea was absurd; and restraining with difficulty an abrupt denial, he walked down into the village, predisposed, out of sheer contradiction, to fall in love with the first young woman who should come in his way; and he did fall in love accordingly.

Mary Hay, the object of his ill-fated passion, was the daughter of the respectable mistress of a small endowed school at the other end of the parish. She was a delicate, interesting creature, with a slight, drooping figure, and a fair, downcast face, like a snow-drop, forming such a contrast with her gay and gallant wooer, as Love, in his vagaries, is often pleased to bring together.

The courtship was secret and tedious, and prolonged from months to years; for Mary shrunk from the painful contest which she knew that an avowal of their attachment would occasion. At length her mother died, and, deprived of home and maintenance, she reluctantly consented to a private marriage; an immediate discovery ensued, and was followed by all the evils, and more than all, that her worst fears had anticipated. Her husband was turned from the house of his father, and in less than three months, his death, by an inflammatory fever, left her a desolate and penniless widow—unowned and unassisted by the stern parent, on whose unrelenting temper neither the death of his son, nor the birth of his grandson, seemed to make the slightest impression. But for the general sympathy excited by the deplorable situation and blameless demeanour of the widowed bride, she and her infant might have taken refuge in the workhouse. The whole neighbourhood was zealous to relieve, and to serve them; but their most liberal benefactress, their most devoted friend, was poor Dora. Considering her uncle's partiality to herself as the primary cause of all this misery, she felt like a guilty creature; and casting off at once her native timidity and habitual submission, she had repeatedly braved his anger, by the most earnest supplications for mercy and for pardon; and when this proved unavailing, she tried to mitigate their distresses by all the assistance that her small means would permit. Every shilling of her pocket-money she expended upon her poor cousins; worked for them, begged for them, and transferred to them every present that was made to herself, from a silk frock to a penny tartlet. Every thing that was her own she gave, but nothing of her uncle's; for, though sorely tempted to transfer some of the plenty around her, to those whose claims seemed so just, and whose need was so urgent, Dora felt that she was trusted, and that she must prove herself trust-worthy.

Such was the posture of affairs at the time of my encounter with Dora and little Walter, in the harvest-field; the rest will be best told in the course of our dialogue.

"And so, madam, I cannot bear to see my dear cousin Mary so sick, and so melancholy; and the dear, dear child, that a king might be proud of—only look at him!" exclaimed Dora, interrupting herself, as the beautiful child, sitting on the ground, in all the placid dignity of infancy, looked up at me and smiled in my face; "only look at him," continued she, "and think of that dear boy, and his d-ther living on charity, and they my uncle's lawful heirs, whilst I, who have no right whatever, no claim at all—I, that, compared to them, am but a far-off kinawoman, the mere creature of his bounty, should revel in comfort and in plenty, and they starving! I cannot bear it, and I will not. And then the wrong that he is doing himself, he that is really so good and kind, to be called a hard-hearted tyrant by the whole country side. And he is unhappy himself too; I know that he is; so tired as he comes home, he will walk about his room half the night; and often, at meal times, he will drop his knife and fork, and sigh so heavily. He may turn me out of doors, as he threatened, or, what is worse, call me ungrateful or undutiful, but he shall see this boy."

"He never has seen him then? and that is the reason you are tricking him out so prettily."

"Yes, ma'am. Mind what I told you, Walter! and hold up your hat, and say what I bid you."

"Gan-papa's fowers!" stammered the pretty boy, in his sweet childish voice, the first words that I had ever heard him speak.

"Grand-papa's flowers!" said his zealous teacher.

"Gan-papa's fowers!" echoed the boy.

"Shall you take him to the house, Dora?" asked I.

"No, ma'am, for I look for my uncle here every minute, and this is the best place to ask a favour in, for the very sight of the great crop puts him in good humour; not so much on account of the profits, but because the land never bore half so much before, and it's all owing to his management in dressing and drilling. I came reaping here to-day, on purpose to please him; for though he says he does not wish me to work in the fields, I know he likes it; and here he shall see little Walter. Do you think he can resist him, ma'am?" continued Dora, leaning over her infant cousin, with the grace and fondness of a young Madonna; "do you think he can resist him? poor child! so helpless, so harmless; his own blood too, and so like his father, no heart could be hard enough to hold out, and I am sure that his will not. Only," pursued Dora, relapsing into her girlish tone and attitude, as a cold fear crossed her enthusiastic hope, "only, I am half-afraid that Walter will cry. It's strange, when one wants any thing to behave particularly well, how sure it is to be naughty; my pets especially. I remember when my lady countess came on purpose to see our white peacock, that we got in a present from India, the obstinate bird ran away behind a bean-stack, and would not spread his train, to show the dead white spots on his glossy white feathers, all we could do. Her ladyship was quite angry. And my red and yellow marvel of Peru, which used to blow at four in the afternoon, as regular as the clock struck, was not open the other day at five, when dear Miss Ellen came to paint it, though the sun was shining as bright as it does now. If Walter should scream and cry, for my uncle does sometimes look so stern; and then it's Saturday, and he has such a beard! if the child should be frightened!—Be sure, Walter, you don't cry!" said Dora, in great alarm.

"Gan-papa's fowers," replied the smiling boy, holding up his hat; and his young protectress was comforted.

At that moment the farmer was heard whistling to his dog in a neighbouring field, and fearful that my presence might injure the cause, I departed, my thoughts full of the noble little girl and her generous purpose.

I had promised to call the next afternoon, to learn her success; and passing the harvest-field in my way, I found a group assembled there, which instantly dissipated my anxiety. On the very spot where we had parted, I saw the good farmer himself, in his Sunday clothes, tossing little Walter in the air; the child laughing and screaming with delight, and his grandfather apparently quite as much delighted as himself. A pale, slender, young woman, in deep mourning, stood looking at their gambols with an air of intense thankfulness; and Dora, the cause and sharer of all this happiness, was loitering behind, playing with the flowers in Walter's hat, which she was holding in her hand. Catching my eye, the sweet girl came to me instantly.

"I see how it is, my dear Dora! and I give you joy from the bottom of my heart. Little Walter behaved well, then?"

"Oh, he behaved like an angel."

"Did he say, gan-papa's fowers?"

"Nobody spoke a word. The moment the child took off his hat, and looked up, the truth seemed to flash on my uncle, and to melt his heart at once—the boy is so like his father. He knew him instantly, and caught him up in his arms, and hugged him just as he is hugging him now."

"And the beard, Dora?"

"Why, that seemed to take the child's fancy; he put up his little hands and played with it, and laughed in his grandfather's face, and flung his chubby arms round his neck, and held out his sweet mouth to be kissed; and how my uncle did kiss him! I thought he never would have done; and then he sat down on a wheat sheaf and cried; and I cried too! Very strange that one should cry for happiness!" added Dora, as some large drops fell on the wreath which she was adjusting round Walter's hat; "Very strange," repeated she, looking up, with a bright smile, and brushing away the tears from her rosy cheeks with a bunch of corn-flowers; "Very strange that I should cry, when I am the happiest creature alive; for Mary and Walter are to live with us; and my dear uncle, instead of being angry with me, says that he loves me better than ever. How very strange it is," said Dora, as the tears poured down faster and faster, "that I should be so foolish as to cry!"

SCOTTISH LITERATURE.

FROM THE LONDON REVIEW.

The Picture of Scotland. By Robert Chambers, author of "Traditions," &c. 2 vols. 8vo. Edinburgh. 1828.

THE literature of Scotland, it need not be said, is decidedly national; and still less need we say, that a people like the Scotch must of nature and necessity be a nation of topographers. The statistical account of Scotland is, perhaps, the most memorable work that ever was written since the doomsday book of William the Conqueror; but if a collection could be made of all the personal, family, and local history and description with which the literature of the country is saturated, the statistical account would look as meagre and unsatisfactory as a Scotch cow before it has crossed the Tweed.

Mr. Chambers, the author, who has the good fortune to find us in this laudatory vein, is a young Scotchman, who—mirabile dictu—without being excited by the hope of gain, or by any thing whatever except pure enthusiasm, walked, in nineteen weeks, two thousand and twenty-six miles upon the surface of Scotland, for the purpose of elevating "a topographical work into the superior region of the belles-lettres." "It has been his wish from earliest boyhood, in the words of Burns,

'Some useful plan or book to make,
'For puir auld Scotland's cherished sake.'

He has already done more than perhaps his years would give reason to expect, towards the preservation of what is dearest to her—the memory of her ancient simple manners and virtues; the celebration of her native wit and humour; and, in a more extended view of the subject, for the reclamation of that which is altogether poetry—the wonderful, beautiful, glorious past. In the present work, he has steadily pursued the same object; conscious and certain that, though many of his own generation may not give him credit for so exalted a purpose, the people who shall afterwards inhabit this romantic land will appreciate what could not have been preserved but with a view to their gratification."

do not know what share the belles-lettres may have in the composition of the work, but we know that these two volumes are by far the most readable topographical books we ever read.

We could wish that some part of the author's admiration had floated further down the Clyde. He tells us, indeed, in the preface, that he does not possess a taste for the beautiful and grand in nature in any extraordinary degree—a fact which we believe to be worthy of all acceptance; but still it is inconceivable to us how the gorgeous, glorious scene which bursts upon the eye after passing Dumbarton, could fail to awaken the enthusiasm of a cod—not to talk of Mr. Chambers. When we have said that the author's sentiments, although Scottish, appear to be neither Scotch nor manly upon the subject of those magnificent spirits, the old covenanteders, we have said our worst. If Mr. Chambers will read the history of his country in the pages of Sir Walter Scott, he should think, while he reads, that a less splendid name would have been obscured and disgraced for ever by political feelings like his. Before turning to the more pleasant part of our task, we would also advise Mr. Chambers to get rid, as soon as convenient, of a certain boyish flippancy of manner, which disgraces many passages of his really clever book. He tells us, for instance, of a miserable wretch falling from a height of four hundred feet, "and leaving himself by instalments on the rock." This silly and brutal joke is even repeated in another part of the work. We now gladly proceed to offer some specimens of the spirited and amusing manner in which the book, generally speaking, is written. Take the following graphical description of Caledonia, in the first place:

"Scotland is neither triangular like England, square like France, leviathan-like like Russia, nor boot-like like Italy. There is, however, one object in nature which it resembles, and by comparing it with which, it may almost be possible to communicate an idea of its real figure and proportions. This object is an old woman—one who has a hunchback, and who may be supposed to sit upon her hams, while she holds out and expands her palms at a fire. The knees of this novel and somewhat startling personification of Caledonia are formed by the county of Wigton. Kirkcudbright, Dumfries, Roxburgh, Selkirk, and Lerwick represent the lower part of her limbs, upon which the whole figure is incumbent. Ayr, Renfrew, Lanark, Peebles, and the Lothians represent the upper part of the limbs. Fifeshire—including Kinross—stands, or rather sits, for the sitting part of the old lady. Argyll hangs in pieces from a lap formed by Dumbarton and Sterling. Perth is the abdomen. Angus and the Mearns make the back. Aberdeen, Banff, Moray, and Nairn constitute the prodigious hump. Inverness is the chest. Ross looks like a voluminous kerchief enclosing the neck. Sutherland is the face, ears, and brow. And Caithness is a little nightcap surmounting all. To complete the idea—the isle of Skye is the right palm turned upwards; that of Mull, the left inclining downwards. The fire must be understood, unless the distant archipelago of Lewis be held as untowardly representing something of the kind; and the islands of Orkney and Shetland may be pressed into service, by a similar stretch of fancy, in the capacity of a rock or distaff which the figure bears over her head, after the manner of a flag-staff."

The following anecdote of Leyden illustrates the nationality of the Scotch:

"The Teviotdale yeomanry marched into Jedburgh early in the morning of the alarm, playing the spirit-stirring old tune, 'Wha daur meddle wi' me?' On this being told to Leyden in India, he is said to have started up from the sick bed on which he was reclining, and, shouting, 'Wha daur meddle wi' me?' 'Wha daur meddle wi' me?' at the top of his voice, rushed out of the apartment to give vent to his feelings. Intense nationality seems to have been one of the most remarkable characteristics of this wonderful man."

The national enthusiasm of the lower classes is also agreeably painted:

"It is observable that in all the traditional notices to be obtained of Wallace, the work of Henry the minstrel is invariably referred to, and this in all other places besides Ayr. 'The Wallace,' however despised by rigid historians, is a prodigious favourite with the lower orders of the Scottish people, for whose use it was modernized about a century ago. It is to be found, associated with the works of Boston and Erskine, on the shelf or window-bow of the serious old peasant; and it is read and learned by heart on the hill-side by the shepherd-boy. We were once told an amusing anecdote, illustrative of the fascination which it exercises over the imaginations of Scotsmen, by Mr. Alexander Campbell, well known for his publications connected with Scotland. An aged Highland soldier, who could not read, was such an enthusiastic admirer of the exploits of Sir William Wallace, that he used to go out to the fields where a little boy was engaged in minding cattle, and hire him with money to read aloud, from an old tattered copy of Blind Harry, a chapter or two at a time, of the Herculean labours of the Scottish hero. While the boy read, the old man strode backwards and forwards, with a drawn sword in his hand, listening with a heaving breast and a beaming eye. Whenever a passage occurred where Wallace was rather hard bested, he would stamp on the earth, gripe hard his sword, and clench his teeth fast together, as if suffering under some strange paroxysm. But when, on the contrary, victory declared for the hero, off went the bonnet from his lint-white locks, his gray eye was raised to heaven in a species of rapture and extending the sword, he exclaimed, and could only exclaim, 'Och, an I had been there!'

An excellent anecdote of Sir Walter Scott:

"When the editor of the Waverley of the Scottish Border made what he now—in private conversation—calls his 'raids into Liddisdale,' in order to collect the materials of that work, he found the country almost inaccessible, and the people as strange to the appearance of a visitor, as the Indians were at the advent of Columbus. On his visiting the house of Willie o' Milburn, in company with a friend from Jedburgh, the gudeman happened to come home just as he was engaged in tying up his horse in the stable. The farmer, like all the other people of Scotland, entertained a profound respect for the character of a lawyer; and this added considerably to the embarrassment which he felt regarding his visitor. In a little time, however, he came up to Sir Walter's friend, who had gone into the house, and asked if yon was the advocate. Being answered in the affirmative, he slapped his hands with joy, and exclaimed, 'De'il a me's feared for him—he's just a chield like ourself!' What idea this honest farmer had formed of the person of the future great unknown, must for ever remain a mystery."

The following wonderful tale beats Sir Walter's inventions hollow:

"Among the traditions of Selkirk, there is a tale of diablerie of almost Germanic horror. It was, at a remote period, the custom of the sutors, on the winter mornings, to rise and begin working long before daylight. Early one morning, a sutor, who lived in the Kirk Wynd, and whose shop was the nearest of all others to the church, being at work, was called upon by a stranger, who ordered a pair of shoes, which he said he would call for at the same hour on a certain future day. The customer accordingly came, and got and paid for the shoes. The sutor, thinking there was something extraordinary in his manner and appearance, was induced by curiosity to follow the stranger, in order to see where he would go. He went into the churchyard, which was then, and till lately, uninclosed, and, to the sutor's great astonishment, disappeared at a particular grave. The shoemaker, in his haste, had brought his awl in his hand; this he stuck into the grave, that he might recognise it on his return. When daylight came, he went, along with a great body of his wondering neighbours, and, breaking open the grave, found his shoes snugly deposited in the coffin. Forgetting that they were no longer his property, he took them home with him. Next morning, as he was sitting at work, the stranger suddenly stood before him, with a countenance whose ferocity almost froze his blood to perfect roset. He accused him of having taken away that which had been bought and paid for. 'You have thus,' he continued, 'made me a world's wonder; but I shall soon make you a greater.' So saying, he dragged the unhappy sutor to the churchyard; and at daylight poor Crispin's body was found torn limb from limb upon the grave which his curiosity had so unjustifiably violated."

The following is the story of "Fair Helen, of Kirkconnel Lee:"

"Fair Helen is said to have been a lady of the name of Irving, and to have lived about three centuries ago. She was the daughter of a person of rank, but beloved for her beauty only, by a gentleman named Adam Fleming. Another lover, whom she had rejected, entertaining the most ferocious emotions of revenge, stole one day upon their privacy as they were conversing in a bower upon the banks of Kirtle Water, and fired a carbine across the stream at the bosom of Fleming. Helen leapt in before her lover, and, receiving the shot, immediately fell down and expired. Fleming then drew his sword, pursued the murderer, and is said not to have been satisfied with vengeance till he had cut his body into a thousand pieces. After this, he went abroad, and served as a soldier in some foreign army; but, finding no peace of mind, at last came home and laid himself down upon the grave of his mistress, from which he never again rose. The graves of both the lovers are pointed out in the churchyard of Kirkconnel, near Springkell; that of Fleming is distinguished by a stone bearing the figure of a cross and sword, with the inscription, 'Hic jacet Adamus Fleming.' A heap of stones is raised on the spot where the murder was committed; and the peasantry still point out the place where Fleming slew the murderer, at a little distance, upon the opposite bank of the Kirtle."

The following account of Alexander Selkirk is interesting:

"Alexander, coming home one evening, and feeling thirsty, raised a pipkin of water to his mouth, in order to take a drink. It turned out to be salt water, and he immediately replaced the vessel on the ground with an exclamation of disgust. This excited the humour of his brother, who was sitting by the fire, and with whom he had not lately been on good terms. The laugh and jibe were met, on Alexander's part, with a frown and a blow. Both brothers immediately closed in a struggle, in which Alexander had the advantage. Their father attempted to interpose; but the offended youth was not to be prevented by even paternal authority from taking his revenge. A general family combat then took place, some siding with the one brother and some with the other; and peace was not restored till the whole town, alarmed by the noise, was gathered in scandalized wonderment to the spot. Matters such as this were then deemed fit for the attention of the kirk-session. Alexander Selkirk, as the prime cause of the quarrel, was accordingly summoned before that venerable body of old women, and commanded to expiate his offence by standing a certain number of Sundays in the church, as a penitent, to be rebuked by the clergyman. He at first utterly refused to submit to so degrading an exhibition of his person; but the entreaties of his friends, and the fear of excommunication, at length prevailed over his nobler nature. He submitted to the mortifying censure of the church, in all their contemptible details. No sooner, however, had the term of his punishment expired, than, overwhelmed with shame and disgust, he left his native town, and sought on the broad ocean the sea-room which had been denied to his restless spirit at home. After an absence of several years, during which he had endured the solitude of Juan Fernandez, he returned to Largo. He brought with him the gun, sea-chest, and cup, which he had used on the uninhabited island. He spent nine months in the bosom of his family; then went away on another voyage, and was never more heard of."

We quote also an account of a female wanderer, whose adventures are quite as singular as those of Selkirk:

"At a place called the Mill of Steps, in the low bottom, between two of the hills over which the road passes, there stood, and perhaps still stands, a cottage, which, little more than thirty years ago, was the residence of an old woman, known as the mother of the empress of Morocco! To explain this seeming mystery, it is necessary to inform the tourist, that the daughter of a poor woman here resident, about sixty or seventy years ago, was sailing over to America, when she was captured, along with all her fellow-passengers, by an African pirate, and carried into Morocco, where, happening to attract the affections of the emperor, she very soon after became empress. She had children by his majesty, and became in time completely naturalized in that savage country; but, nevertheless, continued, till the day of her death, to keep up a correspondence with her humble relations in Scotland. It may perhaps be in the recollection of some persons intimately acquainted with modern British history, or it may perhaps be gathered from the Annual Register of the period, that, about forty years ago, two Morocco princes applied to the government of this country for a military force, to assist them in asserting their right to the throne of their deceased father, in opposition to an usurping kinsman. They urged their request with the plea that, by the mother's side, they were of British descent; and government had actually fitted out an expedition at Gibraltar, in obedience to the demand, when intelligence came that the two young men had been surprised and cut off by their relation; upon which the fleet was of course remanded. When the circumstances are laid together, it seems unquestionable that these unfortunate persons were the grandsons of the old woman who lived at the Mill of Steps. The reader may pause before he gives credit to a story so singular; but our information is derived from a source which precludes the slightest shade of scepticism in our own mind. We cannot give the maiden name of the empress; but it may be at least mentioned that her mother was aunt to a person of the name of Duncan Macpharig, or Macgregor, who was well known in the south of Perthshire, about forty years ago, as one of the surviving heroes of 'the Forty-five,' and who was often heard to boast that he had a cousin an empress."

The following is entitled, "Dying for Love:"

"There is a tradition in Tweeddale, that when Neidpath castle, near Peebles, was inhabited by the Earls of March, a mutual passion subsisted between a daughter of that noble family and a son of the Laird of Tushielaw, in Ettrick forest. As the alliance was thought unsuitable by her parents, the young man went abroad. During his absence, the young lady fell into a consumption; and, at length, as the only means of saving her life, her father consented that her lover should be recalled. On the day when he was expected to pass through Peebles, on the road to Tushielaw, the young lady, though much exhausted, caused herself to be carried to the balcony of a house in Peebles, belonging to the family, that she might see him as he rode past. Her anxiety and eagerness gave such force to her organs, that she is said to have distinguished his horse's footsteps at an incredible distance. But Tushielaw, unprepared for the change in her appearance, and not expecting to see her in that place, rode on without recognising her, or even slackening his pace. The lady was unable to support the shock, and, after a short struggle, died in the arms of her attendants."

The reformation of a swearer is excellent:

"Among the outré characters of Ayr, fifty years ago, there was none so remarkable as an oldish little man, who was ordinarily called the Devil Almighty. He had acquired this terrific soubriquet from an inveterate habit of swearing, or rather from that phrase being his favourite oath. He was no ordinary swearer—no mincer of dreadful words—no clipper of the king's curses. A man of vehement passion, he had a habit, when provoked, of shutting his eyes, and launching headlong into a torrent of blasphemy, such as might, if properly divided, have set up a whole troop of modern swearers. The custom of shutting his eyes seemed to be adopted by him as a sort of salvo to his conscience; he seemed to think that, provided he did not 'sin with his eyes open,' he did not sin at all; or it was perhaps nothing but a habit. Whatever might be the cause or purpose of the practice, it was once made the means of playing off upon him a most admirable hoax. Being one evening in a tavern along with two neighbouring country gentlemen, he was, according to a concerted scheme, played upon, and irritated; and, of course, soon shut his eyes, and commenced his usual tirade of execration and blasphemy. As soon as he was fairly afloat, and his eyes were observed to be hard shut, his companions put out the candles, so as to involve the room in utter darkness. In the course of a quarter of an hour, which was the common duration of his paroxysms, he ceased to speak, and opened his eyes; when, what was his amazement, to find himself in the dark! 'How now?' he cried, with one of his most tremendous oaths, 'am I blind?' 'Blind!' exclaimed one of the company, 'what should make you blind?' 'Why, I can see nothing,' answered the sinner. 'That is your own fault,' coolly observed his friend: 'for my part, I can see well enough;' and so he drank a toast, as if nothing whatever had happened. This convinced the blasphemer that he had lost his sight; and, to add to his horror, it struck him that Providence had inflicted the blow as a punishment for his intolerable wickedness. Under this impression, he began to rave and cry, and he finally fell a praying, uttering such expressions as made his two companions ready to burst with restrained laughter. When they thought they had punished him sufficiently, and began to fear that his mind might be affected if they continued the joke any longer, one of them went to the door and admitted the light. He was, of course, overwhelmed with shame at the exhibition he had been compelled to make, which had such an effect, that, from that time forward, he entirely abandoned his abominable habit."

BIOGRAPHY.

THE LATE MR. DANIEL H. BARNES.

PREPARED BY MR. VERPLANCK.

DANIEL H. BARNES was born in the county of Columbia, in this state, in or about the year 1785, and was educated at Union College, in Schenectady. He early devoted himself to the instruction of youth, and soon after he had completed his collegiate course, was appointed master of the grammar school attached to Union college. Here he gained not only experience but reputation, and, some years after, was chosen principal of the respectable academy at Poughkeepsie, one of the incorporated seminaries of education under the patronage and visitation of the regents of the university of this state. That institution flourished under his charge for several years, and in it many individuals, now filling honourable stations in various walks of life, received the most valuable part of their classical and scientific education. He was, however, tempted to leave this station by an invitation to Cincinnati, Ohio, where he was placed at the head of an incorporated academic or collegiate establishment for the higher branches of education. At Cincinnati, his situation was honourable, and his services, as usual, were laborious and successful. The enterprise, the activity, the rapid growth and improvement so conspicuous in that country, unparalleled in its progress in population, cultivation, and refinement, were congenial to the unwearied activity and benevolent ardour of his own mind. The yet unexplored natural riches of that region of the west added, besides, fresh excitements to his liberal and indefatigable curiosity.

But he found the climate of Ohio unfriendly to his constitution, and was reluctantly obliged, some years ago, to resign his duties there, and return to his native air on the Atlantic coast. He then established a private classical school in this city, where he soon acquired the same reputation which he had enjoyed at other places of his residence. In this city, his mind was enlarged and excited by new objects of curiosity and instruction, and the society of men eminent in various ways for talent or acquirement. His studies took a wider range. He became an ardent and successful student of natural history. From the study of the languages and literature of antiquity he advanced on to the higher branches of philology and the philosophy of language. He improved his knowledge of chemical and physical science, and became conversant with their application to the useful arts.

During this period, too, his early and deep-seated religious convictions and feelings which had long ruled his life, led him to the more regular and systematic study of theology, and he became an ordained minister of the Baptist church.

Sensible, doubtless, that the instruction of youth was the peculiar talent which had been entrusted to him, and believing that he could thus, "according to his ability," best serve his Master, he never became the regular pastor of any church or congregation. His appearance in the pulpit was, therefore, rare and occasional; but I am told that his discourses and public prayers were distinguished for the soundness of their doctrine and the earnest fervour of their eloquence. His theological opinions were those of the Calvinistic Baptists. That he believed the doctrines he professed, firmly and conscientiously, his life is a proof. That sincerity in his own belief was united in him with charity for those who differed from it, is attested by his friendly connexion in this institution with an associate principal of the Society of Friends, and a board of trustees of various other denominations; and still more, by the earnestness and fidelity with which, on proper occasions, he here enforced the great principles of faith and morals, upon a large body of pupils educated in all the different modes of worship known amongst us, without ever irritating the feelings or exciting the prejudices of any parent or pupil.

The respect and confidence with which he was regarded by that numerous and respectable body of Christians with whom he was immediately connected were shown, first by his appointment to a professorship of Hebrew and Greek in a theological institution, founded some years ago, for the instruction of candidates for the ministry in the Baptist church; and more recently, by his unanimous election to the office of president of the Columbian college in the District of Columbia, a seminary of general learning, under the peculiar, though not exclusive, patronage and government of the same communion. This last appointment, after some suspense, he relinquished in favour of this institution, to which he had been devoted from its foundation.

Our deceased friend's natural ardour of mind, directed, as it always was, by the sense of duty and the sentiments of philanthropy, made him one of those who can never become the slaves of routine and custom, and who cannot be content with what is merely well, as long as it seems practicable to make it better. Alike in the government of his own heart and conscience, in the pursuits of science, and in the business of education, his constant aspiration was to improvement.

It was, therefore, that his attention was early directed to the monitorial system of Bell and Lancaster, and its extension from simple elementary instruction to the mathematics, ancient and modern languages, and such branches of science as do not require the aid of lectures or experiment. He had satisfied himself of the value of this system, by trial, on a small scale, in his own private classes, when his confidence in its efficacy was increased by its successful application in the High School of Edinburgh, by Professor Pellans, as well as by the attestations of Doctors Mann and D'Oyley to its use in the Charter-House School of London.

He, therefore, eagerly co-operated in the foundation of the High School for boys in 1824, became one of the two associate principals, and has ever since been the faithful and efficient head of the classical department.

The several preceding annual reports, and those of the school committees, drawn up by some of our most distinguished citizens, show the high sense of the value of his services entertained by the successive boards of trustees; while the great number of pupils—always averaging from four hundred and fifty to six hundred—give still stronger evidence of his reputation with the public.

The school was often thronged with visitors and teachers from abroad, anxious to learn and diffuse its methods of instruction; and one of the best proofs of its merit, and that of its principals, is the fact that it has been the model of numerous and most valuable similar establishments in various parts of the Union.

It was in the midst of this career of useful and honourable service that he was snatched from us.

He had been invited last month, by the trustees and officers of the "Rensselaer School," recently founded near Troy by the well-judged munificence of one of our most honoured and patriotic citizens, to attend their annual examination. He had taken great interest in this school from its foundation, as it had been in part modelled on the plan of his own system of instruction, and because it combines with the usual elementary course, the rudiments of natural and physical science, and the practice of agriculture.

"I must go," said he, in words of fatal import.

I need not detail the circumstances of his death. On his way thither he was thrown from a stage, and expired a few hours afterwards.

He died regretted and honoured by all who knew his public services, and deeply mourned by those friends who more intimately knew and loved his private virtues.

In this simple narrative of Mr. Barnes's life, much of his character has been anticipated. It is due, however, to his memory to say something more of his character as a scholar and man of science, and his merit as an instructor.

He was an excellent classical scholar, accurately skilled in the Latin and Greek languages, to which he added considerable acquirements in the Hebrew, and a familiar acquaintance with modern languages and literature. As a philologist, like other zealous cultivators of that branch of study, he was perhaps disposed to push favourite theories to an extreme; but he was learned, acute, and philosophical. His acquirements in mathematics were highly respectable, but I think that he never devoted himself to this science with the same zeal as to other collateral studies.

It is probably as a naturalist that his name will be best known to posterity, as it already is in Europe. He was a most industrious member of the Lyceum of Natural History in this city, a society which, without parade or public patronage, displaying in a rare degree the love of learning without the parade of it, has for many years cultivated the natural sciences with admirable zeal, industry, and success. They have joined us in paying the last honours to the memory of our deceased associate; and it is to one of their members, himself a naturalist, of well-earned reputation, that I am indebted for the following brief but very honourable tribute to Mr. Barnes's labours and attainments as a naturalist.

"About the year 1818, he turned his attention to the natural sciences, and his connexion with the Lyceum of this city nearly at the same time, gave additional impulse to the characteristic zeal with which he prosecuted his new studies. The departments of mineralogy and geology occupied his attention, and the first fruits of his inquiries are to be found in a paper read before the Lyceum, entitled a 'Geological Survey of the Canaan Mountains, with observations on the soil and productions of the neighbouring regions.' In this paper he showed himself well conversant with botany and zoology. To this latter branch of natural history he subsequently devoted his leisure hours with greater avidity; and communicated to the Lyceum a curious and original paper, 'On the Genera Unio et Alasmiodonta,' a family of fresh-water shells, distinguished for their beauty and their almost infinite variety of form. Shortly after appeared in the annals of the Lyceum several other papers from Mr. Barnes, on similar subjects. Two of these may be particularly noted, one on 'the Genus Cluton,' and the other on 'the Doubtful Rep-tiles.'"

The reputation of Mr. Barnes as a naturalist, will be immovably established upon his memoir on the shells of his country. The introductory observations applicable to the whole study of conchology are marked by that precision, clearness, and lucid order, for which he was remarkable. He described above twenty new species; and, a short time before his death, he received a flattering proof of the estimation in which his labours were held by the learned of Europe.

The great and splendid work of Humboldt on Mexico, of which the zoological part is now in course of publication, contains beautiful plates and descriptions of the genera just referred to. The first zoological critic of Europe—the Baron de Ferussac—in commenting upon this work, points out many errors into which the author has fallen; "errors," he observes, "which had arisen from his not having consulted the works of American naturalists, and especially the labours of Mr. Barnes."

THE ROMANCE OF HISTORY.

BRIDGET PLANTAGENET.

THE life and death of Bridget Plantagenet, fourth daughter of Edward the fourth and his queen Elizabeth Woodville, affords a beautiful picture of repose and innocence, in the midst of those troublous and "disjointed" times, when, if the world were not more generally corrupt and sinful than it is in our own days, it was less enlightened and civilized; and the fierce and ruthless passions of ambition, hatred, and revenge, more openly outraged the holiest ties, and set at nought the barrier of the laws, sowing anarchy and dissension; especially among the heterogeneous branches of the royal family, and the turbulent nobles still partially submitting to the ascendancy of the star of York. The most zealous adherents of that unhappy family rather contributed to subvert than to establish its power, by espousing the jarring interests of its several branches, with the same fierce spirit and blood-thirsty animosity which had so long ensanguined the stars of the white rose and the red.

Dear! bought was Elizabeth Woodville's ill-starred elevation! And many were the sadly retrospective glances she cast from her fearful eminence, to that comparative lowliness when, "in maiden meditation, fancy free," she strayed among the quiet shades of her paternal Grafton. It may be also, that the thoughts of England's queen—of the wife of Edward Plantagenet, sometimes reverted to her second home of Groby, and to the husband of her youth, the father of her first-born—not that her second union had been contracted solely, or perhaps chiefly with ambitious views. Edward, the handsomest and most engaging man of his times; a lover—a prince—and the generous protector of herself and her bequeathed orphans, could not fail to awaken reciprocal tenderness in the still young and susceptible heart of Elizabeth; and whatever were his after derelictions from conjugal fidelity, to all outward seeming his affection for her experienced no diminution, and her influence over the royal mind remained unabated to the last hour of their union.

But though the queen was discreetly blind to those causes of offence which no quick-sightedness could have averted, the woman and the wife could not steel her heart against all the arrows of jealous and wounded feeling. And too often, when she looked around the splendid circle of her court—whether toward the phalanx of her own aggrandized relatives, or at the kindred of the king, their sinister smiles and hollow courtesies—her spirit sank with sad and sick forebodings, and involuntarily her thoughts fled back to Groby; to the husband in whose house she had been loved and honoured, not only by himself, but by all connected with him in friendship or consanguinity.

Among such, Sybilla, the sister of Sir John Grey, had been the beloved playmate and companion of her happy childhood and maturer youth; but far different were their after destinies. Elizabeth was reserved for the splendid misery of envy and greatness; and the happier Sybilla, whose earthly prospects were for ever darkened, at the period of her brother's death, by the loss of her affianced husband, who fell in the same battle, retired to the nunnery of Dartford, where she took the veil, and in course of time became superior of the sisterhood.

Far differently had the lot fallen to Elizabeth Woodville and Sybilla Grey; but among all "the chances and changes" of their lives; even from the days of Childhood innocence,

When with their needles, creating both one flower;
Both on the sampler; sitting on one cushion;
Both wailing of one song; both in one key:
As if their hands, their sides, voices, and minds
Had been incorporate, they grew together
Like to double cherry, seeming parted,
But yet in union in partition—

to that after-time, when the great gulf between a cloister and a throne divided their mortal destinies, sisters they remained in mind and heart; and perhaps the whitest hours of the queen of England's fateful life, were those when, rapt from the gilded shackles of her state—from hollow hearts and dissembling smiles—from covert enemies and rashly aspiring friends—she took temporary refuge at Dartford, in the quiet parlour of the lady abbess, the revered mother St. Agnes, whose heart was as tender and true to its early affections, as when Sybilla Grey and Elizabeth Woodville "shared sweet counsel and sisters' vows" together; and as lowly, as though she had been still but sister Agnes, an undistinguished member of the pious community.

The queen was generally accompanied by one or more of her children, in these visits to the nunnery of Dartford. Very frequently, by the young Dorset and his brother Richard, her sons by Sir John Grey, and consequently nephews to the lady abbess; often, by Elizabeth and Cicely, the elder princesses; or by others of the royal offspring; but always—almost always, by one lovely little creature; the dove-eyed Bridget—the fourth and fairest, and in secret, perhaps, the dearest of her six surviving daughters.

Young as they were, the three elder princesses were already contracted nobly; and Edward—who had it especially at heart to match his daughters royally—was negotiating marriages between Mary and Catherine his youngest born—the king of Denmark and the Spanish Infante.

Far other espousals were decreed for the young Bridget, in resigning whose sweet promise to the seclusion of a cloister, Edward and Elizabeth, influenced by the superstition of their faith and unenlightened times, considered they were making a sacrifice acceptable to heaven; and perhaps a propitiatory offering, to secure the earthly aggrandizement of their other children. Such, at least, and to gratify the queen's earnest desire, were probably the sole motives of Edward for this pious dedication; but deeper, and holier, and more tender incentives had worked within the heart of Elizabeth, disposing it to that, which was indeed on her part an incalculable sacrifice. She had entered, perhaps, with a too worldly and ambitious spirit, into the views of Edward, for the establishment of her other daughters; but there were moments, in the very height of her most exulting anticipations of their future greatness, when more maternal feelings, thoughts of tender anxiety and fond misgivings crept into her heart; and her eyes, while proudly riveted on her royal offspring, became suddenly suffused with tears, as she drew to her bosom the young, unconscious creatures, whose lot was apparently cast on that envied elevation which she too well knew was not the abiding place of peace, nor the haven of happiness and security.

From her very cradle, the young Bridget's disposition had evinced such heavenly sweetness, such saint-like meekness and tender sensibility, as, combined with extreme delicacy of constitution, had peculiarly endeared her to the maternal heart; and the lovely child was moreover characterized by a degree of pensive seriousness, probably the result of physical delicacy, which made her more frequently the companion of the queen's retired and thoughtful hours, than a sharer in the youthful sports of her more sprightly sisters, and the young princes.

Her happiest holidays were those, when she was selected to accompany her royal mother to the holy sanctuary of Dartford, and the society of its venerated superior. To that exemplary woman the young Bridget Plantagenet attached herself as to a second mother, and the innocent endearments of the royal child soon obtained for her a larger portion of the recluse's heart than the pious St. Agnes had believed it possible could ever again have been engrossed by an earthly affection. Then sprang up an earnest and devout longing to sanctify that affection, by winning over its youthful object from the snares and temptations of a corrupt and sinful world, to a life of dedicated purity; from the splendour of earthly courts, to dwell for ever in the courts of the Lord's house, and to minister in his holy temple.

"Spare her to heaven, my sister! this one dear little one—this lamb from thy fair flock. Thou hast enough beside to make thee mother of princes in all lands. Secure to thyself, at least, this treasure in heaven; and to thy child, a crown that shall not pass away—in which there are no thorns, Elizabeth, like those in thy golden circlet."

So spake the lady abbess to her royal friend, laying her gentle hand upon the fair child's head, as she stood one day beside the queen; while the latter, in the fulness of a vexed and wounded spirit, was pouring her secret sorrows and accumulating cares into the ear of sisterly affection; and detailing the causes of anxiety which had already risen, to overshadow the brilliant prospects of her affianced daughters.

At that moment of mental depression, the pomps and vanities of the world were superseded in Elizabeth's heart by womanly fears and maternal fondness; and after confiding to St. Agnes the state-difficulties which had been started to perplex Edward's negotiations for the royal marriages, she continued, "and at best, my sister, if all ends well—if all is successfully concluded, and my daughters become the wives of sovereign princes—will it ensure their happiness or increase mine? Alas! St. Agnes, my sister! shall not I be bereaved of my children—of all my sweet daughters?—for this dear little one will in turn be taken from me. They will make thee a queen too, Bridget!—my bird! my blossom! my fearful dove! they will take thee, too, away from me, and make a queen of thee!" and Elizabeth drew the child into her bosom, and wept upon her fair young head.

"Nay, nay, my mother! I will not go: I will not be a queen," whispered the little Bridget, in sobbing murmurs, lovingly clasping her royal mother's neck. "But yesterday I said so to mine uncle Glo'ster, when he jested with me, and bade me say what crown I pleased to wear."

"Did he jest with thee, poor lamb! Oh! Glo'ster, Glo'ster, bitter are thy jests! Did he smile on thee, Bridget, while he talked?"

"Ay, mother; but I do not love mine uncle's smiles, they are so strange—as if he mocked the while; and yet he speaks kind words, and kissed me yesterday so lovingly?"

"Judas!—what saidst thou, sweet one! when the duke was pleased to be so merry with thee?"

"Mother! I said I would not be a queen for all the world. 'Indeed!' mine uncle cried, and looked so strangely: 'wherefore not, fair cousin? must not the daughters of the Lady Grey—I cry her pardon—of my brother's wife, be mated like her grace, right royally? Come, little cousin, thou shalt have a king.' And then he laughed; and his looks troubled me, I scarce knew why, for still he smiled upon me—and so I wept, and said the same again. I would not be a queen, to go from England, from thee, my mother, and my royal father, and dear St. Agnes here, my other mother."

"Hear her, Elizabeth—the blessed child!" exclaimed St. Agnes, drawing pious augury from the artless prattle of the little princess. "And did thine uncle Glo'ster question thee further, Bridget?"

"Ay, did he, till I was sick and weary. So I told him my sisters might be queens, and go away; but I would stay, and be a nun in England. 'And wilt thou so, fair cousin?' quoth my uncle. 'Now, by my halidome, a most wise choice; keep to it, little cousin! and, heaven willing, thou may'st live out in peace a good old age; and then he laughed again, and whispered something to my lord of Buckingham; and while his head was turned, I slipped away to where my mother sat, and shrank from sight behind her mantle.'"

"But wilt thou be a nun, in sober truth? and wherefore, sweet one!" asked the holy mother, drawing the young princess from the queen's arms to her own bosom.

"Because you are a nun, and seem so happy; and I am always happy here—so happy! and all the sisters are so good to me. There are none here, I'm sure, but love me well, as I love them; and my sweet mother is my mother here—more than a queen—much more—ten thousand times, than when we are in London, or at Eltham, or any other of my father's houses."

"But if thou livest here, and art a nun, I shall not be with thee, my little Bridget; and wouldst thou leave the king, thy father, too, who loveth thee well, and is so good to thee?"

"Not if I might always live with him and thee, my mother, away from all the crowd, in some green wood, where birds and fawns are singing and at play all summer time, and I might be like them, as free and happy; but, alack! they say, mother!—thou saidst thyself a minute past—that I must be a queen, and go away from thee, and dear, dear England."

"Alas, mine own! thy mother spake but truth," said the poor queen; "I must not keep thee, dearest!"

"Pray my father, then," pleaded the lovely child, "to let me come and live here all my life, and be a holy nun, like good St. Agnes; then wilt thou have me still, mine own sweet mother!—still here, when all my sisters are away; and when thou art not here, my second mother will help me pray for you; and so at last, when our time comes to die, we shall be sure to meet again in heaven, and live together always."

"As if an angel spake!" was the soft pleading of that blessed child; a glance of awe-struck meaning was interchanged between St. Agnes and the queen; but both were silent for a while. At last, "Elizabeth!" said the lady abbess, "doth not the will of God manifest itself by the mouths of babes? Hath He not spoken by the lips of this innocent, and wilt thou withstand His pleasure?"

"Forbid it all my hopes of heaven and happiness!" the queen fervently replied, as, devoutly raising her eyes to the image of the crucifixion, she inwardly ejaculated a solemn vow to win from Edward the sacrifice of all earthly views for this one beloved creature, and his sanction for her heavenly espousals.

Elizabeth was faithful to her solemn engagement. The pious purpose met with no strenuous opposition from her royal consort; and it was soon publicly known that the princess Bridget was destined to take the veil in the nunnery of Dartford, and at a proper age to enter upon her novitiate.

It is probable that the queen, whose heart, sick of innumerable cares, found sweet consolation in the endearments of her loving and beloved child, would have deferred the consummation of her pious sacrifice till the latest expedient season, had not circumstances supervened to convince her that, if seriously purposed to make good her solemn promise, it behoved her rather to accelerate than retard the hour of its accomplishment. Fresh obstacles were perpetually sown, by the tortuous policy of Louis XI., in the way of the Dauphin's marriage with the Princess Elizabeth; and Edward's mind was agitated by jealous doubts, that his favourite object was thus thwarted by the secret machinations of the French king, whom he justly suspected of seeking to gain time; while, in despite of his engagement with England, he sought to obtain for his son Charles the hand of Mary, the young heiress of Burgundy, and her rich possessions. On the part of James of Scotland, there seemed also a disposition to annul the contract between the Duke of Rothsay and the Princess Cicely.

These contrarieties, and the unfavourable aspect of his negotiations with the court of Castile, for an alliance between the Infante and his daughter Catherine, had so irritated and unsettled the king's mind, that Elizabeth was justly apprehensive lest, with a view to strengthen his hands by some fresh and powerful alliance, he might be tempted to rescind his permission for the dedication of the Princess Bridget, and exchange her spiritual betrothment for an earthly contract. The health of the young princess, now eight years of age, had strengthened with her growth. Already the delicate blossom yielded sweet promise of uncommon loveliness; and Edward, a passionate idolater of beauty, had more than once commented on her personal improvement with something like regret that the comeliest of his daughters should be devoted to the seclusion of a cloister. About this juncture, also, the Princess Mary—next sister to Bridget—affianced to the king of Denmark, fell sick of the languishing disorder which ultimately terminated her life, at Greenwich, before she was of age to fulfil the nuptial contract; and the queen, painfully foreboding the event, looked forward also to its probable consequence—a determination on the part of Edward still to secure the Danish alliance, by substituting the Princess Bridget in the room of her deceased sister. As yet, no anticipation of such future contingencies had suggested itself to the mind of Edward; and Elizabeth, having consulted with her friend St. Agnes, and with her pious counsellor, Rotherham, archbishop of York, was decided, by their concurring apprehensions and strenuous advice, to press for the king's consent that the young princess should be forthwith consigned to the care of the lady abbess of Dartford, and admitted, notwithstanding her tender years, to enter immediately on her novitiate. The royal and paternal assent was obtained, though not without some show of reluctance on the king's part, and, with all accustomed pomp of regal and religious ceremony, the sacrifice was finally consummated. Throughout the public pageant, Elizabeth had borne up like a queen, with dignified composure; but when all was over, and, with no other witnesses than her friend and the archbishop, she was admitted to an interview with her daughter, in the oratory of the lady abbess, the chord of overstrained resolution suddenly relaxed, and all the mother rushed into her heart, as flinging herself on her knees, she wrapt her arms round the sweet innocent, who looked indeed an offering acceptable to heaven, as she stood between the superior and the queen; her celestial countenance and form of infant beauty, invested with the veil and robe of snowy whiteness descending to her naked feet, which was only to be exchanged for the black dress of the order, when the royal novice was admitted to make her last irrevocable profession.—"Take her—take her, St. Agnes! I have given her to thee—I have given her to heaven—my best and dearest, now no longer mine!" cried the queen, as, drawing back her head from the bosom of the now weeping child—on which she had sobbed for a moment with convulsive agony—she resigned her to the wardship of the holy mother, who received the precious deposit with a solemn appeal to heaven, so to bless and prosper her, here and hereafter, as she faithfully acquitted herself of the delegated trust.

"And she is still thine, my sister—more than ever thine!" tenderly continued the mild St. Agnes. "Thou hast lent her to the Lord, and he will keep her for thee; and perchance, even in this world, when all thy princely offspring, beside this little one, are parted from thee by their several fortunes, thou mayest resort for comfort and sympathy to the filial heart, which will not cherish thee less dutifully, because thou hast preferred for thy child a heavenly inheritance before a perishable kingdom: and hast lain the sacrifice, unspotted, thus early at the feet of thy Creator."

These words of the lady abbess of Dartford nunnery, were uttered in a prophetic spirit. By thus yielding up to heaven, and her sense of religious duty, the child of her tenderest affection, Elizabeth was unwittingly laying up for herself a source of sweetest comfort and consolation against the evil days, when a black and final eclipse fell on her greatness and her joys; and the descendant of royalty—the wife of a king, the mother of princes, the queen of a mighty nation—was held captive within the realm which had owned her for its sovereign, on the throne of which her daughter Elizabeth still sat with nominal sovereignty.

The mean and rancorous spirit of Henry VIIIth never forgave the real or imputed wrongs of Richmond; nor had he consented but with extreme reluctance, and as the only means of securing himself on the throne of England, to mingle his Lancastrian blood with the hated stream of York, by a marriage with Edward's daughter. His secret antipathy to that ill-fated princess manifested itself throughout their union, by a series of unkindnesses and contemptuous slights, that would probably have proceeded to more openly insulting lengths, had not the cautious monarch politically abstained from all measures which might tend to agitate the question of his dubious rights to the crown, and those of Elizabeth, more cordially admitted by the English nation.

But on the queen dowager, the especial object of his aversion, he wreaked without fear or scruple the avengeful malice of his hateful temper. On the frivolous pretence of punishing her for the imputed crime of having yielded up to Richard's guardianship the persons of her five daughters, Henry condemned the unfortunate Elizabeth to perpetual imprisonment in the abbey of Bermondsey; by a refinement of cruelty, rejecting her earnest petition to be allowed the choice of her prison, and permission to retire to Dartford nunnery, where—though the friend of her youth had lately been removed by death—the society of her daughter, her still dearest and most dutiful child, would have rendered more than endurable the lot of her captivity. But within the gloomy walls of Bermondsey was the widowed queen fated to languish out the remaining years of her joyless existence; deprived even of the filial sympathy and pious cares of her four married daughters—the royally mated, but wretched wife, Elizabeth, and her three sisters—all united to English subjects; and strikingly exemplifying, by the contrast of those inferior alliances to the splendid marriages early contracted for them by the deceased Edward, how impotent is the will of man and the power of princes, when Providence is pleased to annul his decree and set at naught their councils.

Not content with immuring the queen dowager in a conventual prison, the mean-souled Henry farther indulged his inveterate dislike by restricting her—under colour of guarding against intrigue and secret influence—from all intercourse with her married daughters, beyond the miserable comfort of receiving from them, at long intervals, a cold and short visit of heartless ceremony. And such is the baneful influence of worldly cares and courtly policy over the best affections of our nature—and such, alas! is the proneness of human hearts, seared by selfishness and ambition, to shun and to forget the unfortunate and the absent, that there was little of bitterness to any but the worse than childless mother, in Henry's tyrannical restriction; and her daughters gradually relaxed even in the poor unfrequent proofs of filial duty and affection, wherewith it was still permitted them to cheer the captive loneliness of their royal parent. After the lapse of a few years, it was well nigh forgotten—not only by the nation at large, but by her immediate family and more familiar friends—that Elizabeth—the widowed queen of Edward IVth, the stepmother of England's reigning monarch, and of three proud and puissant nobles—still languished out the years of her desolate old age—for grief kills not—in the cloistered gloom of Bermondsey. But though the memory of Elizabeth—the once lovely and beloved—the admired and envied—the flattered and calumniated—the minion and the sport of fate and fortune—had well nigh passed away from the land she had ruled over, before a little of its cold earth was required to heap on her remains, Providence had kept in store for the creature thus severely chastened, one drop of sweetness to mingle with her bitter cup, and make "the end more blest than the beginning."

Towards the latter years of Elizabeth's life, Henry so far relaxed in his vindictive cruelty, as to permit occasional intercourse between the captive queen and her daughter Bridget. The former was not allowed to exchange her prison of Bermondsey for the convent of Dartford; but the royal nun was indulged in the liberty of absence from her own cloister, and the inestimable privilege of sharing, for weeks together, and with no long intervals, the solitude of her declining parent; for the meek and blameless nun, the humble sister Alice, of Dartford nunnery, had merged those fatal distinctions so obnoxious to the distrustful temper of the king. Of her, therefore, he entertained no jealous apprehension; and his hatred and suspicion of the queen dowager being in some measure satiated and laid to rest, by the oblivious neglect into which her very name and living memory had already fallen, he foresaw no danger of reviving influence in that quarter, or of recalling Elizabeth to the recollection of the people, by permitting her occasional intercourse with one, "by the world forgot."

So it was, that having "cast her bread upon the waters," Elizabeth "found it again after many days;" and that, when forgotten by the world, and forsaken by those of her own family whose earthly prosperity she had most laboured to secure, the treasure she had "lent unto the Lord" was returned into her bosom—as had been prophetically promised—at the hour of her greatest need. The child, to whose eternal welfare she had sacrificed so large a portion of her own happiness, was sent, like a ministering angel, to bind up her bruised and broken heart—to pour into its wounds the balm of filial love and holy consolation—to cheer, and comfort, and sustain her in the decline of age, at the time of sickness, and in the hour of death.

Of Bridget Plantagenet little more is known, than that, after fulfilling the last offices to her departed parent, she returned to her own cloister, and the humble obscurity of her conventual life; "and there," saith the chronicler, "spending the remainder of her days in devotion and contemplation, she died, and was buried in the same convent, an. Dom. 1517, in the eighth year of king Henry VIIIth.

The effigy of Elizabeth Plantagenet still lies at Westminster, in marble magnificence, beside that of her royal consort. Emblematic of their living union and joyless grandeur, is the cold and stern repose of those two marble images, side by side, extended in sepulchral state.

No sculptured marble, nor humbler stone, with its forlorn "hic jacet," marked out at Dartford, even before the dissolution of religious houses, the last resting-place of Bridget Plantagenet. Yet, in those troublous times, when "every man's hand was against his brother;" compared with the royal wretchedness of the two Elizabeths, how enviable was her obscure and peaceful destiny! Pleasant and good it is, to turn for a moment from the disastrous annals of those evil days, to one unsullied page—to the life of one who, "born to great cares, the daughter of a king," early descended from that fearful eminence, and so escaping the ravages of the storm that laid waste her royal house, lived out the term of her natural life in un molested quiet—in the exercise of all duties and charities that fell within the sphere of her limited responsibility; and having her hope in heaven, "and her conscience clear of offence to all men," so passed away from earth—unrecorded by its proud chronicles of fame, but having her name written in that book wherein, at the great day of summing up, so many a one shall be found wanting that the world worshippeth; and not a few of those it despiseth or remembereth not, appear blazoned in characters of light.

VARIETIES.

DANCING.—We are glad that private balls for children are becoming more common. These meetings refine their thoughts and manners, exercise them most advantageously in a salutary accomplishment, and afford them the highest innocent delight. The consideration last mentioned ought ever to have weight; enjoyment should be studiously provided for the season of life in which it has its keenest zest. The true balcyon days are those of well-treated children.

"Gay hope is their's, by fancy fed,
"Less pleasing when possess;
"The tear forgot as soon as shed,
"The sunshine of the breast:
"Their's, buxom health of rosy hue,
"Wild wit, invention ever new,
"And lively cheer of vigour born;
"The thoughtless day, the easy night,
"The spirits pure, the slumbers light,
"That fly th' approach of morn." Nat. Gazette.

READERS.—A cook, whose business it should be to cater for the palates of some three or four thousand persons, and who should be obliged to provide for each individual the dish he preferred, would have a somewhat difficult task to perform. Precisely so with the editor. No two of his readers think exactly alike as to what would constitute proper matter to fill a paper. We would like to see a sheet which all of our subscribers should have a hand in compiling, and which should contain suitable proportions of matter adapted to the taste of every one. It would be as spacious as heaven's canopy; and we would be willing to perform a pilgrimage to Mecca in order to get a peep at it. Litch. Po.

WHITTLING.—The propensity for whittling seems to have been legitimately derived by New-Englanders. An English writer recommends the following method to nip the evil in the bud: Paint the benches and book-boards for schools, and while the paint is fresh, sprinkle fine sharp sand upon it; when dry, put on another coat of paint. No boy, who takes his knife as "a rare piece of stuff," will make more than one incision.

SCOLDING.—I never knew a scolding person that was able to govern a family. What makes people scold? Because they cannot govern themselves. How then can they govern others? Those who govern well, are generally calm. They are prompt and resolute, but steady and mild.

PUNING.—A young lady reprimanded her shoemaker for not following her directions respecting a pair of shoes which she had ordered; and among other charges, insisted that they were not felloes. Honest Crispin acquiesced in the propriety of this remark, and stated that he purposely made them so in order to oblige her, well knowing the purity of her disposition, and that she was not fond of felloes.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Mrs. Jackson.—A Nashville paper, of the twenty-third of December, conveys the tidings of the death of Mrs. RACHEL JACKSON, wife of the president elect. She expired on the night of the twenty-second, after an illness of only four days, in the sixty-second year of her age. The citizens of Nashville and its vicinity, the personal friends and neighbours of the deceased, experienced a severe shock from this unexpected event. In order to testify to the general and his lady their feelings of respect and attachment, the twenty-third had been selected for a splendid dinner and ball, to be given in honour of them before their departure for the seat of government, that being the anniversary of a desperate conflict with a part of the British army near New-Orleans, which kept them in check until the eighth of January. The news of Mrs. Jackson's sudden death, as might be expected, produced the most distressing sensations, and threw a general gloom over the town. She was taken away without being permitted to fill, with her distinguished consort, the most dignified station in the human family. But she was spared to witness a gratifying triumph over enemies who had propagated the foulest falsehoods and slanders against her. As nothing can be more unmanly and base, than, from mere political motives, to vilify and traduce an irreproachable and exemplary matron, we are glad, for the honour of our country, that these things were confined to a few hollow-hearted and abandoned EDITORS; some of whom, if retribution had followed on the heels of iniquity, would have experienced a summary and severe chastisement.

Although there was abundant cause to allow to Mrs. Jackson the reputation of a pure and estimable woman, we have taken pains to make inquiries concerning her disposition and character, of a number of gentlemen, some of whom are ministers of the gospel, who had made visits to the Hermitage, all of whom bear ample testimony to the good sense, discretion, hospitality, kindness, and unaffected piety of this lady. We have never meddled with party politics, nor do we intend to do so now; but, taking into view that she was the wife of the man whom the nation, by a powerful voice, have called to be their ruler, and that she was herself an ornament to her sex, we have felt that we should not pass the event unnoticed, and that a tribute, although humble on our part, was due to her memory.

In addition to the above, believing, as we do, that all our readers wish to be told the truth respecting this much injured and lamented lady, we copy the following from the Nashville Republican of the twenty-sixth ultimo:

"Mrs. Jackson's health, which had for some months been more delicate than usual, became seriously impaired about a week ago, by the fatigue of a long walk. She was attacked with alarming spasms in the chest; which, after remitting and recurring for a few days, became transferred to the heart, and, in a moment of apparent convalescence, terminated without a groan or struggle her well-spent life.

"This melancholy event, which has visited her family with unspeakable sorrow, and clothed our community in sadness, will excuse the following faint and brief notice, which, though far inferior to the dignity of her virtues, is the best offering we can make to her beloved and venerated memory. The history of Mrs. Jackson, from her early years, is closely, and, considering her sex, remarkably connected with the history of our country. Her father, Colonel John Donelson, who was a gentleman of fortune, probity and enterprise, removed with his family, while she was yet a child, from Pittsylvania county, Virginia—the place of her birth—to the western country; and settled in this neighbourhood, on the banks of the Cumberland. Surrounded by the dangers which our brave pioneers had to encounter, he was killed, in the prime of manhood and flush of success, by the Indians in Kentucky. At the time General Jackson first came to this country, she was residing with her widowed mother; and in August, 1791, she became his wife. His well known hardships and perils in our Indian and English wars, his distant and dangerous campaigns, his frequent battles and triumphs, made her a silent but anxious sharer in the dangers and glories of the nation; and many of her relatives, following the standard of her martial husband, gave her a more painful interest in our struggles. General Coffee, the husband of her niece, was always in the front of the battle; and her nephew, Alexander Donelson, fell gloriously fighting by his side.

"In the recent political contest, which has terminated so honourably for the illustrious partner of her heart, the same connection subsisted. In order to obstruct his course, she was made the object of injuries more barbarous than murderous savages could inflict. And Providence, after permitting her to witness the downfall and confusion of those who committed these atrocities, gently withdrew her wounded spirit to the mansions of eternal bliss, "where the wicked cease from troubling, and the weary are at rest." Even after death, the course of public feeling is blended with her name. The honours with which it was intended to commemorate the anniversary of a national victory, were suspended by her death, and exchanged, by a patriotic people, for public expressions of respect for her virtues, and regret for her departure. And those who, in the evening, had expected to salute her with joy and gratulation, hurried next morning to look, for the last time, on her inanimate countenance, and to follow her cold remains to the tomb. Piety and age, innocence and childhood, the brave and the fair, the humble and the exalted, mingled their tears and blessings around her grave, and attested, in accents of deep and spontaneous sorrow, in sobs of affection converted into agony by the awful presence of death, her endearing merits and her exemplary life.

"In the character of this excellent and lamented lady, feminine charms, domestic virtues, and Christian perfections were united. Her person in youth was beautiful, her manner was always engaging, her temper cheerful, her sensibility delicate and mild. She was a tender wife, an affectionate friend, a benignant mistress, a generous relation, a kind neighbour, and an humble Christian. Her pure and gentle breast, in which a selfish, guileful, or malicious thought never found entrance, was the throne of benevolence; and under its noble influence her faculties and time were constantly devoted to the exercise of hospitality, and to acts of kindness. To feed the hungry, to clothe the naked, to supply the indigent, to raise the humble, to notice the friendless, and to comfort the unfortunate, were her favourite occupations; nor could the kindness of her soul be repressed by distress or prosperity; but, like those fountains which, rising in deep and secluded valleys, flow on in the frost of winter and through summer's heat, it maintained a uniform and refreshing current. Thus she lived, and, when death approached, her patience and resignation were equal to her goodness; not an impatient gesture, nor a vexatious look—not a fretful accent escaped her; but her last breath was charged with an expression of tenderness for the man whom she loved more than her life, and honoured next to her God.

"The lamentable bereavement suffered by our society in the death of Mrs. Jackson, has excited more universal regret than any circumstance of a similar nature which we have any recollection of. No lady had a more extensive acquaintance, and none enjoyed such entire and unqualified esteem and affection to the extent of that acquaintance.

"The day set apart for the manifestation of the personal regard and affection entertained by the citizens of this place and its vicinity for General Jackson, previous to his departure for the seat of government—appropriated and announced as a day of rejoicing—was ushered in by the mournful intelligence that this heaviest of afflictions had overtaken him—the wife of his bosom was no more! To him we can offer no consolation. If any there be, it is to be found in the reflection that she passed into eternity with the brightest hopes of a Christian. The active discharge of those duties to which he will shortly be called, more than any thing else, will tend to sooth the poignancy of his grief; and to leave, as soon as practicable, those scenes which can only tend to recall more vividly and more frequently to his mind the lost object of his affections, would certainly be the advice of his best friends.

"The preparations making for the festivity were immediately stopped upon the arrival of the melancholy information; and in their stead the committee of arrangements, together with the mayor and aldermen of the city, recommend to the citizens, as an evidence of their deep regret and sympathy for the calamity which had befallen their fellow-citizen, to suspend for one day—Wednesday—the ordinary business of life; which was cordially observed.

"The following were the resolutions on the occasion, by the committee of arrangements and the mayor and aldermen of the city:

"The committee appointed by the citizens of Nashville to superintend the reception of General Jackson on this day, with feelings of deep regret, announce to the public that Mrs. Jackson departed this life last night, between the hours of ten and eleven o'clock.

"Respect for the memory of the deceased, and a sincere condolence with him on whom this providential affliction has fallen, forbid the manifestations of public regard intended for the day.

"In the further consideration of the painful and unexpected occasion which has brought them together, the committee feel that it is due to the exemplary virtues and exalted character of the deceased, that some public token should be given of the high regard entertained towards her whilst living:—They have, therefore, resolved,

"That it be respectfully recommended to their fellow-citizens of Nashville, in evidence of this feeling, to refrain on to-morrow from the ordinary pursuits of life."

"The committee in behalf of the citizens, having determined that it is proper to abstain from business on to-morrow—therefore,

"Resolved—That the inhabitants of Nashville are respectfully requested to abstain from their ordinary business on to-morrow, as a mark of respect for the memory of Mrs. Jackson; and that the church bells be tolled from one until two o'clock—being the hour of her funeral.

TO *****.

BY THE LATE EDWARD C. PINKNEY.

'Twas eve; the broadly shining sun
Its long celestial course had run;
The twilight heaven, so soft and blue,
Met earth in tender interview,
Ev'n as the angel met of yore
His gifted mortal paramour,
Woman, a child of morning then—
A spirit still—compared with men.
Like happy islands of the sky,
The gleaming clouds reposed on high,
Each fixed sublime, deprived of motion,
A Delos to the airy ocean.
Upon the stirless shore no breeze
Shook the green drapery of the trees,
Or, rebel to tranquillity,
Awoke a ripple on the sea.
Nor, in a more tumultuous sound,
Were the world's audible breathings drown'd;
The low strange hum of herbage growing,
The voice of hidden waters flowing,
Made songs of nature, which the ear
Could scarcely be pronounced to hear;
But noise had furled its subtle wings,
And moved not through material things,
All which lay calm as they had been
Parts of the painter's mimic scene.
'Twas eve; my thoughts belong to thee,
Thou shape of separate memory!
When, like a stream to lands of flame,
Unto my mind a vision came.
Methought, from human haunts and strife
Remote, we lived a loving life;
Our wedded spirits seemed to blend
In harmony too sweet to end,
Such concord as the echoes cherish
Fondly, but leave at length to perish.
Wet rain-stars are thy lucid eyes,
The Hyades of earthly skies;
But then upon my heart they shone,
As shines on snow the fervid sun.
And fast went by those moments
Like meteors shooting through
But faster fled the wild
That clothed them with their
Yet love can years to days
And long appeared that
It was—to give a better
Than time—a century.

FROM P'S AND Q'S.

THE SERENADER.

I'm almost tir'd of waiting here,
"Awake! my love! arise!"
Here, like a sleepless tabby cat,
I'm howling at the skies.

The stars are twinkling merrily,
But they no answer make;
Inferior, they resign to thee—
"Arise! my love! awake!"

But soft—the lattice opens—"My love—
What is my love's decree?"

(BLACK GIRL AT WINDOW.)

"My missy wishe you go 'way,
And let her quiet be."

(Exit serenader, whistling "Hey, Betty Martin.")

AN ADIEU.

Adieu!—the chain is shiver'd now,
That linked my heart and hopes with thine;
I leave thee to thy broken vow—
Thy dreams will often be of mine;
And tears—be those the only tears
Thine eyes may ever learn to weep—
Shall tell the thoughts to other years
Thy spirit cannot choose but keep!
Adieu!

Adieu! enjoy thy pleasant hours,
Find other hearts—to fling away!
Thy life is in its time of flowers,
Gather May-garlands while 'tis May!
Oh! till the dreary day draws in,
And winter settles round thy heart,
And memory's phantom-forms begin
To take a wounded spirit's part,
Adieu!

Adieu! thy beauty is the bow
That kept the tempest from thy sky,
And all too bright, upon thy brow,
The sign which must, so surely, die!
These drops—the last for thee!—are shed
To think that there will be not one
To love thee, when its light is fled,
To shield thee when the storm comes on!
Adieu!

Adieu!—oh! wild and worthless all
The heart that wakes this last farewell!

Why—for a thing like thee—should fall
My harpings like a passing-bell?
Why should my soul and song be sad?
Away!—I fling thee from my heart,
Back to the selfish and the bad,
With whom thou hast thy fitter part!
Adieu!

Adieu! and may thy dreams of me
Be poison in thy brain and breast,
And hope be lost in memory,
And memory mar thy prayer for rest!
Why seeks my soul a gentler strain?
For thee my harp be henceforth mute,
Never to wake thy name again,
Thou stranger to my love and lute!
Adieu!

DEATH OF BRAINARD.

The turf is on thee, Brainard!
Thy human life is done;
We do not meet thy pleasant eye,
We feel that thou art gone!
'Tis hard to give thee up, so young,
With that yet joyous glance,
Like one who hath been summon'd
With a whisper from the dance.

The world thy praise hath spoken,
But that is nothing now—
It will not lift the leaden band
That lieth on thy brow.
Oh how it seemeth idle
To talk about the dead,
When praise availeth only
To tell us they are fled!
How can we stand above the grave,
And feel that thou art there?
The warm and breathing form we lov'd,
Shut from the blessed air!
The moving lip we stay'd to hear—
The gentle, thoughtful eye—
Left in that close, unsunn'd abode,
To perish silently!

Oh plant his grave with many flowers,
And go to it sometimes,
And talk of him as if he heard,
And sing his pleasant rhymes—
It may be true that he is there
With his keen spirit-ear,
And it must be a joy to know
He's not forgotten here.

THE WARRIOR.

His foot's in the stirrup,
His hand's on the mane—
He is up and away,
Shall we see him again?
He thinks on his lady-love,
Little he heeds
The levelling of lances,
Or rushing of steeds:
He thinks on his true love,
And rides in an armour
Of proof, woven sure
By the spells of his charmer.
How young and how comely—
Lo! look on him now,
How steadfast his eye,
And how tranquil his brow!
The gift of his lady-love
Glitters full gay,
As down, like the eagle,
He pours on his prey.
Go, sing it in song;
And go, tell it in story—
He went in his strength,
And returned in his glory.

SONG.

Day departs this upper air,
My lively, lovely lady;
And the eve-star sparkles fair,
And our good steeds are ready.
Leave, leave these loveless halls,
So lordly though they be;
Come, come—affection calls—
Away at once with me!
Sweet thy words in sense as sound,
And gladly do I hear them;
Though thy kinsmen are around,
And tamer bosoms fear them.
Mount, mount—I'll keep thee, dear,
In safety as we ride;
On, on—my heart is here,
My sword is at my side!

THE DEATH OF THE FLOWERS.

How happily, how happily the flowers die away!
Oh, could we but return to earth as easily as they!
Just live a life of sunshine, of innocence and bloom,
Then drop without decrepitude, or pain, into the tomb!

The gay and glorious creatures! they neither "toil nor spin;"
Yet, lo! what goodly raiment they're all apparelled in!
No tears are on their beauty, but dewy gems more bright
Than ever brow of eastern queen endiamed with light.

The young rejoicing creatures! their pleasures never pall;
Nor lose in sweet contentment, because so free to all!
The dew, the showers, the sunshine, the balmy, blessed air,
Spend nothing of their freshness, tho' all may freely share.

The happy careless creatures! of time they take no heed;
Nor weary of his creeping, nor tremble at his speed;
Nor sigh with sick impatience, and wish the light away;
Nor when 'tis gone, cry dolefully, Would God that it were day!

And when their lives are over, they drop away to rest,
Unconscious of the penal doom, on holy Nature's breast;
No pain have they in dying—no shrinking from decay—
Oh! could we but return to earth as easily as they!

THE CASKET.

A CHAPTER ON PORTRAITS.

BY HARRY CORNWALL

Of all the Souvenirs, and Keepsakes, and Bijoux;
Of all the Christmas Boxes, Amulets and Gems, Anniversaries and Forget-me-nots—flowers of cold weather!—of all the presents with which we should choose to commemorate a birth-day or a festival, or to offer to one whom we regard, as an indication of good-will or friendship, we think that we should select—a portrait; a portrait—perhaps our own. It should not be cast in gingerbread—which would be too provocative; nor in brass—which would be out of character; nor in paper—for we are already but too inflammable: neither should we desire to ride on boys' shoulders, triumphant in pipe-clay, smeared over with blue and scarlet—immortal as plaster could make us—among Dukes of Wellington, and Napoleons, and Voltaires—among dumb Paul Prys and silent parrots. An humbler lot be ours! We should scarcely choose to look out from a snuff-box blazing with brilliants—for it would be too imperial; and we might, for the first time, forget ourselves.

We have said that it should, perhaps, be a portrait of ourselves (selves)—but we recall our words. We are inclined to abandon that agreeable notion. At all events, it should not always represent our own features, to the exclusion of philosophers and heroes. We would not invariably usurp the place of Shakespeare and Bacon: we do not love ourselves so immeasurably. Some face, however, which we love or respect, it should ever be; in preference even to a hamper of Johannisberg or Hockheim, or a haunch of the bravest buck that ever nipped the grass of a Scottish moor.

There is something delightful in the intercourse which we have with another's likeness. It is himself, only once removed; he is visible, not tangible: we have his moiety. In a picture of history, there is often indeed more to admire than in the mere face of one individual man or woman. There is more room for the skill of the artist: it is better adapted to exemplify a moral. But the sentiment that chains us to the other, is wanting: we are not familiar with it; one is a brave matter—a splendid thing; the other is a person, and becomes our friend. We could never worship, as some do, the complicated strife of arms and shoulders; or think only of the way in which each is subdued by the painter, and made—by the wonders of light and shadow—to represent a great event. We would rather look upon the eyes of some Italian "dama," whom Titian or Giorgione painted long ago—without a name, and catalogued only as "portrait of a lady"—or face one of Titian's piercing heads—a noble of Venice or Rome—than sit down before the most elaborate composition of history, or see brought out, in dazzling array before us, all the battles of Alexander, or all the triumphs or processions of the Cæsars.

We were exceedingly struck by the delicacy of two or three friends, who conspired lately to give an old acquaintance pleasure on his return from a distant part of India. His wife had been obliged to come to England for her health, and his friends secretly caused her portrait to be painted, in order that, on his return to Calcutta or Bengal, he might find the likeness at least of her who was dearest to him in the world. It is thus that affection and kind feeling are perpetuated. It is thus that the form and features of the child are made known to its pining parents afar off. It is thus that the faces which we loved to look upon, are redeemed from the grave, and sent to us, across deserts, and woods, and mountains; or over a thousand leagues of water. This is the greatest boast of art, as well as its most delightful victory; it annihilates space—if not time—and makes the absent happy.

An historical scene is a fiction merely. Be it ever so true to nature, it is still the fiction of the painter. But a portrait is truth itself. No imagination can compete with it: it is either the very thing we desire, or nothing; all depends on its truth. Even in a portrait—to use the term—of inanimate nature, what assemblage of cataracts and hills and forests, what glories of sunset or meridian, may compete with the little landscape, which restores to us the scene of our own quiet home—which brings before us our childhood—the tree under which we have played—the river beside which we have walked or sported? Art, which never addresses itself, strictly speaking, to our reason, is valuable only in proportion as it operates upon our feelings: these are seldom—and then but little—excited by the mere invention of a painter: we rather sympathize with his difficulties; we congratulate him on his success: we say, "How admirably has he grouped those figures! how finely are the light and shade distributed! what a grand expression! what dramatic effect!" We look upon the artist as a hero; he has done so much—for his own fame. But he who gives us the very smile which won or warms our hearts—the frank or venerable aspect of our friend or father—the dawning beauty of our child—or shows us the tender eyes with which the wife or mother looks love upon us from a distant region—he seems to have thought of us rather than of his own renown, and becomes at once our benefactor and our friend!

It is very pleasant, to our thinking, to traverse some country mansion, where the portraits of its former owners hang up, side by side with each other; frail records, it is true, of vanity and glory! We love to trace them upwards, into absolute barbarism; to mailed, bearded, ferocious warriors, powerful and—forgotten. And, among them, it is hard if we cannot detect one, whom learning or science has honoured—a poet, a monk, or a philosopher—perhaps one, even, whom love has made immortal. We once saw such a one—there he was, with nobility on his forehead, and sadness in his eye—the humbled inheritor of a proud name—the impoverished master of thousands! Can one help pitying such a sufferer? We see him; and pass on: we see another—and other—and another: but he still remains fixed in our memory—"heret lateri lethalis arundo"—and we turn back, after viewing all the rest, once more to sympathize with him alone. We say, "Rich one! are you there still—still pale, and dumb, and melancholy? Had the foul fiend so seized upon you, that not even the flattering painter could take the sorrow from your eye—the sting that had ran, piercing through your heart? 'Faith, you are fallen indeed!"

Let not the reader suppose, from what we have said, that we are wanting in a due respect for the illustrious painters who have conferred honour upon art. We love or admire them all. We can pore over a book of prints even, and forget ourselves among the old masters of the Italian school of painting. We can begin with Giotto, and go on untired, to the last of the school of the Caracci.

There is great fervour, and—so to speak—devotion of spirit in some of Giotto's works. Did the reader ever see his two saintly heads, in the possession of Mr. Rogers, the poet?—There is great skill and some grandeur in Massaccio, and infinite beauty in Perugino. Then, there are the quaint loveliness of Leonardo da Vinci—the frowning power of Michael Angelo—the splendours of Giorgione and Tizian—the suavity of Correggio—and the life, and spirit, and beauty—the grace, and intelligence, and unequalled propriety of Raffaele! There, too, are Guido's pale heads, and Domenichino's divine expressions—the stern realities of Annibal—the touching looks of Fra. Bartolomeo—the halcyon skies of Claude—and the stormy landscapes of Salvator Rosa. In a word, all that beauty and power, or the spirit of religion and love have dictated—all that great Nature herself has taught, are therein assembled, to delight whoever has the taste to value them. The most radiant visions open themselves upon us—the grandeur of the old world—the fantastic elegance of the new—the creation of Adam—the visage of Cæsar—Cleopatra and her asp—Roman temples—Egyptian pyramids—angels, and hierarchies, and prophets—warriors of all times—women, lovelier and more variable than the rainbow—all are brought back before us, by a power, greater than that of Prospero's wand. And can we refuse our homage? No: we gaze, and acknowledge that, even in its degradation and decline, Italy had still some spirits able to perpetuate her glory, and, in some degree, even to elevate her name!

The great painters to whom we have adverted—for the purpose of recording our respect for art in general—were painters of history or landscape. But they could at times abandon their professed employment, and sketch the likeness of their mistress, or of their friend—or of some excellent beauty of their age and nation; such as artists—above all other people—d-light to honour. The Transfiguration was done by Raffaele for the sake of eternal renown—which it has won—but the Fornarina was a work of love; and the artist's own portrait—more than once painted by himself, and given to his friend or patron—is well worthy the double commendation that men have conspired to bestow upon it. It is a masterly deed, twice honoured, for its own merit, and for the principle of gratitude in which it had its origin.

Few of the great Roman artist's pictures have been more admired, than his portraits of Leo and Julius the Second. There is so much of integrity in the design, so much truth in the detail, that no one who gazes can for a moment doubt but that they are true representations of those famous men. Raffaele's life was employed on works of imagination, such as no one else has equalled; but he could descend from the "dignity of history," as it is called, and submit to transcribe a faithful lesson of nature, like one of a less gifted intellect.

We can scarcely imagine a thing much more pleasant indeed, to an artist, than to be brought face to face with some famous person, and permitted to examine and scrutinize his features, with that careful and intense curiosity that seems necessary to the perfecting a likeness. It must have been to Raffaele, at once a relaxation from his ordinary study, and a circumstance interesting in itself, thus to look into faces so full of meaning as those of Julius and Leo—and to say, "That look—that glance, which seems so transient, will I fix for ever. Thus shall he be seen, with that exact expression—although it lasted but for an instant—five hundred years after he shall be dust and ashes!"

This was probably the feeling of Raffaele; and it must have been with a somewhat similar pride that our excellent artist, Mr. Leslie, accomplished his portrait of Sir Walter Scott, which the reader will have already admired in the print-shops. It is surely a perfect work. No one, who has once seen the great author, can forget that strange and peculiar look—so full of meaning and shrewd and cautious observation—so entirely characteristic, in short, of the mind within—which Mr. Leslie has succeeded in catching. One may gaze on it for ever, and contemplate an exhaustless subject—all that the capacious imagination has produced, and is producing—the populous, endless world of fancy.

Let the reader look, and be assured that there is the strange spirit that has discovered and wrought all the fine shapes that he has been accustomed to look upon with wonder—Claverhouse, and Burley, and Bothwell—Meg Merrilies and Elspeth—the high and the low—the fierce and the fair—cavaliers and covenanted, and the rest—presenting an assemblage of character that is absolutely unequalled, except in the pages of Shakspeare alone. There is no other writer, be he Greek, or Goth, or Roman, who has ever astonished the world by creations so infinitely diversified. The mind of the author appears so free from egotism, so large and serene, so clear of all images of self, that it receives, as in a lucid mirror, all the varieties of nature. It was thus that the greatest and rarest of all poets was enabled to perform his wonderful task. Thus free from egotism and turbid vanity was Shakspeare himself. And thus, we may prophesy, must every author be, who shall succeed in stirring the hearts of men by dint of example only.

A NEW INVENTION.

It is said in a letter from Paris, that much encouragement is given to the following new invention for heating rooms:—"A piece of quick-lime dipped into water, and shut hermetically into a box constructed for the purpose, gives almost a purgatorial heat, and prevents the necessity of fire during the winter."

THE ESSAYIST.

THE PAINTER'S REVELATION.

"I CANNOT paint it!" exclaimed Duncan Weir, as he threw down his pencil in despair.

The portrait of a beautiful female rested on his easel. The head was turned as if to look into the painter's face, and an expression of delicious confidence and love was playing about the half-parted mouth. A mass of luxuriant hair, stirred by the position, threw its shadow upon a shoulder that but for its transparency you would have given to llys, and the light from which the face turned away fell on the polished throat with the rich mellowness of a moon-beam. She was a brunette—her hair of a glossy black, and the blood melting through the clear brown of her cheek, and sleeping in her lip like colour in the edge of a rose. The eye was unfinished. He could not paint it. Her low, expressive forehead, and the light pencil of her eyebrows, and the long, melancholy lashes, were all perfect; but he had painted the eye a hundred times, and a hundred times he had destroyed it, till, at the close of a long day, as his light failed him, he threw down his pencil in despair, and resting his head on his easel, gave himself up to the contemplation of the ideal picture of his fancy.

I wish all my readers had painted a portrait, the portrait of the face they best love to look on—it would be such a chance to thrill them with a description of the painter's feelings. There is nothing but the first timid kiss that has half its delirium. Why—think of it a moment! To sit for hours gazing into the eyes you dream of! To be set to steal away the tint of the lip and the glory of the brow you worship! To have beauty come and sit down before you, till its spirit is breathed into your fancy, and you can turn away and paint it! To call up, like a rash enchanter, the smile that bewilders you, and have power over the expression of a face, that, meet you where it will, laps you in Elysium! Make me a painter, Pythagoras!

A lover's picture of his mistress, painted as she exists in his fancy, would never be recognised. He would make little of features and complexion. No—he has not been an idolater for this. He has seen her as no one else has seen her, with the illumination of love, which, once in her life, makes every woman under heaven an angel of light. He knows her heart, too—its gentleness, its fervour; and when she comes up in his imagination, it is not her visible form passing before his mind's eye, but the apparition of her invisible virtues, clothed in the tender recollections of their discovery and development. If he remembers her features at all, it is the changing colour of her cheek, or the droop of her curved lashes, or the witchery of the smile that welcomed him. And even then he was intoxicated with her voice—always a sweet instrument when the heart plays upon it—and his eye was good for nothing. No—it is no matter what she may be to others—she appears to him like a bright and perfect being, and he would as soon paint St. Cecilia with a wart, as his mistress with an imperfect feature.

Duncan could not satisfy himself. He painted with his heart on fire, and he threw by canvass after canvass till his room was like a gallery of angels. In perfect despair, at last, he sat down and made a deliberate copy of her features—the exquisite picture of which we have spoken. Still, the eye haunted him. He felt as if it would redeem all if he could give it the expression with which it looked back some of his impassioned declarations. His skill, however, was, as yet, baffled, and it was at the close of the third day of unsuccessful effort that he relinquished it in despair, and, dropping his head upon his easel, abandoned himself to his imagination.

Duncan entered the gallery with Helen leaning on his arm. It was thronged with visitors. Groups were collected before the favourite pictures, and the low hum of criticism rose confusedly, varied, now and then, by the exclamation of some enthusiastic spectator. In a conspicuous part of the room hung "The Mute Reply, by Duncan Weir." A crowd had gathered before it, and were gazing on it with evident pleasure. Expressions of surprise and admiration broke frequently from the group, and, as they fell on the ear of Duncan, he felt an irresistible impulse to approach and look at his own picture. What is like the affection of a painter for the offspring of his genius? It seemed to him as if he had never before seen it. There it hung like a new picture, and he dwelt upon it with all the interest of a stranger. It was indeed beautiful. There was a bewitching loveliness floating over the features. The figure and air had a peculiar grace and freedom; but the eye showed the genius of the master. It was a large, lustrous eye, moistened without weeping, and lifted up, as if to the face of a lover, with a look of indescribable tenderness. The deception was wonderful. It seemed every moment as if the moisture would gather into a tear, and roll down her cheek. There was a strange freshness in its impression upon Duncan. It seemed to have the very look that had sometimes beamed upon him in the twilight. He turned from it and looked at Helen. Her eyes met his with the same—the self-same expression of the picture. A murmur of pleased recognition stole from the crowd, whose attention was attracted. Duncan burst into tears—and awoke. He had been dreaming on his easel!

"Do you believe in dreams, Helen?" said Duncan, as he led her into the studio the next day, to look at the finished picture.

AMERICAN BIOGRAPHY.

ROBERT FULTON.

THIS celebrated civil engineer was born in the town of Little Britain, in the county of Lancaster, Pennsylvania, in the year 1765. His father died when he was only three years of age. After receiving an English education, he was placed with a jeweller in Lancaster, with the intention of acquiring the trade. This pursuit, however, did not prevent him from cultivating and exercising his talent for painting, which he afterwards pursued with great success. With the advice of his numerous friends, he made a visit to London, and placed himself under the direction of Mr. West: he immediately became an inmate of that gentleman's house, and very soon, his companion and friend. The friendship thus formed, subsisted, unabated, until the death of Fulton.

For some years after leaving the family of Mr. West, he employed himself as a painter. He did not, however, feel himself entirely satisfied with his progress in the art, and was, at length, wholly withdrawn from its further cultivation, by his ruling taste for the mechanic arts.

As early as the year 1793, he brought forward his project of propelling boats by steam, with much confidence; and in September following, he communicated his ideas on steam navigation to Lord Stanhope, who acknowledged it by letter, dated October, 1794.

In 1794, the British government granted him patents for a double-inclined plane, to be used in transportation; for a machine for spinning flax; and another for making ropes, &c. &c.

In the year 1796, he submitted to the British board of agriculture a plan for the improvement of canal navigation, which was favourably received, and for which he received a patent in the year 1797. He then went to France, with a view to introduce it into that country.

In 1798, pursuing this interesting subject with great zeal, he published a series of letters, addressed to Earl Stanhope, in which he clearly exhibits the advantages to nations arising from canals and home improvements generally, simple taxation and free trade.

On his arrival at Paris, a friendship commenced between him and Joel Barlow, which ended only with their lives. At the invitation of Barlow, Fulton took up his residence at the hotel of the former, where he continued to remain during seven years. In this time, he studied the high mathematics, physics, chymistry, and perspective. He also acquired the French, Italian, and German languages.

Barlow, about this time, was preparing for the press his elegant edition of the Columbiad, which he afterwards dedicated in terms of glowing affection to Fulton. The splendid plates which adorn this work were executed under the superintendence of Fulton.

In December, 1797, he made his first experiment on submarine explosion on the river Seine, in company with Barlow.

In December, 1806, he returned to this city, and immediately recommenced his experiments on sub-marine war. He also directed his attention to steam navigation.

After several successful experiments, he published, in 1810, his interesting work, entitled "Torpedo War," which contains a full account and clear explanation of his system. At the earnest solicitation of the honourable R. R. Livingston, who had pointed out to him the incalculable advantages which would arise out of a perfect system of steam-navigation, had the desired effect of arousing the energies of his genius to a subject which he had not bestowed much attention upon since the year 1793.

After his return to the United States, in 1806, he and Mr. Livingston commenced building a steam-boat called the "Clermont," which afterwards navigated the Hudson at the rate of five miles per hour. From this memorable era in the life of Mr. Fulton, the art of navigating by steam continued to advance towards perfection, and the last boat built under his direction was better than any that had preceded it.

On the breaking out of the late war, he again turned his attention to his favourite project of sub-marine warfare, and after various successful experiments, obtained, in 1813, a patent for a "sub-marine battery."

It was from his sub-marine battery that he conceived the plan of the "steam man-of-war."

This invention was readily patronized by government, and in March, 1814, a law was passed to build one; the cost estimated at three hundred and twenty thousand dollars. He was appointed the engineer; and, in little more than four months from the laying of the keel, she was launched under the name of "Fulton the First." Since her equipment, she is allowed to be the most formidable engine for warfare that human ingenuity has ever contrived.

The last work on which he was engaged was a modification of his sub-marine boat; her model was approved, and he had received the sanction of the executive to construct one at New-York; but unfortunately his country had to lament his death before he had completed it. He terminated his valuable life on the 24th of February, 1815, a martyr to his efforts in the cause of science.

Mr. Fulton was about six feet high. His person was slender, but well-proportioned and well-formed. His features were strong, and of manly beauty.

In all his domestic and social relations, he was zealous, kind, generous, liberal, and affectionate. He knew of no use for money, but as it was subservient to charity, hospitality, and the sciences. At the time of his death, he was a member of the principal literary and scientific societies in the United States.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

THE HAIR.

This "grand feature of the human countenance," as it is denominated on the labels which are affixed to the bottles of genuine Macassar oil, has not occupied, according to Monsieur Cuvier, the celebrated naturalist, that rank to which it is entitled in zoological treatises. He considers the system with which the hair is connected, as analogous to that of the senses, and even as forming a part of it. To substantiate his doctrine, he adduces the fact, that in many animals the hairs are a very delicate organ of perception. The slightest impression—even that produced by a hair from the human head—is sufficient to make a cat, for example, contract her skin and cause it to tremble, as she always does to rid it of slight bodies resting on the back, and of the presence of which she seems to be apprised through the medium of this peculiar sense of touch.

These speculations, however, upon the hair cannot be particularly amusing, to one portion of our readers at least. To them, hair is only interesting when lopped from one head and transferred to another. Perhaps some of them would like to know the process by which this important article of the toilet is prepared for use, and with an apology to friseurs and curl-twisters for interfering in a matter which belongs to their province, we will detail the particulars. If it is a little too red to be classed with the auburn locks, or too gray for common wear, it is first washed clean and then thoroughly moistened with a solution of silver in aqua-fortis. On drying it in the sun, it becomes a rich brown or black. Hence it appears that the white locks of age, unseemly as they may appear, may be doomed to decorate the brow of sweet "sixteen." If the hair does not curl naturally, and persists, in spite of all ordinary applications, in retaining a puritanical straightness, it receives the following harsh treatment: first, it is boiled most furiously in an iron pot, about as long as one would stew a lobster. Then they take it from the cauldron, dispose it in parcels of equal length, roll it up on little earthen cylinders which are hollowed out. Again it is condemned to the hot water for two hours; after which, they dry it carefully, and spread it out on sheets of brown paper, which are committed to the pastry-cook. It is then enclosed in pie-crust and deposited in the oven. When the paste is three-quarters done, the hair is ready to be woven into bands and fillets of curls; but as to the final destination of the pie-crust, we cannot positively speak.

POETRY, MUSIC, AND PAINTING.

Poetry breathes a charm over the cold realities of life, and imparts a brilliant colouring to every object that surrounds us, and an interest to the most trivial incidents that occur. Seen through her glowing medium, earth is paradise, and love is heaven. Music etherealizes humanity, and lifts the soul to its original sphere; with a powerful hand she strikes the sensitive chords of memory, awakening alike the thrilling recollection of former enjoyments, or the mournful remembrance of past sorrow. But Painting possesses the power of an enchautress; beneath her magic pencil spring those forms which are endeared to us by love, or rendered sacred by esteem and reverence. Over these cherished shadows death hath no power! we wear them in our bosoms, we place them in our closets, and enjoy with them a sweet and holy communion in our hours of retirement. As relics of those who sleep in the dust, they seem to confer with us in the language of other years; and while we remember some useful precept of friendly monition which once passed their lips, we regard them as benignant spirits still hovering in our paths, to remind us of our duty, and that we are also perishable.

Mrs. Ware.

TURKISH WOMEN.

The Turkish women—says Mr. Embury—are beautiful, though their beauty is of a different character from that of European females. Their eyes are blue and bland, their hair luxuriant, their faces fresh and rosy, and their persons possess great symmetry of proportion. I accompanied a German merchant, at Raffia, in the Crimea, to the mart of slaves, where an Armenian had exposed for sale two Circassian girls of the most exquisite loveliness. We feigned an intention of purchasing them, in order to gratify our curiosity and ascertain the mode of conducting such inhuman sales. The maidens were introduced to us one after another. Their deportment was graceful and modest to diffidence. The first girl presented was in her sixteenth year. She was elegantly dressed, and her face was covered with a veil, through which her blue eyes, as well as neck and shoulders—which rivalled the Parian marble in whiteness—shone like stars piercing a black cloud. She advanced towards the German, bowed down, and kissed his hand; then, at the command of her master, she walked backward and forward in the tent to show her fine figure, and the easiness of her carriage; she then raised her robe, so as to show the beautiful delicacy of a foot that would have charmed a Praxiteles. When she took off her veil, our eyes were dazzled with the surpassing loveliness of her face, in which the lily and the rose were blended on the cheeks of blooming youthfulness. Her tresses, as black as ebony, fell carelessly over her bust; and when she smiled—for smile she did, and appeared much pleased with the exhibition—she discovered teeth of a dazzling whiteness and enamel. She rubbed her cheeks with a wet napkin, to prove that she had not used art to improve or heighten the bloom of her complexion. We were permitted to feel her pulse, that we might be convinced of the good state of her health and constitution. She then retired with all the agility of one of Diana's nymphs coming out of the fountain. Her attractive charms won the heart of my German friend, who purchased this lovely girl for four thousand piasters.

TO KINDLE A COAL FIRE.

Let the stove or grate be empty, or nearly so; put in a few blocks of dry wood, or a handful or two of charcoal in the bottom, set fire to these, and cover them over with lumps of coal about the size of a walnut; shut the stove door, or put up the blower, and in five minutes the whole will be ignited, when the stove or grate is to be filled up with coal. If the grate is of a proper size, and the draught properly regulated, a supply of coal every twelve hours will keep the fire from going out from one year's end to the other. No person need, unless he chooses, let his fire go out more than once in a year. We will take this opportunity of correcting an error which seems to be generally entertained, that coal requires a very powerful draught to keep it in a state of ignition. After it is once ignited, nearly the reverse is the fact. It requires a quick draught at first, until the fire is lighted, that is, if you are in haste to have the room warm, but not otherwise, and then the draught necessary to ignite a wood fire is amply sufficient for one made of anthracite coal. There ought to be some mode of quickening the draught in every convenience for using stove coal, for the facility of speedily kindling and increasing the fire; but when the fire is once ignited, no more draught ought to be applied to it than will keep the coal in lively combustion. There are but few chimneys which have not more draught than is necessary. One other matter ought to be observed; the bottom of the grate should not be more than four or five inches from the floor.

WOMAN.

Governor Metcalfe, of Kentucky, in his late message to the state legislature, recommends that public provision should be made in that state for the education of females. "In every age, and in every clime—he remarks—man, in the exercise of his dominion over his companion, has made it extremely difficult for her to rise with himself in the scale of intelligence. Among the barbarous and uncivilized, how cheerless is her condition! How degraded by the decree of the Mussulman! In every quarter of the world, how hopeless are her prospects, except it be under the auspices, and in the bosom of a Christian community! It may, to his honour, besaid of the Christian, that he has done much for the improvement and melioration of her condition; and in doing so, he has contributed little less to his own, than to her happiness. It is true that she acts her part in the shade of domestic retirement. She is not often an active agent in the perils of war. Her voice is not heard in our senates. But this detracts nothing from the importance of her station. Her place in life is one of high, if not awful responsibility. We are indebted to her for our first, and frequently for our best impressions. In susceptible childhood, while we are looking up to her as the most pure and the most perfect, as she is sure to be the most beloved of created beings, she imparts to us our first lessons of morality and religion. The wild and irregular passions of fantastic infancy are subjected to her soft and endearing control. In riper years she exercises no small degree of influence over us; and in the dreary winter of our days, she sustains us by her fortitude, whilst from her kindness and fidelity we draw the last and greatest of all our earthly consolations. Surely her mind should be cultivated and adorned by the instruction and the grace of a systematic education. Will not the legislature of Kentucky confer upon their state the honour of having taken the first step for the promotion of this desirable object? The act, I am persuaded, will be hailed with delight by the present and succeeding generations."

AN OLD BOY.

An old bachelor, upwards of eighty years of age, recently died in Paris, worth three millions of francs. He always appeared in garments that were thread-bare, scarcely allowed himself the food necessary to keep himself alive, and frequently went to a small cafe, to save the expense of fire. Perhaps the next accounts from Paris will bring us this story in the shape of a drama.

ELSIE WHIPPLE.

This wretched woman was married, a few evenings since, at New-Brunswick, New-Jersey, to Mr. Nathan Freeman. They were schoolmates in their younger days.

LITERARY NOTICES.

OUR readers will be gratified to learn that the following popular works are in press, and will be speedily republished in this city:

- "The Disowned;" by the author of Pelham;
- "Trials of Life;" by the author of De Lisie;
- "Tales of St. Bernard;" by the author of Salathiel;
- "The Protestant;" by the author of the White Hoods;
- "The Man of Two Lives;"
- "Life in India;"
- "Nollekins and his Times," and the
- "Literary Remains of the late Henry Neele."

TO A DEPARTED SPIRIT.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

From the bright stars, or from the viewless air,
Or from some world, unreach'd by human thought,
Spirit, sweet spirit! if thy home be there,
And if thy vision with the past be fraught,
Answer me, answer me!

Have we not communed here, of life and death!
Have we not said that love, such love as ours,
Was not to perish, as a rose's breath,
To melt away, like song from festal bowers?
Answer, oh! answer me!

Thine eye's last light was mine—the soul that shone
Intensely, mournfully, through gathering haze;
Didst thou bear with thee, to the shore unknown,
Nought of what lived in that long, earnest gaze?
Hear, hear, and answer me!

Thy voice—its low, soft, fervent, farewell tone
Thrilled through the tempest of the parting strife,
Like a faint breeze—oh! from that music flown
Send back one sound, if love's be quenchless life!
But answer, oh! answer me!

In the still noontide, in the sunset's hush,
In the dead hour of night, when thought grows deep;
When the heart's phantoms from the darkness rush,
Fearfully beautiful, to strive with sleep;
Spirit! then answer me!

By the remembrance of our blended prayer;
By all our tears, whose mingling made them sweet;
By our last hope, the victor o'er despair;
Speak!—if our souls in deathless yearnings meet,
Answer me, answer me!

The grave is silent—and the far-off sky,
And the deep midnight:—silent all, and lone!
Oh! if thy buried love make no reply,
What voice has earth? Hear, pity, speak! mine own!
Answer me, answer me!

THE TRAVELLER.

A SKETCH OF RUSSIAN MANNERS.

AN amusing anecdote, illustrative of Russian manners, is told by a gentleman who has recently travelled in the north of Europe. An officer in the prime of manhood, of high rank in the Russian army, was appointed by the emperor Alexander to the command of a remote province of the empire. On his arrival at the chief town of his government, he was visited by the nobility and great officers of the district, and among the rest by a certain count, whom he recognised as one of his old class-mates at a military school, where they had parted in hostility, on account of an insult received by the count, which he had not courage to resent. Of all the visitors, this count was the most overpowering in his civilities. Meeting the governor as one whom he had never seen before, he endeavoured to give the impression that they had always been strangers to each other. To his new ruler he spoke as if he had no remembrance of his person or name, and played his part so well, that the former was almost convinced that the youthful quarrel had escaped his recollection. Knowing, however, the duration of Russian resentment, the governor prudently resolved to be upon his guard. Still every thing continued to proceed smoothly, and the smiles and civilities of the count continued to be lavished upon his old enemy, and nothing occurred to awaken suspicion or to cloud their mutual courtesies. At length the count appointed a day for giving a great fete at his castle. This castle was situated on a rough and difficult tract of country, protected by mountainous defiles, yet but a few miles distant from the head quarters of the governor. To this castle his excellency was invited to attend the feast, which was to be adorned with all the splendour and magnificence of the Russian noblesse. He accepted the invitation; but, after he had done so, was visited by certain doubts as to the sincerity of his host, notwithstanding the complete oblivion to which a period of twenty years had apparently consigned the resentment of the count. He took the precaution, therefore, to order a body of dragoons, twenty of whom should be provided with stirrup-leathers or leather thongs, to follow him privately, and when the clock should strike nine, to close around the castle, while the subaltern officer in command proceeded to report himself to him, wherever he might be. To this officer the orders were strict. No matter when, how, or about what, the governor might be engaged when the clock struck nine, the officer must be in his presence, and ready to receive his commands. Giving these orders, the governor repaired to the fete. He was received with great politeness, and greeted with every demonstration of respect. The halls were decked with oriental magnificence. Barbaric pearl and gold were literally showered upon the splendid draperies of the ample halls, and the dresses of the ladies glittered with jewelry. Rich music, formed by a concert of horns—on which each performer is taught to sound only a single note, so that there must be as many performers as there are notes in the gamut, in order to play a single tune, and an immense number to compose a band—was pouring forth its inspiring harmony. Plumes were nodding, bright eyes were glancing, generous wines were sparkling, every thing was in accordance with festivity and joy. Still the governor observed, that, of all the guests, whether ladies or the noblemen, not one was present who was not connected by blood or marriage with the lord of the castle. He gave himself up to the fascinations of the scene, however; enjoyed the splendid arrangements; suffered himself to be led from the grand saloon to the library; from the library to the picture hall; from the pictures to the cabinet of genius, through the variety of apartments which had been prepared for the gratification of a refined and luxurious taste, until, at length, he observed, that of those who had attended him there were only six who remained, all the nearest blood-relations to the count.

His ease of manner continued, and he moved forward with them toward the cabinet of minerals, when, as he was passing through a smaller apartment, the doors were suddenly shut and fastened, and himself seized and bound at once, without the slightest notice of the intention. His doubt then became a very unsatisfactory certainty. The count now proclaimed his hatred, reminded him of their ancient quarrel, and proceeded, with the assistance of his kinsmen, to inflict a severe flagellation.

After gratifying their malignity with this infliction, the count and his kinsmen directed their guest to return to the dancing-room, and display his disgrace to the company by dancing till supper time. The governor, who had not from the first betrayed the slightest expression of suffering, walked with a firm step, and a manner not the least confused, to the ball-room, and, accosting one of the ladies, desired the honour of her hand for the dance. The lady only laughed in his face. He tried another—and another—with the same success. The shrill voice of female derision, and the sneers, and jests, and ridicule of the gentlemen, were heard throughout the apartment, "coward and cowskin," and a variety of other juxtapositions, were bandied about with great alacrity. Still the composure of the high-bred governor was imperturbable. He had now asked the hand of every lady in the room but one, whom he had purposely omitted till the last, for she was the loveliest of them all, and had a sweet and compassionate expression of countenance, and did not join in the general laugh, and looked as if she could not have the heart to wound the feelings of a slave. To this lady he now advanced, and begged that she would honour him so much as to be his partner in the merry ring. She consented, and he had just led her to commence the waltz, when, as his features were beginning, for the first time, to assume an appearance of anxiety, the clock struck nine. He listened a moment—he heard nothing—his features grew darker—he listened again, and the heavy tramp of a dragon's footsteps greeted his ear. Presently, in marched the fierce and whiskered subaltern; taking his way straight through the bery of ladies and gay noblemen, who shrunk from him in breathless stillness, he proceeded to his master, and making his military salute, awaited his orders. Now, for the first time, the governor's manner changed entirely. His shout rang loud and free—"Let no one leave the castle—guard every gate. Let twenty dragoons advance with their weapons to this room." Then turning to the lady who had consented to dance with him, he committed her to the charge of an officer, to be led to her carriage, and sent home with the greatest respect. For the rest of the company, they were in a sad predicament. The count and his male companions were seized by the dragoons, and flogged severely with the stirrup-leathers. After undergoing this discipline, all the ladies and gentlemen were compelled to dance till supper time, for the gratification of the governor, who had already been exhorted by them to go through the same exercise for their own particular amusement. When the dance was done, the governor departed, telling the company that he hoped they were satisfied with their entertainment.

TALES OF OUR VILLAGE.

FANNY'S FAIRINGS.

BY MISS MITFORD.

A HAPPY boy was Thomas Stokes, of Upton Lea, last May morning: he was to go to B—fair, with his eldest brother William, and his cousin Fanny, and he never closed his eyes all night for thinking of the pleasure he should enjoy on the morrow. Thomas, "for shortness called" Tom, was a lively, merry boy, of nine years old, rising ten, as the horse-dealers say, and had never been at a fair in his life; so that his sleeplessness, as well as the frequent soliloquies of triumphant "ho! ho!"—his usual exclamation when highly pleased—and the perpetual course of broad smiles, in which his delight had been vented for a week before, were nothing remarkable. His companions were as wakeful and happy as himself. Now that might be accounted for in his cousin's case, since it was also her first fair; for Fanny, a pretty dark-eyed lass of eighteen, was a Londoner, and, till she arrived that winter on a visit to her aunt, had never been out of the sound of Bow bell; but why William, a young fellow of one-and-twenty, to whom fairs were so familiar, why he should lose his sleep on the occasion, is less easy to discover—perhaps from sympathy. Through Tom's impatience, the party were early astir; indeed, he had roused the whole house long before daybreak; and betimes in the forenoon they set forth on their progress; Tom, in a state of spirits that caused him to say "Ho! ho!" every minute, and much endangered the new hat that he was tossing in the air; William and Fanny, with a more concentrated and a far quieter joy. One should not see a finer young couple: he, decked in his Sunday attire, tall, sturdy, and muscular, with a fine open countenance, and an air of rustic gallantry that became him well; she, pretty and modest, with a look of gentility about her plain dark gown and cottage bonnet, and the little straw basket that she carried in her hand, which, even more than her ignorance of tree, and bird, and leaf, and flower, proclaimed her town breeding; although that ignorance was such, that Tom declared that on her first arrival at Upton Lea, she did not know an oak from an elm, or a sparrow from a blackbird. Tom himself had yet to learn poor Fanny's excuses, how much oaks and elms resemble each other in the London air, and how very closely in colour, though not in size, a city sparrow approaches to a blackbird.

Their way led through pleasant footpaths; every bank covered with cowslips and blue-bells, and overhung with the budding hawthorn and the tasselled hazel; now between orchards, whose trees, one flush of blossom, rose from amidst beds of daffodils, with their dark waving spear-like leaves and golden flowers; now along fields newly sown with barley, where the doves and wood-pigeons, pretty innocent thieves! were casting a glancing shadow on the ground as they flew from furrow to furrow, picking up the freshly planted grain; and now between close lanes peopled with nightingales; until at last they emerged into the gay high road, where their little party fell into the flood of people pouring on to the fair, much after the manner in which a tributary brooklet is lost in the waters of some mighty stream.

A mingled stream in good sooth it was, a most motley procession! Country folks in all varieties, from the pink-ribboned maiden, the belle of her parish, tripping along so merrily, to the sober and demure village matron, who walked beside her with a slow lagging pace, as if tired already; from the gay Lothario of the hamlet, with his clean smock-frock, and his hat on one side, who strutted along, ogling the lass in the pink ribbons, to the "grave and reverend signor," the patriarch of the peasantry, with his straight white hair and his well-preserved wedding suit, who hobbled stoopingly on, charged with two great grandchildren—a sprightly girl of six lugging him forward, a lumpy boy of three dragging him back. Children were there of all conditions, from "mamma's darlings," in the coronet carriage—the little lords and ladies, to whom a fair was, as yet, only a "word of power"—down to the brown gipsy urchins strapped on their mother's back, to whom it was a familiar sight—no end to the children! no end to the grown people! no end to the vehicles! Carts crammed as full as they could be stowed; gigs with one, two, three and four inside passengers; wagons laden with men instead of corn; droves of pigs; flocks of sheep; herds of cattle; strings of horses; with their several drovers, and drivers of all kinds and countries—English, Irish, Welch, and Scotch—all bound to the fair. Here an Italian boy with his tray of images; there a Savoyard with her hurdy-gurdy; and lastly, struggling through the midst of the throng, that painful minister of pleasure, an itinerant showman, with his box of puppets and his tawdry wife, pushing, and toiling, and straining every nerve for fear of being too late. No end to the people! no end to the din! The turnpike-man opened his gate and shut his ears in despairing resignation. Never was known so full a May-fair.

And amongst the thousands assembled in the market-place at B—, it would have been difficult to find a happier group than our young cousins. Tom, to be sure, had been conscious of a little neglect on the part of his companions. The lectures on ornithology, with which, chemin faisant, he had thought fit to favour Fanny—children do dearly love to teach grown people, and all country boys are learned in birds—had been rather thrown away on that fair damsel. William and she had walked arm-in-arm; and when he tried to join them on one side, he found himself cast off—and when on the other, let go. Poor Tom was, evidently, de trop in the party. However, he bore the affront like a philosopher, and soon forgot his grievances in the solid luxuries of tarts and gingerbread; in the pleasant business of purchasing and receiving petty presents; in the chatter, the bustle, and the merriment of the fair. Amidst all his delight, however, he could not but feel a little curiosity, when William, having lured him to a stall, and fixed him there in the interesting occupation of selecting a cricket-ball, persuaded Fanny to go under his escort to make some private purchases at the neighbouring shops. Tom's attention to his own important bargain was sadly distracted by watching his companions as they proceeded from the linen-draper's to the jeweller's, and from the jeweller's to the pastry-cook's; looking, the whilst, the one proud and happy, the other shy and ashamed. Tom could not tell what to make of it, and chose, in his perplexity, the very worst ball that was offered to him; but as he had seen their several parcels snugly deposited in the straw basket, he summoned courage to ask, point blank, what it contained; at which question Fanny blushed, and William laughed; and on a repetition of the inquiry, answered, with an arch smile, "Fanny's fairings." Now, as Fanny had before purchased toys, and cakes, and such like trifles, for the whole family, this reply, and the air with which it was delivered, served rather to stimulate than to repress the vague suspicions that were floating in the boy's brain. A crowd, however, is no place for impertinent curiosity. Loneliness and ennui are necessary to the growth of that weed. If there had been a fair in Bluebeard's castle, his wives would have kept their heads on their shoulders; the blue chamber and the diamond key would have tempted in vain. So Tom betook himself to the enjoyment of the scene before him, applying himself the more earnestly to the business of pleasure, as they were to return to Upton Lea at four o'clock.

Four o'clock arrived, and found our hero, Thomas Stokes, still untired of stuffing and staring. He had eaten more cakes, oranges, and gingerbread, than the gentlest reader would deem credible; and he had seen well nigh all the sights of the fair; the tall man, and the short woman, and the calf with two heads; had attended the in-door horsemanship, and the out-door play; the dancing dogs and two raree shows; and lastly, had visited and admired the wonders of the menagerie, scraped acquaintance with a whole legion of parrots and monkeys, poked up a boar-constrictor, patted a lioness, and had the honour of presenting his blunderbuss to the elephant, although he was not much inclined to boast of this exploit, having been so frightened at his own temerity as to run away out of the booth before the sagacious but deliberate quadruped had found time to fire.

Not a whit tired was Tom. He could have wished the fair to last a week. Nevertheless, he obeyed his brother's summons; and the little party set out on their return, the two elder ones again linked arm-in-arm, and apparently forgetting that the world contained any human being except their own two selves. Poor Tom trudged after, beginning to feel, in the absence of other excitement, a severe relapse of his undefined curiosity respecting Fanny's fairings. On tripped William and Fanny, and after trudged Tom, until a string of unruly horses passing rapidly by, threw the whole group into confusion; no one was hurt, but the pretty Londoner was so much alarmed as to afford her companion ample employment in placing her on a bank, soothing her fears, and railing at the misconduct of the horse-people. As the cavalcade disappeared, the fair damsel recovered her spirits, and began to inquire for her basket, which she had dropped in her terror, and for Tom, who was also missing. They were not far to seek. Perched in the opposite hedge, sat Master Tom, in the very act of satisfying his curiosity by examining her basket, smiling and ho! ho!ing with all his might. Parcel after parcel did he extract and unfold: first a roll of white satin ribbon—"ho! ho!"—then a pair of white cambric gloves—"ho! ho!" again; then a rich-looking, dark-coloured, small plum-cake, nicely frosted with white sugar—"ho! ho! Miss Fanny!"—last of all a plain gold ring, wrapped in three papers, silver, white, and brown—"ho, ho!" once more shouted the boy, twirling the wedding-ring on his own finger, the fourth of the left hand—"so these are Fanny's fairings! Ho! ho!—ho! ho!"

THE REPOSITORY.

ABBOTSFORD,

THE RESIDENCE OF SIR WALTER SCOTT.

"STEPPING westward," as Wordsworth says, "from the hall, you find yourself in a narrow, low, arched room, which runs quite across the house, having a blazoned window again at either extremity, and filled all over with smaller pieces of armour and weapons, such as swords, fire-locks, spears, arrows, darts, daggers, &c. Here are the pieces esteemed most precious by reason of their histories respectively. I saw, among the rest, Rob Roy's gun, with his initials, R. M. C., Robert Macgregor Campbell, engraved upon it; the blunderbuss of Hofer, a present to Sir Walter from his friend Sir Humphrey Davy; a most magnificent sword, as magnificently mounted, the gift of Charles the First to the great Montrose, and having the arms of Prince Henry worked on the hilt; the hunting bottle of Bonnie King Jamie; Bonaparte's pistols—found in his carriage at Waterloo, I believe—cum multis aliis. I should have mentioned that stag-horns and bulls' horns—the petrified relics of the old mountain monster, I mean—and so forth, are suspended in great abundance above all the doorways of these armories; and that, in one corner—a dark one, as it ought to be—there is a complete assortment of the old Scottish instruments of torture, not forgetting the very thumb-screws under which Cardinal Carstairs did not flinch, and the more terrific iron crown of Wiseheart the martyr, being a sort of barred head-piece, screwed on the victim at the stake, to prevent him from crying aloud in his agony.

Beyond the smaller, or rather, I should say, the narrower armory, lies the dining-parlour proper; however, and though there is nothing Udolphoish here, yet I can well believe that, when lighted up and the curtains drawn at night, the place may give no bad notion of the private snuggery of some lofty lord abbot of the time of the Canterbury Tales. The room is a very handsome one, with a low and a very richly carved roof of dark oak again; a huge projecting bow window, and the dais elevated more majorum; the ornaments of the roof, niches for lamps, &c. In short, all the minor details are, I believe, fac similes after Melrose. The walls are hung in crimson, but almost entirely covered with pictures, of which the most remarkable are—the parliamentary general, Lord Essex, a full length on horseback; the Duke of Monmouth, by Lely; a capital Hogarth, by himself; Prior and Gay, both by Jervas; and the head of Mary Queen of Scots, in a charger, painted by Amias Canrood the day after the decapitation at Fotheringay, and sent some years ago as a present to Sir Walter, from a Prussian nobleman, in whose family it had been for more than two centuries. It is a most deathlike performance, and the countenance answers well enough to the coins of the unfortunate beauty, though not at all to any of the portraits I have happened to see. I believe there is no doubt as to the authenticity of this most curious picture. Among various family pictures, I noticed particularly Sir Walter's great-grandfather, the old cavalier mentioned in one of the epistles in Marmion, who let his beard grow after the execution of Charles the First, and who here appears, accordingly, with a most venerable appendage of silver whiteness, reaching even unto his girdle.

A narrow passage leads to a charming breakfast-room, which looks to the Tweed on one side, and towards Yarrow and Etrick, famed in song, on the other: a cheerful room, fitted up with novels, romances, and poetry, I could perceive at one end; and the other walls covered thick and thicker with a most valuable and beautiful collection of water-colour drawings, chiefly by Turner, and Thompson of Duddingstone—the designs, in short, for the magnificent work entitled, "Provincial Antiquities of Scotland." There is one very grand oil-painting over the chimney-piece, Fast-castle, by Thompson, alias, the Wolf's Crag of the Bride of Lammermoor, one of the most majestic and melancholy sea-pieces I ever saw; and some large black-and-white drawings of the vision of Don Roderick, by Sir James Steuart, of Allanbank—whose illustrations of Marmion and Mazeppa you have seen or heard of—are at one end of the parlour. The room is crammed with queer cabinets and boxes, and in a niche there is a bust of old Henry Mackenzie, by Joseph, of Edinburgh. Returning towards the armoury, you have, on one side of a most religious-looking corridor, a small green-house, with a fountain playing before it—the very fountain that, in days of yore, graced the cross of Edinburgh, and used to flow with claret at the coronation of the Stuarts—a pretty design, and a standing monument of the barbarity of modern innovation. From the small armoury you pass, as I said before, into the drawing-room, a large, lofty, and splendid salon, with antique ebony furniture and crimson silk hangings, cabinets, china, and mirrors quantum suff, and some portraits; among the rest, glorious John Dryden, by Sir Peter Lely, with his gray hairs floating about in a most picturesque style, eyes full of wildness, representing the old bard, I take it, in one of those "tremulous moods," in which we have it on record he appeared, when interrupted in the midst of his Alexander's Feast. From this you pass into the largest of all the apartments, the library, which, I must say, is really a noble room. It is an oblong of some fifty feet by thirty, with a projection in the centre, opposite the fire-place, terminating in a grand bow window, fitted up with books also, and in fact constituting a sort of chapel to the church. The roof is of carved oak again—a very rich pattern—I believe chiefly a la Roisin; and the book-cases, which are also of richly carved oak, reach high up the walls all round. The collection amounts, in this room, to some fifteen or twenty thousand volumes, arranged according to their subjects: British history and antiquities filling the whole of the first wall; English poetry and drama, classics and miscellanies, one end; foreign literature, chiefly French and German, the other. The cases on the side opposite the fire are wired and locked, as containing articles very precious and very portable. One consists entirely of books and manuscripts relating to the insurrections of 1716 and 1745; and another—within the recess of the bow window—of treatises de re magica; both of these being, I am told, and can well believe, in their ways, collections of the rarest curiosity. My cicerone pointed out, in one corner, a magnificent set of Mountfaucon, ten volumes folio, bound in scarlet, and stamped with the royal arms, the gift of his present majesty. There are few living authors of whose works presentation copies are not to be found here. My friend showed me inscriptions of that sort in, I believe, every European dialect extant. The books are all in prime condition, and bindings that would satisfy Mr. Dibdin. The only picture is Sir Walter's eldest son, in hussar uniform, and holding his horse, by Allan, of Edinburgh, a noble portrait, over the fire-place; and the only bust is that of Shakspeare, from the Avon monument, in a small niche in the centre of the east side. On a rich stand of porphyry, in one corner, reposes a tall silver urn, filled with bones from the Piræus, and bearing the inscription, "Given by George Gordon, Lord Byron, to Sir Walter Scott, Baronet." It contained the letter which accompanied the gift till lately: it has disappeared; no one guesses who took it, but whoever he was, as my guide observed, he must have been a thief for thieving's sake truly, as he durst no more exhibit his autograph than tip himself a bare bodkin. Sad, infamous tourist, indeed! Although I saw abundance of comfortable-looking desks and arm-chairs, yet this room seemed rather too large and fine for work, and I found accordingly, after passing a double pair of doors, that there was a sanctum within and beyond this library. And here, you may believe, was not to me the least interesting, though by no means the most splendid, part of the suite.

The lion's own den proper, then, is a room of about five and twenty feet square by twenty feet high, containing of what is properly called furniture, nothing but a small writing table in the centre, a plain arm-chair covered with black leather—a very comfortable one though, for I tried it—and a single chair besides, plain symptoms that this is no place for company. On either side of the fire-place there are shelves filled with duodecimos and books of reference, chiefly, of course, folios; but, except these, there are no books, save the contents of a light gallery which runs round three sides of the room, and is reached by a hanging stair of carved oak in one corner. You have been both at the Elisee Bourbon and Malmaison, and remember the library at one or other of those places, I forget which; this gallery is much in the same style. There are only two portraits, an original of the beautiful and melancholy head of Claverhouse, and a small full length of Rob Roy. Various little antique cabinets stand round about, each having a bust on it; Stothard's Canterbury Pilgrims are on the mantel-piece; and in one corner I saw a collection of really useful weapons, those of the forestcraft, to wit—axes and bills, and so forth, of every calibre. There is only one window, pierced in a very thick wall, so that the place is rather sombre; the light tracery work of the gallery overhead harmonizes with the books well. It is a very comfortable-looking room, and very unlike any other I ever was in. I should not forget some highland claymores, clustered round a target over the Canterbury people, nor a writing-box of carved wood, lined with crimson velvet, and furnished with silver-plate of right venerable aspect, which looked as if it might have been the implement of old Chaucer himself, but which, from the arms on the lid, must have belonged to some Italian prince of the days of Leo the Magnificent, at the furthest.

The view of the Tweed from all the principal apartments is beautiful. You look out from among bowers, over a lawn of sweet turf, upon the clearest of all streams, fringed with the wildest of birch woods, and backed with the green hills of Ettrick forest. The rest you must imagine. Altogether, the place destined to receive so many pilgrimages, contains within itself beauties not unworthy of its associations. Few poets ever inhabited such a place; none, ere now, ever created one. It is the realization of dreams: some Frenchman called it, it is said, "a romance in stone and lime."

THE HUMOURIST.

TOO HANDSOME FOR ANY THING.

BY THE AUTHOR OF PELHAM.

MR. FERDINAND FITZROY was a model of perfection. Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy was an only son. He was such an amazing favourite with both his parents that they resolved to ruin him; accordingly, he was exceedingly spoiled, never annoyed by the sight of a book, and had as much plum-cake as he could eat. Happy would it have been for Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy could he always have eaten plum-cake, and remained a child. "Never," says the Greek tragedian, "reckon a mortal happy till you have witnessed his end." A most beautiful creature was Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy! Such eyes—such hair—such teeth—such a figure—such manners, too—and such an irresistible way of tying his neckcloth! When he was about sixteen, a crabbed old uncle represented to his parents the propriety of teaching Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy to read and write. Though not without some difficulty, he convinced them—for he was exceedingly rich, and riches in an uncle are wonderful arguments respecting the nurture of a nephew whose parents have nothing to leave him. So our hero was sent to school. He was naturally—I am not joking now—a very sharp, clever boy; and he came on surprisingly in his learning. The schoolmaster's wife liked handsome children.

"What a genius will Master Ferdinand Fitzroy be, if you take pains with him!" said she to her husband.

"Pooh, my dear, it is of no use to take pains with him."

"And why, love?"

"Because he is a great deal too handsome ever to be a scholar."

"And that's true enough, my dear!" said the schoolmaster's wife.

So, because he was too handsome to be a scholar, Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy remained the lag of the fourth form! They took our hero from school.

"What profession shall he follow?" said his mother.

"My first cousin is the lord chancellor," said his father, "let him go to the bar."

The lord chancellor dined there that day. Mr. Ferdinand was introduced to him. His lordship was a little, rough-faced, beetle-browed, hard-featured man, who thought beauty and idleness the same thing—and a parchment skin the legitimate complexion for a lawyer.

"Send him to the bar!" said he, "no, no, that will never do!—Send him into the army; he is much too handsome to become a lawyer."

"And that's true enough, my lord!" said the mother.

So they bought Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy a cornetcy in the regiment of dragoons.

Things are not learned by inspiration. Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy had never ridden at school, except when he was hoisted; he was, therefore, a very indifferent horseman; they sent him to the riding-school, and every body laughed at him.

"He is a dunce!" said Cornet Horsephiz, who was very ugly.

"A horrid puppy!" said Lieutenant St. Squintem, who was still uglier.

"If he does not ride better, he will disgrace the regiment!" said Captain Rivalhate, who was very good-looking.

"If he does not ride better, we will cut him!" said Colonel Everdrill, who was a wonderful martinet. "I say, Mr. Bumpemwell"—to the riding-master—"make that youngster ride less like a miller's sack."

"Pooh, sir, he will never ride better."

"And why will he not?"

"Bless you, colonel, he is a great deal too handsome for a cavalry officer!"

"True!" said Cornet Horsephiz.

"Very true!" said Lieutenant St. Squintem.

"We must cut him!" said the colonel.

And Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy was accordingly cut.

Our hero was a youth of susceptibility—he quitted the regiment, and challenged the colonel. The colonel was killed!

"What a terrible blackguard is Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy!" said the colonel's relations.

"Very true!" said the world.

The parents were in despair!—They were not rich; but our hero was an only son, and they sponged hard upon the crabbed old uncle!

"He is very clever," said they both, "and may do yet."

So they borrowed some thousands from the uncle, and bought his beautiful nephew a seat in parliament.

Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy was ambitious, and desirous of retrieving his character. He fagged like a dragon—conceded pamphlets and reviews—got Ricardo by heart—and made notes on the English constitution.

He rose to speak.

"What a handsome fellow!" whispered one member.

"Ah, a coxcomb!" said another.

"Never do for a speaker!" said a third, very audibly.

And the gentlemen on the opposite benches sneered and heard!—Impudence is only indigenous in Milesia, and an orator is not made in a day. Discouraged by his reception, Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy grew a little embarrassed.

"Told you so!" said one of his neighbours.

"Fairly broke down!" said another.

"Too fond of his hair to have any thing in his head," said a third, who was considered a wit.

"Hear, hear!" cried the gentlemen on the opposite benches.

Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy sat down—he had not shone; but, in justice, he had not failed. Many a first-rate speaker had begun worse; and many a county member had been declared a phoenix of promise upon half his merit.

"Not so," thought the heroes of corn laws.

"Your Adonises never make orators!" said a crack speaker with a wry face.

"Nor men of business either," added the chairman of a committee, with a face like a kangaroo's.

"Poor devil!" said the civilest of the set. "He's a deuced deal too handsome for a speaker! By Jove, he is going to speak again—this will never do; we must cough him down!"

And Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy was accordingly coughed down.

Our hero was now seven or eight and twenty, handsomer than ever, and the adoration of all the young ladies at Almack's.

"We have nothing to leave you," said the parents, who had long spent their fortune, and now lived on the credit of having once enjoyed it.—"You are the handsomest man in London; you must marry an heiress."

"I will," said Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy.

Miss Helen Convolvulus was a charming young lady, with a hare-lip and six thousand a year. To Miss Helen Convolvulus then our hero paid his addresses.

Heavens! what an uproar her relations made about the matter.

"Easy to see his intentions," said one: "a handsome fortune-hunter, who wants to make the best of his person!"

"Handsome is that handsome does," says another; "he was turned out of the army, and murdered his colonel."

"Never marry a beauty," said a third; "he can admire none but himself."

"Will have so many admirers," said a fourth.

"Make you perpetually jealous," said a fifth.

"Spend your fortune," said a sixth.

"And break your heart," said a seventh.

Miss Helen Convolvulus was prudent and wary. She saw a great deal of justice in what was said; and was sufficiently contented with liberty and six thousand a year, not to be highly impatient for a husband; but our heroine had no aversion to a lover, especially to so handsome a lover as Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy. Accordingly she neither accepted nor discarded him; but kept him on hope, and suffered him to get into debt with his tailor and his coachmaker, on the strength of becoming Mr. Fitzroy Convolvulus.

Time went on, and excuses and delays were easily found; however, our hero was sanguine, and so were his parents. A breakfast at Chiswick and a putrid fever carried off the latter, within one week of each other; but not till they had blessed Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy, and rejoiced that they had left him so well provided for.

Now, then, our hero depended solely upon the crabbed old uncle and Miss Helen Convolvulus:—the former, though a baronet and a satirist, was a banker and a man of business—he looked very distastefully at the Hyperion curls and white teeth of Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy.

"If I make you my heir," said he, "I expect you will continue the bank."

"Certainly, sir!" said the nephew.

"Humph!" grunted the uncle, "a pretty fellow for a banker!"

Debtors grew pressing to Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy, and Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy grew pressing to Miss Helen Convolvulus.

"It is a dangerous thing," said she, timidly, "to marry a man so admired—will you always be faithful?"

"By heaven!" cried the lover—

"Heigho!" sighed Miss Helen Convolvulus, and Lord Rufus Pumlion entering, the conversation was changed.

But the day of the marriage was fixed; and Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy bought a new curricule. By Apollo, how handsome he looked in it! A month before the wedding-day the uncle died. Miss Helen Convolvulus was quite tender in her condolences.

"Cheer up, my Ferdinand," said she; "for your sake, I have discarded Lord Rufus Pumlion."

"Adorable condescension!" cried our hero; "but Lord Rufus Pumlion is only four feet two, and has hair like a peony."

"All men are not so handsome as Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy!" was the reply.

Away goes our hero, to be present at the opening of his uncle's will.

"I leave," said the testator—who, I have before said, was a bit of a satirist—"my share of the bank, and the whole of my fortune, legacies excepted, to"—here Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy wiped his beautiful eyes with a cambric handkerchief, exquisitely brode—"my friend, John Spriggs, an industrious, pains-taking youth, who will do credit to the bank. I did once intend to have made my nephew Ferdinand my heir; but so curling a head can have no talent for accounts. I want my successor to be a man of business, not beauty; and Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy is a great deal too handsome for a banker; his good looks will, no doubt, win him any heiress in town. Meanwhile, I leave him, to buy a dressing-case, a thousand pounds."

"A thousand devils!" said Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy, banging out of the room.

He flew to his mistress. She was not at home. "Lies," says the Italian proverb, "have short legs;" but truths, if they are unpleasant, have terribly long ones! The next day Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy received a most obliging note of dismissal.

"I wish you every happiness," said Miss Helen Convolvulus, in conclusion—"but my friends are right; you are much too handsome for a husband!"

And the week after, Miss Helen Convolvulus became Lady Rufus Punition.

"Alas! sir," said the bailiff, as, a day or two after the dissolution of parliament, he was jogging along with Mr. Ferdinand Fitzroy in a hackney coach, bound to the King's Bench—"Alas! sir, what a pity it is to take so handsome a gentleman to prison!"

PAPER PEAT.

The clerical worthy distinguished far and wide by the above literary cognomen, was, not long ago, the spiritual director of a small parish, a spot now much resorted to as a watering-place by the natives of the "Modern Athens." Its mineral spa is generally believed to be the St. Ronan's Well of the northern magician. The village is delightfully situated on the banks of the Tweed, where its waters are joined by the river Quair. The surrounding scenery is beautifully picturesque, the fine mansion of the Earl of Traquair forming a prominent feature in the landscape. The parish church is a curious old structure; but not such a curiosity as its former worthy occupant, known by the name of Paper Peat. The origin of his being complimented for life with the above facetious title, is attributed to a certain unlucky sermon he preached many years ago. His gude folk held in most orthodox abhorrence all read discourses, and even shuddered at the idea of notes, however brief. They considered this practice as a manifest proof of the incapacity of the minister; and if he really happened to be an able man, it was viewed by them as an unpardonable aggravation, since, by gluing his optics on a few scraps of paper, he lameably and sinfully fettered his gifts and graces, and left no door open for the inpouring of the spirit. The good pastor well knew the extreme dislike his hearers had to the weary bits of paper; but being plagued with a treacherous memory, he was obliged to have recourse to them. In order, however, to elude as much as possible the vigilant eyes of the congregation, he made use of sundry half-sheets of paper, headed, firstly, secondly, thirdly, and so on to the final scrap, containing uses of terror, or encouragement, according as the thunders of Mount Sinai, or the blessings of Mount Zion, happened to predominate in the discourse. These important slips of paper were deposited on the left page of the Bible; and when he had exhausted one, he, in a truly legerdemain style, slid it over to the right page. But, alas! cunning as the poor minister thought himself, he was one fatal day doomed to essay the pangs of complete exposure and lasting mortification. He had got as far as thirdly, when, lo! the indispensable scrap had vanished, as if by the agency of the foul fiend himself. In a state of unspeakable confusion, he thus went on: "Thirdly, my beloved brethren"—a long and awful pause, wound up by an emphatic hem, or rather groan—"I say, my beloved brethren, thirdly—hem, hem. We come now, my dear friends, in the third place—hem, hem, hem"—all the time groping amongst the papers with increasing agitation, and the perspiration breaking upon his poor oblivious brow in agonising drops. The manuscript truant in question had unluckily fallen over the pulpit, where it was picked up by an aud wife, seated, for deafness' sake, on one of the steps. With the aid of her spectacles, she contrived to make out the leading word, and forthwith bawled out, to the infinite discomfiture of the miserable minister, "Dear sir, here's thirdly lying here!"

GENUINE LAZINESS.

A young farmer inspecting his father's concerns in the time of hay and harvest, found a body of the mowers asleep when they should have been at work. "What is this?" cried the youth. "Why, you are so indolent, that I would give a crown to know which is the most lazy among ye." "I am he," cried the one nearest to him, still stretching himself at his ease. "Here then," said the youth, holding out the money. "Oh, Master George, do take the trouble of putting it into my pocket for me."

CONJUGAL GRATITUDE.

Frank Hayman was a dull creature. When he buried his wife, a friend asked why he expended so much on her funeral? "Ah, sir," replied he, "she would have done as much and more for me with pleasure."

GOLDSMITH AND ROUBILLIAC.

Goldsmith thought at one time he could play the flute as well as most men; and at other times, as well as any man living: but in truth he understood not a character in which music is written, and played on that instrument, as many others do, merely by ear. Roubilliac, the sculptor, a merry fellow, once heard him play, and minding to put a trick upon him, pretended to be charmed with his performance, as also that he himself was skilled in the art, and entreated him to repeat the air, that he might write it down. Goldsmith readily consenting, Roubilliac called for paper and scored thereon a few five-line staves, which having done, Goldsmith proceeded to play, and Roubilliac to write; but his writing was only such random notes on the lines and spaces as any one might set down who had ever inspected a page of music. When they had both done, Roubilliac showed the paper to Goldsmith, who looked over it with seeming great attention, said it was very correct, and that if he had not seen him do it, he never could have believed his friend capable of writing music after him.

Lockhart's Coll.

ELEGANT COMPLIMENT.

Mr. Henry Erskine being one day in London, in company with the duchess of Gordon, asked her, "Are we never again to enjoy the honour and pleasure of your grace's society at Edinburgh?" "Oh," said she, "Edinburgh is a vile dull place, I hate it." "Madam," replied the gallant barrister, "the sun might as well say, this is a vile dark morning, I won't rise to-day."

REPARTEE.

The duke of Marlborough drove up to the door of his grace of St. Alban's, at Brighton, the other day, and said to the footman, "My compliments to her grace. I have called to pay my respects." "Tell the fellow," bellowed out the duchess, "I'd rather he'd pay the one thousand pounds he owes me."

Coleman being once asked if he knew Theodore Hook, answered, "Oh, yes: Hook and Eye are old associates."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Judge Hollingsworth.—The Washington Chronicle—an excellent weekly paper, published at the seat of government—contains a brief notice of the late Judge Hollingsworth, of Maryland, a gentleman whose lively conversational powers rendered him the choice guest of many convivial meetings. "Having had the pleasure of his acquaintance," says the writer, "for some time previous to his death, I was enabled to collect many of his brilliant sayings and pungent witticisms, which had been floating about in society. His mind, however, appeared to be so saturated with information on every subject, that perhaps some diligent person in his anecdotal age, may, in reference to a few of the bon mots, apply to him what Sheridan said of Dundas, 'that he was indebted to his memory for his jests, and to his imagination for his facts.' Many of his repartees might figure to advantage along with the most brilliant ones of Norbury, Rogers, or Parr." We have only room for the following:

"Some gentlemen were talking, at the Athenæum, about the number of private memoirs lately published; and it was observed that the authors of these autobiographies must find it a profitable employment. 'Ay,' exclaimed Mr. H., 'and one that shows a great deal of courage.' 'How so?' 'Because they take care to sell their lives as dearly as possible.'"

"According to Symmes' and Reynolds' theory, there is a large opening at each pole. One of the candidates for the Maryland legislature, a few years ago, told the judge he feared that he had little chance of being elected. 'In Mr. Reynolds' opinion,' answered he, 'you are certainly mistaken, for he appears firmly persuaded there is still a great opening at the polls!'"

"An elephant being advertised as newly arrived in some town, it was asked if he was to remain any time. 'I suppose so,' gravely answered Mr. H., 'for I observed he brought a very large trunk with him.'"

"On board one of the steamboats there was a very beautiful girl, whose comeliness and grace attracted much attention. When the bell rang for the passengers to pay their money, a stranger asked what it was for, and was told it was the bell for the money. 'No,' said Mr. H. pointing to the girl, 'there is the belle for the money.'"

"A couple of gentlemen left Baltimore to fight a duel. There was considerable anxiety to know the event, which proved fatal to one of the parties. Mr. H. who had heard the news, was passing a group who were hazarding conjectures about the probable termination of the affair. 'Gentlemen,' said he, 'the thing now admits of no doubt—but is reduced to a dead certainty.'"

"In a company which Mr. H. was enlivening by his wit, was a gentleman whose ruling passion was hunting, and whose conversation among the young men, who were his chief companions, turned generally on guns, pointers, and 'all that sort of thing.' When he left the room, the judge observed—"The whole of that fellow's business in this world appears to be to teach the young idea how to shoot."

Cobbett's directions to young men who wish to accomplish much.—"Be sober—be abstinent—rise at four in the morning, and retire to bed at eight in the evening." The last advice he insists on more than the first. This singular man asserts that the best articles he ever composed were written before ten in the morning. He denies that the lamp ever shines auspiciously on literary efforts. It was a favourite maxim of George Frederick Cooke, that no man could be great unless he rose from his bed two hours earlier than his neighbours—a maxim, by-the-by, he seldom practised himself, however warmly or sincerely he may have advocated it.

Music for the Flute.—Bourne, in Broadway, has just published a music case, fitted for the pocket, containing a great variety of airs for the flute. It is a new thing, very ingeniously conceived and neatly executed. Each piece of music is on a small coloured card. It is well worth the attention of musicians and amateurs.

Zillah; a Tale of the Holy City.—The Messrs. Harpers have just published a neat edition of this superior work. It is by the author of "Brambletye House," the "Tor Hill," "Reuben Apsley," &c. It needs no other recommendation.

A Female Clerk.—We learn, from the Exeter Post, that, in the village of Misterton, a woman, named Mary Munderford, has officiated in church, as clerk and sexton, upwards of twenty years, to the great satisfaction of the parishioners; and this, together with the making of bread-puddings, for which she has a constant demand in the surrounding country, affords her a comfortable maintenance.

Love and its effects.—A young lady of respectable connexions and the pride of her circle, in one of the towns of Massachusetts, committed suicide a few days since. She rose from her bed in the silence of the night and threw herself into a neighbouring pond. The Boston Traveller says, it is understood that the "sad impulse of disappointed affection led to this melancholy catastrophe."

A new Comedy.—The late English papers state that Mr. Canning left a comedy, in five acts, upon the plan of the School for Scandal, which is now in the hands of a noble family to which he was allied.

The Original.—Miss Whipple, the editor of a new paper, called the Original, published at the village of Pawtucket, is said to be a young lady of considerable talents and taste. She is very industrious, and writes with ease and facility. "Will the time ever come?" asks Mr. Noah—"when the press will be managed altogether by the fair sex?"

To-day's Paper.—This number of the Mirror forcibly reminds us of Mr. Barker's reply to the publisher who called on him for a preface to the "Lady of the Lake," dramatized by Mr. B. from Sir Walter Scott's poem of the same name. "I have," said he, "merely made a garland of culled flowers, and have brought nothing of my own, except the thread that ties them." This is precisely the case with our paper of to-day, it being made up principally of selections—not even the editorial head having been entirely supplied by the—editorial head. Now, be it understood, this circumstance is not owing to any lack of original matter; for we have more—in quantity—than we can publish, and much—in quality—that we will not publish. "We hold this truth to be self-evident," that good selections "are, and of right ought to be," preferred to bad originals; and as we cannot—this week—display an entire new set of diamonds, we have ventured—for the sake of variety—to make our appearance with a second-hand selection of the very first water. In conclusion, it is fair to state, that since we arranged them for the present occasion, several of our contemporaries have worn them in public in this very

THE MAID OF LANGOLLEN.

AS SUNG BY MR. BARCLAY, AT THE LATE CONCERT OF THE EUTERPIAN SOCIETY, AT THE CITY-HOTEL.

NEVER BEFORE PUBLISHED IN AMERICA.

Though low-ly my lot; and though poor my estate, I see with-out en-vy the weal-thy and great; Con-tent-ed and proud a poor shepherd to be, While the maid of Langollen smiles sweet-ly on me, While the maid of Lah-gol-len smiles sweet-ly on me.

Though lowly my lot, and though poor my estate,
I see without envy the wealthy and great;
Contented and proud a poor shepherd to be,
While the maid of Langollen smiles sweetly on me.

My way o'er the mountain I cheerfully take
At morn, when the song-birds their melody wake;
And at eve I return with a heart full of glee;
For the maid of Langollen smiles sweetly on me.

Glenarvon's rich lord passes scornfully by,
But wealth can ne'er make him so happy as I;
Then prouder than even the proudest I'll be,
While the maid of Langollen smiles sweetly on me.

LINES FROM THE PORT-FOLIO

OF THE LATE EDWARD C. PINKNEY.
NO. 1.

We met upon the world's wide face,
When each of us was young—
We parted soon, and to her place
A darker spirit sprung;
A feeling such as must have stirred
The Roman's bosom when he heard,
Beneath the trembling ground,
The god, his genius, marching forth
From the old city of his mirth,
To lively music's sound,
A sense it was, that I could see
The angel leave my side—
That thenceforth my prosperity
Must be a falling-tide;
A strange and ominous belief,
That in spring-time the yellow leaf
Had fallen on my hours;
And that all hope must be most vain,
Of finding, on my path again,
Its former, vanished flowers.
But thou, the idol of my few
And fleeting better days—
The light that cheered, when life was new,
My being with its rays—
And though, alas! its joy be gone,
Art yet, like tomb-lamps, shining on
The phantoms of my mind—
The memories of many a dream
Floating on thought's fantastic stream,
Like storm-clouds on the wind!
Is thy life but the wayward child
Of fever in the heart,
In part a crowd of fancies wild,
Of ill-made efforts part?
Are such accursed familiars thine,
As by thee were made early mine?
And is it as with me—
Doth hope in birthless ashes lie,
And seems the sun an hostile eye,
Thy pains well-pleased to see?
I trust, not so:—though thou hast been
An evil star to mine,
Let all of good the world has seen
Hang ever upon thine.
May thy suns those of summer be,
And time show as one joy to thee,
Like thine own nature pure:
Thou didst but rouse, within my breast,
The sleeping devil from a rest
That could not long endure.
The firstlings of my simple song
Were offered to thy name:
Again the altar, idle long,
In worship rears its flame.
My sacrifice of sullen years,
My many hecatombs of tears,

No happier hours recall—
Yet may thy wandering thoughts restore
To one who ever loved thee more
Than fickle fortune's all.

And now, farewell!—and although here
Men hate the source of pain,
I hold thee and thy follies dear,
Nor of thy faults complain.
For my misused and blighted powers,
My waste of miserable hours,
I will accuse thee not:—
The fool who could from self depart,
And take for fate one human heart,
Deserved no better lot.

I reckon of mine the less, because
In wiser moods I feel
A doubtful question of its cause,
And nature, on me steal—
An ancient notion, that time flings
Our pains and pleasures from his wings
With much equality—
And that, in reason, happiness
Both of accession and decrease
Incapable must be.

ZADIG AND ASTARTE.

He sought her east, he sought her west,
The vision that had blessed his sight,
She robbed his bosom of its rest,
Of joy by day, of sleep by night;—
He turned and turned to shun his care,
Only to miss her every where!

In vain for him o'er fields of flowers
The mighty star of day arose;
In vain for him, 'mid jasmine bowers,
The nightingale, at twilight's close,
Sang to the gathering lamps of night:—
In nought his spirit asked delight.

How changed from Zadig, in the days
When, through the streets of Babylon,
The cynosure of every gaze,
Wild couriers drew his chariot on;
And him, the cherished of their king,
Did sages praise and poets sing!

And wearier day, and wearier week,
And listless month went lagging by,
While still was Zadig doomed to seek
What fate was destined to deny,
As morning, noon, and evening brought
Astarte to his longing thought.

Long, long he wandered—long in vain—
She seemed a star that from the sky
Had perished, ne'er to rise again—
A flower that had but bloomed to die—
An angel sent man's sight to bless,
Then leave him to his loneliness.

Where had she fled?—Her beaming brow
For him had earth an Eden made;

Where had she vanished?—Was she now
In the city of the silent laid?
Should hope still shine to sooth his care?
Or must he bow to blank despair?

Thus weary night, and wearier day,
In travail spent, gloomed o'er his head;
And hope on hope had waned away,
As still he searched, and on he sped;
And, far remote from friendly eye,
He had no wish, save one—to die.

When, lo! amid a summer plain,
He saw a maiden on the sand,
Reclining in a vacant vein,
And tracing letters with a wand:
He lingered, and he looked to note
Why there she lay, or what she wrote.

Behold! the letters of his name,
Each following each, he saw her trace;—
Astarte! could it be the same?
She rose, and sank in his embrace!
And thus the parted and deplored
To love were given, to life restored!

Love is the life of human life!
Oh, if the earth one moment gives
With deep ecstatic rapture rife,
'Tis when before us breathes and lives—
Absence, and doubt, and danger o'er—
Her, whom we feared to meet no more!

VIOLA.

She never told her love;
But let concealment, like a worm I the bud,
Feed on her damask cheek: she pined in thought,
And with a green and yellow melancholy,
She sat like patience on a monument smiling at grief.

The secret by her tongue concealed,
Her fading charms declare,
And what by words is unrevealed,
Is better written there;
The silent tale by sorrow traced,
Of "young affections run to waste."

The radiance of her down-cast eye
Is shadowed by a tear,
Faint as the light of evening's sky,
That tells the night is near—
The long, the moonless night of rest,
When life is waning in its west.

And seems her cheek, whose bloom is fled,
—So beautiful and brief—
As if the white rose there had shed
Its frail and fallen leaf;
Which summer's genial sun and rain
Shall never wake to life again.

But she is hastening to the bowers
That bloom in happier spheres;
Where fond affection's fadeless flowers
Shall not be nursed by tears;
Where love's pure flame shall ne'er expire,
Nor kill the heart that feeds its fire.

STANZAS FOR MUSIC.

Again the flowers we loved to twine
Wreath the wild round every tree;
Again the summer sun-beams shine,
That cannot shine on thee.
Verdure returns with fresher bloom
To vale and mountain-brow;
All nature breaks as from the tomb;
But—"Where art thou?"
At eve, to sail upon the tide,
To roam along the shore,
So sweet while thou wert at my side,
Can now delight no more:—
There is in heaven, and o'er the flood,
The same deep azure now;
The same notes warble through the wood;
But—"Where art thou?"

Men say there is a voice of mirth
In every grove and glen;
But sounds of gladness on the earth
I cannot know again.
The rippling of the summer sea,
The bird upon the bough,
All speak with one sad voice to me;
"Tis—"Where art thou?"

EVERGREENS.

When summer's sunny hues adorn
Sky, forest, hill, and meadow,
The foliage of the evergreens,
In contrast, seems a shadow.

But when the tints of autumn have
Their sober reign asserted,
The landscape that cold shadow shows
Into a light converted.

Thus thoughts that frown upon our mirth
Will smile upon our sorrow,
And many dark fears of to-day
May be bright hopes to-morrow.

And thine unfading image thus
Shall often cheer my sadness,
Though now its constant looks reprove
A momentary gladness.

EPIGRAM FROM THE GREEK.

If, at the bottom of a cask,
Be left of wine a little flask,
It soon grows acid:—so when man,
Living through life's most lengthened span,
His joys all drain'd or turn'd to tears,
Sinks to the lees of fourscore years,
And sees approach death's darksome hour,
No wonder if he's somewhat sour!

NUMBER 30.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

TO MARY.

THY mind is an album, unsullied and bright,
Just opened—for angels and spirits to write
Each thought and affection, intent and desire,
That wisdom may sanction—that love may inspire.

The book is immortal—oh; guard it with care,
Least demons should sully its pages so fair;
Repulse such intruders, nor shrink from the strife,
And heaven will smile on "the book of thy life." W.

VILLAGE SKETCHES.

SHOPPING.

BY MISS MARY R. MITFORD.

HAVE any of my readers ever found great convenience in the loss, the real loss, of actual tangible property, and been exceedingly provoked and annoyed when such property was restored to them? If so, they can sympathize with a late unfortunate recovery, which has brought me to great shame and disgrace. There is no way of explaining my calamity but by telling the whole story.

Last Friday fortnight was one of those anomalies in weather with which we English people are visited for our sins; a day of intolerable wind, and insupportable dust; an equinoctial gale out of season; a piece of March unnaturally foisted into the very heart of May; just as, in the almost parallel mis-arrangement of the English counties, one sees—perhaps out of compliment to this peculiarity of climate, to keep the weather in countenance as it were—a bit of Wiltshire plumped down in the very middle of Berkshire, whilst a great island of the county palatine of Durham figures in the centre of canny Northumberland. Be this as it may, on that remarkable windy day did I set forth to the good town of B—, on the feminine errand called shopping. Every lady who lives far in the country, and seldom visits great towns, will understand the full force of that comprehensive word; and I had not been shopping for a long time: I had a dread of the operation, arising from a consciousness of weakness. I am a true daughter of Eve, a dear lover of bargains and bright colours; and knowing this, have generally been wise enough to keep, as much as I can, out of the way of temptation. At last a sort of necessity arose for some slight purchases, in the shape of two new gowns from London, which cried aloud for making. Trimmings, ribbons, sewing-silk, and lining, all were called for. The shopping was inevitable, and I undertook the whole concern at once, most heroically resolving to spend just so much, and no more; and half comforting myself that I had a full morning's work of indispensable business, and should have no time for extraneous extravagance.

There was, to be sure, a prodigious accumulation of errands and wants. The evening before, they had been set down in great form, on a slip of paper, headed thus—"things wanted." To how many and various catalogues that title would apply, from the red bench of the peer to the oaken settle of the cottager—from him who wants a blue ribbon to him who wants bread and cheese! My list was astounding. It was written in double columns, in an invisible hand; the long intractable words were brought into the ranks by the Procrustes mode—abbreviation; and, as we approached the bottom, two or three were crammed into one lot, clumped, as the bean-setters say, and designated by a sort of short-hand, a hieroglyphic of my own invention. In good open printing, my list would have cut a respectable figure as a catalogue too; for, as I had a given sum to carry to market, I amused myself with calculating the proper and probable cost of every article; in which process I most egregiously cheated the shopkeeper and myself, by copying, with the credulity of hope, from the puffs in newspapers, and expecting to buy fine solid wearable goods at advertising prices. In this way I stretched my money a great deal farther than it would go, and swelled my catalogue; so that, at last, in spite of compression and shorthand, I had no room for another word, and was obliged to crowd several small but important articles, such as cotton, laces, pins, needles, shoestrings, &c. into that very irregular and disorderly storehouse—that place where most things deposited are lost—my memory, by courtesy, so called.

The written list was safely consigned, with a well-filled purse, to my usual repository, a black velvet bag; and, the next morning, I and my bag, with its nicely-balanced contents of wants and money, were safely conveyed in a little open carriage to the good town of B—. There I dismounted, and began to bargain most vigorously, visiting the cheapest shops, cheapening the cheapest articles, yet wisely buying the strongest and the best; a little astonished at first, to find every thing so much dearer than I had set it down, yet soon reconciled to this misfortune by the magical influence which shopping possesses over a woman's fancy—all the sooner reconciled, as the monitory list lay unlooked at, and unthought of, in its grave receptacle, the black velvet bag. On I went, with an air of cheerful business, of happy importance, till my money began to wax small. Certain small aberrations had occurred, too, in my economy. One article that had happened, by rare accident, to be below my calculation, and, indeed, below any calculation, calico, at ninepence—fine, thick, strong, wide calico, at ninepence!—did ever man hear of any thing so cheap?—absolutely enchanted me, and I took the whole piece: then, after buying for M. a gown, according to order, I saw one that I liked better, and bought that too. Then I fell in love, was actually captivated by a sky-blue sash and handkerchief—not the poor, thin, greeny colour which usually passes under that dishonoured name, but the rich, full tint of the noon-day sky: and a cap-ribbon, really pink, that might have vied with the inside leaves of a moss-rose. Then, in hunting after cheapness, I got into obscure shops, where, not finding what I asked for, I was fain to take something that they had, purely to make a proper compensation for the trouble of lugging out drawers, and answering questions. Lastly, I was fairly coaxed into some articles by the irresistibility of the sellers—by the demure and truth-telling look of a pretty quaker, who could almost have persuaded the head off one's shoulders, and who did persuade me that all-wide muslin would go as far as yard-and-a-half: and by the fluent impudence of a lying shopman, who, under cover of a well-darkened window, affirmed, on his honour, that his brown satin was a perfect match to my green pattern, and forced the said satin down my throat accordingly. With these helps, my money melted all too fast: at half past five my purse was entirely empty; and, as shopping with an empty purse has by no means the relish and savour of shopping with a full one, I was quite willing and ready to go home to dinner, pleased as a child with my purchases, and wholly unsuspecting the sins of omission, the errands unperformed, which were the natural result of my unconsulted memoranda and my treacherous memory.

Home I returned, a happy and proud woman, wise in my own conceit, a thrifty fashion-monger, laden, like a pedlar, with huge packages in stout brown holland, tied up with whipcord, and genteel little parcels, papered and packthreaded in shopmanlike style. At last we were safely stowed in the pony-chaise, which had much ado to hold us, my little black bag lying, as usual, in my lap; when, as we ascended the steep hill out of B—, a sudden puff of wind took at once my cottage-bonnet and my large cloak, blew the bonnet off my head, so that it hung behind me, suspended by the ribbon, and fairly snapped the string of the cloak, which flew away, much in the style of John Gilpin's, renowned in story. My companion pitying my plight, exerted himself manfully to regain the fly-away garments, shoved the head into the bonnet, or the bonnet over the head—I do not know which phrase best describes the manœuvre—with one hand, and recovered the refractory cloak with the other. This last exploit was certainly the most difficult. It is wonderful what a tug he was forced to give, before that obstinate cloak could be brought round: it was swelled with the wind like a bladder, animated, so to say, like a living thing, and threatened to carry pony, and chaise, and riders, and packages, backward down the hill, as if it had been a sail, and we a ship. At last the contumacious garment was mastered. We righted; and, by dint of sitting sideways, and turning my back on my kind comrade, I got home without any farther damage than the loss of my bag, which, though not missed before the chaise had been unladen, had undoubtedly gone by the board in the gale; and I lamented my old and trusty companion, without in the least foreseeing the use it would probably be of to my reputation.

Immediately after dinner—for in all cases, even when one has bargains to show, dinner must be discussed—I produced my purchases. They were much admired; and the quantity, when spread out in our little room, being altogether dazzling, and the quality satisfactory, the cheapness was never doubted. Every body thought the bargains were exactly such as I meant to get—for nobody calculated; and the bills being really lost in the lost bag, and the particular prices just as much lost in my memory—the ninepenny calico was the only article whose cost occurred to me—I passed, without telling any thing like a fib, merely by a discreet silence, for the best and thriftiest bargainer that ever went shopping. After some time spent very pleasantly, in admiration on one side, and display on the other, we were interrupted by the demand for some of the little articles which I had forgotten. "The sewing-silk, ma'am, for my mistress's gown." "I don't know—look about." Ah!

enough! no sewing-silk was there. "Very strange!" Presently came other inquiries—"Where's the tape, Mary?" "The tape!" "Yes, my dear; and the needles, pins, cotton, stay-laces, boot-laces;"—"the bobbin, the ferret, shirt-buttons, shoe-laces?" quoth she of the sewing-silk, taking up the cry; and forthwith began a search as bustling, as active, and as vain, as that of our old spaniel, Brush, after a hare that has stolen away from her form. At last she suddenly desisted from her rummage—"Without doubt, ma'am, they are in the reticule, and all lost," said she, in a very pathetic tone. "Really," cried I, a little conscience-stricken, "I don't recollect; perhaps I might forget." "Depend on it, my love, that Harriet's right," interrupted one whose interruptions are always kind; "those are just the little articles that people put in reticules, and you never could forget so many things; besides, you wrote them down." "I don't know—I am not sure"—but I was not listened to; Harriet's conjecture had been metamorphosed into a certainty; all my sins of omission were stowed in the reticule; and, before bed-time, the little black bag held forgotten things enough to fill a sack.

Never was reticule lamented so by all but its owner; a boy was immediately despatched to look for it, and on his returning empty-handed, there was even a talk of having it cried. My care, on the other hand, was all directed to prevent its being found. I had had the good luck to lose it in a suburb of B. renowned for filching, and I remembered that the street was, at that moment, full of people: the bag did actually contain more than enough to tempt those who were naturally disposed to steal for stealing's sake; so I went to bed, in the comfortable assurance that it was gone for ever. But there is nothing certain in this world—not even a thief's dishonesty. Two old women, who had pounced at once on my valuable property, quarrelled about the plunder, and one of them, in a fit of resentment at being cheated in her share, went to the mayor of B. and informed against her companion. The mayor, an intelligent and active magistrate, immediately took the disputed bag, and all its contents, into his own possession; and as he is also a man of great politeness, he restored it as soon as possible to the right owner. The very first thing that saluted my eyes, when I awoke in the morning, was a note from Mr. Mayor, with a sealed packet. The fatal truth was visible; I had recovered my reticule, and lost my reputation. There it lay, that identical black bag, with its name-tickets, its cambric handkerchief, its empty purse, its unconsulted list, its thirteen bills, and its two letters; one from a good sort of lady-farmer, inquiring the character of a cook, with half a sonnet written on the blank pages; the other from a literary friend, containing a critique on the plot of a play, advising me not to kill the king too soon, with other good counsel, such as might, if our mayor had not been a man of sagacity, have sent a poor authoress to the tower. That catastrophe would hardly have been worse than the real one. All my omissions have been found out. My price-list has been compared with the bills. I have forfeited my credit for bargaining. I am become a by-word for forgetting. Nobody trusts me to purchase a paper of pins, or to remember the cost of a penny ribbon. I am a lost woman. My reticule is come back, but my fame is gone.

THE CROUP OR RIVE.—The following has been mentioned to us as an infallible cure for this distressing disorder: take a strip of linen, about four inches long, by two and a half broad, spread upon it a thin coat of simple cerate or tallow, and sprinkle upon it a sufficient quantity of Scotch snuff to cover it; apply this to the throat, from the top of the breast bone to the bottom of the chin, and, within an hour, effectual relief will be obtained. The source of our information on this subject is of the first respectability, and we, therefore, publish it with the assurance that there is no quackery in the remedy.—Ed. N. Y. Mirror.

THE HUMOURIST.

FROM THE KEEPSAKE, EDITED BY F. M. REYNOLDS.

AN INCIDENT.

"Honour, wit, genius, wealth, and glory,
"Good luck, good luck, are transitory!
"Nothing is sure, and stable found;
"The very earth itself turns round:
"Monarchs, nay ministers must die;
"Must moulder, rot, ah me! ah why?
"Ah woful me, ah woful man,
"Ah woful all, do all we can!"

In London, deaths, accidents, suicides, or the loss of a few thousands of fellow-creatures by war, conflagrations, shipwrecks, plagues, and so forth, are regarded with all the high-minded philosophy of indifference; while a waist longer, or shorter, than the prescribed ex cathedra limits, a bad picture, or a bad actor, are the important causes that daily call into action the thousand bad and good feelings of this vast metropolis.

It was on this principle, I suppose, that, some ten or twelve years ago, we were all excited by the wonderful accounts of a then forthcoming ball and supper to be given by Lady d'Elmont. It was assiduously promulgated by the attarés of fashion, that three months had been expended in preparations; though those who wished to be thought on a particularly intimate footing with its fair donor, with inflated faces, and important air, mysteriously implied that they knew that four months and as many days was the precise time the preparations had occupied. Which party, however, was correct, cannot, I fear, be now determined: suffice it, therefore, to say, that when the long-desired evening arrived, half the fashion, character, and eccentricity of the metropolis was present; some, in gratitude for their invitation, ready to render themselves disagreeable to any body, or every body; some panting with envy, and some panting for the supper; hundreds wishing the absence of their neighbours, and a few that of themselves; two-thirds, in fact, in ill-humour with others, and selon la règle, on these occasions, all discontented with their hostess.

The majority of the ladies, however, were of the real bon ton; and lounged, limped, languished, and fiddled-faddled, with the exact mixture of vanity, levity, and affectation, prescribed by the highest breeding at that time.

The men, too, were especially fashionable; they stared with pertinacity, wore mustachios, talked of races, and paid particular attention to—themselves.

However, in an assembly of four or five hundred people, it is scarcely possible that all should be equally select; consequently, there was to be seen a strange jumble of peers and plebeians; countesses, and citizens' wives, introduced by their husbands' influence into the lower house; barons and retainers; old ladies and young; professors of all the liberal arts; opulent men, and penniless gentlemen.

Among this heterogeneous mass were two friends, young men of fortune. The one was called Mortimer, and the other Bryant: the first was the son of a rich Yorkshire landholder, a wild, good-natured, handsome, scatter-brained fellow of about three-and-twenty, whose leading trait was a mad penchant for chymistry, which he had acquired when a boy, during his education at one of the principal schools in the neighbourhood of London. The other was a mild, gentlemanly young man, a few years older than his companion; less handsome in his appearance, but evidently more under the control of his reason.

At the period of the introduction of this pair to the reader, Bryant was talking most energetically to his companion, when the eye of the latter was attracted by the figure of Lady d'Elmont, the donor of the fête, who, exhausted by the heat and confusion, half reclined on a sofa, unnoticed and neglected.

She appeared about five-and-twenty; her eyes were black and sparkling; her foot was small and beautiful; her ebony-coloured hair hung in rich clusters of curls over her forehead, and formed a striking contrast with its brilliant white; her nose was Grecian, her mouth small, her teeth polished and regular, and her lips were naturally fragrant, pouting, and red; but when they were not, she mumbled and bit them till they became so: an admirable recipe, and infinitely preferable to painted salve.

"Now, you do not mean, with all your hyper-caution," cried Mortimer, as though replying to some expostulation on the part of his friend, "that any evil can accrue from my being civil to a beautiful but forsaken woman?" and, so saying, Mortimer, advancing up to Lady d'Elmont, addressed her in his most conciliating tone.

"If you are not engaged, may I have the honour of dancing with you, madam?"

The baroness raised her eyes, and admired the fine manly figure before her.

"Sir, I thank you, but I do not dance."

"You are fatigued, then, madam?"

"Yes, sir," and she agitated her fan with becoming languor.

"I must confess that the room is certainly most intensely warm. Will you allow me to procure you an ice?"

"I thank you—no."

"You are right, I believe, madam; in this heated state of the atmosphere it might not be prudent;" then, after a pause, "The Lady d'Elmont acts very foolishly in thus overfilling her rooms?"

Her ladyship looked at him for a moment with surprise, and then replied:

"Yes, sir."

"But it all results, madam, from the love of notoriety; from, in fact, the love of shining in the newspapers."

"Yes, sir."

"And for this paltry, reprehensible vanity, many a charming cheek is deprived of its roses, and many a lovely creature oppressed;" glancing at the baroness with a most significant and tender expression.

"Yes, sir."

"But Lady d'Elmont, I understand from good authority, is a weak—a very weak woman indeed, madam."

The baroness arose, and walked away.

"Do you know, sir, to whom you have been speaking all this while?" cried a listener to Mortimer, with agony in his countenance.

"No, sir."

"It was Lady d'Elmont."

Mortimer was paralyzed for an instant; but looking round and finding that his friend was not a witness to his elourderie, he speedily recovered himself, and walked away, muttering, "It is her own fault; public characters in parties, like decanters on tables, should be labelled, to warn us whom to pass and whom to taste; or ticketed like pictures in an exhibition-room, so that as one looks for the name of the artist, to ascertain the merits of the painting, one might have the advantage of seeing the personal charms of the lady through the medium of her reputation."

In the meantime the baroness walked away, apparently as calm and unruffled as though no contre-temps had occurred; for what woman of fashion ever allows herself to be ill-humoured with any body but her husband? As to the baroness, whether she had one or no, was a subject of indecision even with her intimates; for, if she had one, her grandeur threw so vast a shadow around her, that he was lost in it.

But her ladyship was really not disconcerted; for though her reputation as a woman of understanding had been, perhaps, a little mangled by Mortimer's remarks, yet too many compliments had been implied to her person not to render the set-off perfectly satisfactory.

Shortly afterwards Bryant rejoined Mortimer, and was, no doubt, in the act of inculcating prudence, when the eye of the latter was again attracted by a very pretty girl; whom he immediately accosted, and engaged to dance the next quadrille with him.

Thus passed the evening, until supper was announced; and then, alas! it appeared more than probable, inferring at least from the rush of the ladies to the head of the stairs, and their active exertions in the struggle for precedence, that gourmandise formed no inconsiderable organ in the structure of the pericraniums of even the most lovely.

Great, however, must have been the disappointment of all those possessing a due development of the culinary propensity, when, after all their well-fought efforts, they reached their goal, to find that the supper was not of that vulgar sort, where chickens, hams, patisseries, and things meant to be eaten, are offered to the guests: no! this was a decidedly fashionable supper, for there was nothing to eat. When I say this, however, I am wrong; for there was a profusion of silver and gold plate, plateaux, candelabras, and cut glass; things that, though not usually recommended for the diet of dyspeptic patients, have yet been eaten: besides, too, there were temples, pagodas, and pyramids in barley sugar; statues in the most beautiful and delicate Parian and Italian marbles; tables of mosaic; various coloured confectionaries; ices; pine-apples; blancmange; jellies, froths, syllabubs, and abundance of flowers and shrubs, the admiration of all botanists, particularly of those who had previously supped.

Every part of the whole arrangement was, in fact, perfect. The footmen were all of a size; fine tall men, of that species technically called "ladies footmen." They were somewhat narrow-shouldered, it is true; but for this the tasteful uniformity of their livery was an ample compensation; they were lamed by the tightness of their shoes, but then their feet looked small; and they had no calves to their legs, but their faces were considered very pale and interesting.

Two much shorter than the rest attracted attention: their faces were black instead of white, and their hair white instead of black; their calves, though, were very ample; and their heads inclined towards the earth, while their toes and their noses turned towards the sky. Malice whispered them to be sheriff's officers, but the report was only believed by her ladyship's most particular friends.

At this faultless banquet, fortune arranged that Mortimer should be seated next to the fair Lady d'Elmont. Not as well aware, however, as the reader, of the real effect his betise had made on her ladyship's mind, he felt at first rather shy of addressing her; and he attempted to ply his conversation with his fair neighbour on the other side. But it was hopeless; not a word could he extract from her, till at last, abandoning his fruitless efforts, he sat in resigned silence.

In the meantime, at other parts of the table, the conversation proceeded more freely. It was, generally speaking, most excessively learned; indeed it was worse, it was most horribly blue, for blueism was the rage of the day. Cranio-logy was the first most prevailing topic: then ladies desecrated on organs of destructiveness, amateness, and half a dozen other organs with equally discordant terminations. This laudable investigation was superseded by a mineralogical discussion; and here the ladies were again of service, illustrating the subject by a loan of their jewels. Then, when it had been sufficiently debated whether diamond was carbon, or carbon was diamond; whether iron was the colouring matter of amethyst, and what was the base of topaz, the different necklaces and bracelets were returned to the lovely necks and wrists of their respective owners, by the practical philosophers nearest to them.

With all this scientific conversation and practical illustration, Mortimer was delighted: and the elation of the moment inspired him with sufficient courage to address Lady d'Elmont.

"Pray, is your ladyship fond of chymistry?"

"Dotingly. I am a regular attendant at Mr. Brande's lectures."

Mortimer was now on his hobby-horse, and most gallantly did he prance away.

"He is a delightful lecturer; clear, scientific, and elegant."

"I perfectly agree with you."

"What branch of chymistry does your ladyship peculiarly like to study? The salts, the metals, the gases, the earths, the alkalies, or what?"

"I think I am particularly partial to the experiments on oxygen and carbon."

"Do you believe diamond to be the real base of carbon?"

"I do not know. I sometimes think it is. You may easily, however, resolve your doubts by consuming a diamond under a burning-glass; you will then get at the fact synthetically."

"I am sorry to say that I do not possess so many diamonds, that I am inclined to waste any of them."

"Pardon me, your ladyship has an inexhaustible mine of them—in your eyes."

"Sir, you are a flatterer."

"I only speak what I feel, madam."

"And sometimes, perhaps, look more than you speak."

"Perhaps—I wish, like old Fontenelle and his fair marchioness, you would allow me to take you under my tuition, and give you lectures in chymistry. I have made the science my special study; and if you would engage to be as tractable as the marchioness, I would endeavour to be as instructive as the old philosopher."

"And possibly as gallant, too? However, to save you your compliments, I will tell you that they would be all wasted. When I was young, and perhaps pretty, I was, doubtless, as prone to vanity as others of my age; but now—pausing on the now, with an affected sigh, a radiant glance at Mortimer, and then a half arch and half complacent one at her own fine person—"but now, I have grown mistrustful of praise, and hard of heart. As Schiller says, 'The perjuries of men are innumerable; an angel would grow gray ere he could write them down.' Besides, too, I consider love an odious, enervating passion."

"O! say not so, madam: love to a woman is like varnish to a picture; it modifies all her indifferent qualities, and enhances all her good. A woman really, truly in love, is a thousand times more amiable in the eyes of"—

"Her lover than in those of any body else. I agree with you perfectly. My ideas of a love-sick damsel are always connected with something sonnetering, pale-faced, and afflicted; and with all my heart, I pity those natures inflammable!"

"Now that's just what I say, my lady," cried a stentorian voice opposite to them; "its nature must be inflammable; for if the oxygen do not burn!"

"Her ladyship, I am sure," eagerly interrupted his opponent, "sees the utter fallacy of your argument."

"Sir, I have never argued at all—you won't let me!"

"I say," continued his inflexible adversary, "the oxygen, my lady!"

"I say," vociferated the other, "the nitrogen, my lady!"

"And I say," exclaimed an old fat gentleman, who had been talking incessantly for the previous two hours, "that nobody will let me speak! I say, that the most beautiful specimen of combustion I ever witnessed was at the French opera the other night."

"Do you mean the red flame that?"

"To be sure I do!" cried the fat gentleman; and then grumbled tollo voce, "how people do love talking!—I say that you have no idea of the effect of this red flame—the Parisians are all quite wild about it, and introduce it in every spectacle piece."

"I saw it!" exclaimed a little red-skinned man, whose tiny nose was the centre of a circle described by the outline of his forehead, cheeks, and chin; and whose whole face, in fact, would have served as an excellent substitute for Gibbon's, in engendering Madame du Defand's extraordinary idea. "I saw it! and I candidly own, that my evidence is completely confirmatory of the prolocutor's; the red flame is wonderful!"

"O," cried the Lady d'Elmont, "pray tell me where I can get some of this miraculous flame, for I intend, when I return to —, to get up Don Giovanni at my theatre there; and how excellently and delightfully such a magnificent light as you describe would aid the effect of his descent with the ghost! I declare, it will be so charming, I think we must make him, if we can, go to the—you know where—twice in the same evening."

"I am sorry that I cannot gratify your ladyship's curiosity," replied the "prolocutor," as the circular-faced gentleman termed him, "but the composition of the powder that produces the flame is a profound secret; one for which the inventor asks an almost incredible sum."

"O," exclaimed the baroness, her desires particularly excited by this unexpected opposition to their gratification, "I would give the world to get some of it."

"Would you?" cried Mortimer, eagerly; "then you shall have some within a few minutes, and as much as you can desire in a few days; that is, if you will be kind enough to allow me to send one of your servants to my hotel, which is only a score of yards from hence."

Of course, the permission was readily accorded, and in a few minutes the servant returned bearing a small piece of folded paper, which he delivered to Mortimer; who opened, and displayed to her ladyship about three or four ounces of a gray-coloured powder.

"This," cried he, "is the source of the 'red flame' that these gentlemen have been describing to you. The moment I heard of its wonderful effects, I set strenuously to work to discover its composition; and knowing, of course, that hyper-oxy-muriate of potash must form a principal portion, after a fortnight's incessant labour, I at length discovered the secret. Now should your ladyship like to see a small portion of it burnt, which I can easily effect on the back of one of these plates?"

"I should be delighted," replied Lady d'Elmont. "And so should I!"—And so should I! echoed some score of half-starved wanderers, whom the emptiness of their stomachs rendered locomotive.

"Well, then," replied Mortimer, "I will immediately have the pleasure of gratifying your ladyship;" and he inverted a plate on the table in the centre of the room, and proceeded to arrange his materials; his friend Bryant, at his elbow, vainly counselling him to desist.

In the meantime there circulated among the company enough reports of "red flame," "handsome young man," "only son," and "ten thousand per annum," to bring more than half of them round the spot where our hero was stationed: for such, at any rate, in his present situation, he may with propriety be designated.

Immediately over Mortimer's head hung an immense chandelier, all the lights of which, with the exception of some half dozen or so, he, with the consent of Lady d'Elmont, and in order to enhance the effect and splendour of his flame, desired to be extinguished. All the candles too were then removed.

Mortimer having distributed a certain portion of the powder on the plate, and deposited the rest in the paper on the table, rested for a moment over his labours, the great object of attraction, scrutiny, scandal, quizzing, and admiration to all of that immense assemblage, who were conscious of what was proceeding. Then, lighting his paper, he slowly applied it to the powder, when, alas! alas! instead of red flames and beautiful coruscations, the powder violently exploded, and communicating with the large residue in the paper, ascended in a huge volume of brilliant flame to the ceiling; totally extinguishing the lights in the chandelier, and leaving the room in utter darkness.

The first impulse of each was, of course, to stand motionless and aghast with astonishment; the second, to rush towards the door as rapidly as possible; which all doing simultaneously, the pressure closed upon it as effectually as though it had been barred with hooks of steel. In vain those near it struggled and struggled to open it; they could scarcely move a hand, much more the door.

Conceive, then, if you can, tender-hearted reader, the uncomfortable situation of three or four hundred people thus caged together in utter darkness. Conceive, if you can, the feelings, the ideas, the sensations, the fears, the distresses, and apprehensions of the females present. Conceive, too, the sudden alteration of character; the instantaneous exchange of all the fashion of inertness and listlessness for all the vulgarity of activity and excitement; the squeezing of the elegantes, and the elbowing of the transients; in fact, imagine that, like a fiat from heaven, the extinction of a few candles tore from each the mask of factitiousness, and laid her bare in all her native beauty, or deformity.

As to the sensations of the gentlemen, I will not attempt to describe them; they are too acute, too susceptible, too sensitive, and too delicate, to be communicable to an unknown, who might not duly appreciate the candour of my exposition.

However, to increase, if possible, this general scene of confusion and misfortune, a spark remaining in the ashes of the powder lighted an unconsumed portion of it, which, slightly exploding, brilliantly flamed, and then disappeared; after having illuminated the room for a few seconds, and set fire to some drapery about the table, to two or three gowns, and to a most ample, frizzy, oily, and inflammable wig of the gentleman like Mr. Gibbon, the celebrated historian of the Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire.

The moment this unhappy gentleman felt the fire at his head, with all his might he beat it, and another might have assisted him without injury to its contents; but as this did not succeed in extinguishing the flame, like a maniac, he forced his headlong way through the crowd, kindly imparting in his progress a portion of his superfluous warmth to all the inflammable materials within his reach, until he attained one of the windows, which being open at the top, in the frenzied hope of escape, he began to climb, setting instantaneously the whole of the light curtain drapery in one universal blaze. Finding matters, therefore, rather hotter in that quarter even than below, he turned his mind toward a descent; when, alas! and again alas! he became at that moment a beacon to a passing fire-engine without, the conductors of which seeing flames and smoke issuing from a window, began to pump with the utmost promptitude against the body of the unfortunate circular-faced gentleman, who, after a due quantity of soaking, burning, kicking, and screaming, was at length washed headlong into the room, a miserable addition to the comforts of his companions, leaving at the window a convenient vacancy for the triumphant entrance of a magnificent stream of water, of more than one inch in diameter, and three in circumference!

The moment the splashing from the body of the unfortunate circular-faced gentleman touched the ladies and their clothes, those theorists who were not thoroughly acquainted with the capabilities of the female voice, internally pronounced the noise to be at its climax, conceiving that neither human nor mechanical means could increase it; but when the water in torrents, and a man into the bargain, were rained into the room, the aforesaid theorists penitently confessed themselves to be totally mistaken in their conjectures, and frankly and ingeniously added that they did not think all purgatory itself could make such an uproar.

Thanks to the discriminate selection of the firemen, the window broken was in the very centre of the room, and thus commanded a perfect range of the whole crowd within. Some of them sought refuge beneath the tables, and thus partly escaped; some got under the window itself, and allowed the torrent to pass over them, and some forcibly endeavoured to shelter themselves behind others. Vain were threats, tears, and supplications to stop the horrid spouting; the more they cried the more the men pumped; for though the flames had disappeared from the window, the inconceivable noise within convinced the inveterate pumpers without that the fire must still rage somewhere. So they continued with the most obstinate diligence, till every one of their unfortunate victims was literally drenched to the bone.

It is hardly possible, indeed, to convey to the mind by description the confusion and disasters of that unparalleled scene. The fine statues and jellies, the diamond necklaces and blanc-manges, the bruised shins and bleeding noses, the bottles, slippers, turbans, wine, and false hair, the legs of men and legs of tables, arms of women and arms of chairs, all blended together in one inextricable combination. Add to this, the struggling, quarrelling, weeping, reproaching, regretting, and the soaking to boot, and yet, even then, the picture will fall far short of the reality.

At last, by the time the floor of this once magnificent room was ankle deep in water, the servants and people without managed to force an entry into it with lights; when forth rushed the victims in every variety of plight, from that of tolerable misery down to the extremity of desolation and despair.

Changed, indeed, was their appearance, as wildly they rushed down the grand stairs, from that which they had made when they last stood on them. One lady, who, when she ascended them, had been particularly noticed for her auburn silken locks, mirabile dictu, descended them without any hair at all. Another, who had all the evening acted Thalia, to show a beautiful row of pearly teeth, stalked down them Melpomene, in the vain hope of hiding her toothless gums. In fact, she that had gone in fair, walked out brown; and she that had been straight limped out crooked. Like the alchemist's crucible, the events of the evening had transmuted fair into foul, and bad into worse; and I doubt whether husband, brother, or father could have recognised his property, as she made her luckless exit from Lady d'Elmont's famous party.

Thus ended this eventful night, which, strange to say, made little noise at the time, and less since. All the papers spoke of the splendour of Lady d'Elmont's party, but not a word about the red flame. How the secret was so well kept has often been matter of surprise to me; but perhaps the disgrace was too universal, and too equal, for any to desire to promulgate it. Curious, however, as is the circumstance, it is a positive fact, that few knew the particulars of the occurrence in that day; and in this, I'll venture to say, that scarcely one of my readers has ever even heard of it at all.

A TALE OF THE SEA.

The following admirable story—for which we are indebted to the Atlantic Souvenir—is said to be from the pen of Mr. COOPER, the distinguished American novelist. As we have not seen it noticed by, or copied into, any of the public journals, we have reason to think it has been but little read, and, therefore, transfer it to the columns of the Mirror, in the full belief that we could not fill the space which it occupies, more to the satisfaction of our readers. "The brilliant exploit on which the tale is founded, was performed in the early part of the revolution in Peru. San Martin, after freeing Chili from the Spanish yoke, had pushed his army to the very gates of Lima; and, with the co-operation of Lord Cochrane by sea, took possession of the ancient capital of Peru soon after the occurrences here detailed."

THE ESMERALDA.

It was on a bright and sunny summer evening, that a curious cavalcade was seen issuing from the gate of Lima, and taking the road to Callao. It was composed of the "liberty men"* of the American frigate Macedonian, then lying in the harbour. A crowd of Peruvian boys followed it; and the very sentinels forgot their military gravity, and indulged in the irrepressible laughter which it excited. First came some half dozen sailors, arm-in-arm, whom a tiny midshipman in vain strove to keep in order. Then followed some dozen mules, each carrying two drunken sailors, slung like panniers, amid-ships, and guided by a stout Peruvian lad, seated en croupe. Two or three midshipmen, with some twenty steady fellows of the crew, brought up the rear. The pinioned tars had no idea of the propriety of their mode of conveyance, and vented all their tipsy rage on the "after-guard," as they styled the driver. But once on shore during a three years' cruise, the sailors had gone from the extreme of temperance and abstinence, to the extreme of excess; and having spent their last dollar, were now literally carried back to their vessel. Those in front, as they passed the soldiers, cocked their eyes, thrust their tongues into their cheeks, and throwing out their legs horizontally, performed the mock military to perfection: then bursting into a roar of laughter at their own wit, trod on each other's heels, kicked each other's shins, shouted "heads up, ye lubbers!" and set order at complete defiance. The living panniers were less noisy, and groaned and hiccuped their discontent at being "triced up" to such heavy sailers, as they termed the mules; kicked the sides of the animals, aimed ineffectual blows at the "after-guard," and ran desperate risk of life, as some restive beast, throwing his heels in the air, threatened to dislodge them. The rear, exhilarated, but not tipsy, with just enough aboard to show off the sailor to perfection, cracked their jokes, trolled their songs, practised their manual fun upon the drunkards, and moved most merrily along. By dint of driving and swearing, the procession was urged over the seven miles from Lima to the sea, and reached Callao just as the sun flashed his last rays upon the Chilean brig, which was cruising, hull down, in the offing. The wharf or quay, alongside of which the frigate's boats were lying in readiness to receive the "liberty men," was crowded with people. Sailors, soldiers, guarda-costas, Indians, and idlers of all descriptions, were collected there. The clattering of the oars of newly arrived boats, the roll and splash of those leaving the landing, the voice of command, the English and American "damn," the Spanish "caramba," the French "sacre," and the Dutch "der teufel," were all heard, were all mingled in the general clamour and hurry at the close of day. These sounds were dying away as the Americans approached the quay; and by the time that the "liberty men" were tumbled aboard the two cutters and pinnace, nobody remained to witness their departure but a few guarda-costas, whose duty detained them along the shore.

It was a beautiful and tranquil bay across which the Macedonian's boats now pulled. On the right lay the castles of Callao, the long line of ramparts serried with the bayonets of the Spanish soldiers. On the left, anchored head and stern, were the frigates Macedonian and Esmeralda; the latter a new ship, fully armed, provisioned, manned, and equipped for a six months' cruise; and a little farther out lay the British frigate Hyperion; all three within half gunshot of the castles. Within the men-of-war the merchantmen were securely moored. A few black whale ships dotted the bay; and far off, in the shadow of the island of San Lorenzo, lay the patriot blockading squadron of Lord Cochrane.

The stern sheets of the pinnace were occupied by two midshipmen. At home, by his own fire-side on the Roanoke, the youngest would have been called a boy; but here, in the Pacific, the officer of a yankee frigate, it would have been sword and pistol work to have rated him any thing but a man. There was an air too of command about him, which sustained his pretensions to the character; and the sailors at the oars regarded him with that respectful kindness and ready obedience that showed he was a favourite among the crew. In place of a chapeau-bras, like that worn by his companion, the large straw sombrero of the Peruvians lay beside him, while a black handkerchief twisted around his head, shielded it from the damp air, which already began to float over the water.

"In the name of sense, Hal," said his companion, taking up the sombrero, and measuring its immense brim against the sky, "where did you get this upper rigging? and what boot did you give in exchanging a chapeau?"

"It is too long a yarn to spin now," said the Virginian, evidently willing to avoid the subject; "put the broad brim down, and mind the yoke ropes. Here we are athwart the hawse of a merchantman."

The sudden shock which threw the oars out of the rowlocks, created a confusion on board the pinnace which effectually interrupted the conversation. The hail from the merchantman was answered. The commands, "back water;" "steady;" "pull ye'r starboard oars;" "altogether now;" "give way, boys," followed in quick succession; and the pinnace shot by the obstacle which had momentarily checked its progress. All the vessels which the boat had hitherto passed, had hailed it at the usual distance, and it was now directly under the bows of the Esmeralda.

"Strange that the Spanish frigate does not hail," said the Virginian. "So fine a ship should have a livelier watch on board. A sleepy dog that, whose bayonet I see just abaft the mainmast."

"They're deep in a frolic," replied his companion. "I met a crowd of Spanish gentlemen going on board to dine, as I came ashore this morning, and the guarda-costa at the landing told me that they had not returned at sun-down."

"The more fools they," answered the other, "to blow it out with Cochrane at two gun-shots of them."

"He is not the man to interrupt them," was the reply; "he lies so idly under the island, that his men will soon not know brace from buntline."

"I don't know," continued the Virginian; "his vessels showed their teeth pretty plainly as we made the land here, and his flag-ship walked across our fore foot in as gallant a style as I have seen this many-a-day."

"Nothing but show," said the other.

"The commodore did not think so, however, or else all hands would not have beat to quarters, the ship cleared for action, bulk-heads down, decks sanded, and matches smoking. No, no. Cochrane will be alongside of the Esmeralda yet, and that before long. It may be superstition, Will, but for a commodore's broad pennant I would not sling my hammock to night to the best battens on board of her. In my eye, she looks like a doomed ship. Her sails bent, her guns run out, and yet so still—not a living soul to speak to us from her decks; no sound about her but the rippling of the tide against her hawse."

The farther remarks of the Virginian were interrupted by the loud hail from the Macedonian. It was promptly answered, and in a short time the sailors and their officers stood upon the deck of the frigate.

The bustle occasioned by the arrival of the boats was soon over. The sailors betook themselves to the fore-castle, and became listeners to an interminable love song, which a sentimental blue jacket was droning forth to his companions. The officers, after reporting themselves on the quarter-deck, either turned in for the night or joined the different groups that were lounging about the after-part of the ship. Seated on the breech of a gun, with his sombrero on his knee, and surrounded by a crowd of reefers, was the Virginian. The Peruvian hat had already been tried on the heads of all around, and made the subject of sailor jests; and assuming all the dignity of one who was aware of the interest attached to his story, its owner commenced his account of the manner in which he obtained it, and the cause of his wearing it.

"You see, reefers, the purser and I having come to a reckoning, I determined to have a regular blow out in Lima: not a tipsy spree, you understand, but something to recall the Roanoke and old Virginia. So off I started in the cutter, and having reached the shore, I hired the horse of a guarda-costa, to carry me to town, and engaged its master to serve me as a guide. I took the sheep-skins, and he trudged it on foot. It was sunset when we left the wharf, and before we had proceeded half-way, the mist came rolling over from the sea, and concealed from our view even the trees which lined the sides of the road. We were the only travellers. Some loaded mules passed us; but, with the exception of these, we were the solitary occupants of the king's high-way. I possessed Spanish sufficient to maintain a broken conversation with the guarda-costa, and we chatted cosily enough, until we heard the clatter of a horse's hoof upon the road behind us. In another moment, a horseman, nobly mounted, but dressed in the poncho and sombrero of the country, dashed by us at full speed. He came, and he was gone. Here, and away. Lightning could scarcely have been quicker. But still, as he galloped, I was struck with his appearance. I noticed that he rode with civilized stirrups, and not the wooden shoes of the Peruvians. I thought, too, that he had holsters; and I would swear to the long straight sword which clinked against the stirrup-iron. Small time for observation, you say. Well, so it was; but time enough for all. The guarda-costa saw every thing that I did. 'Bravo!' he said, as the stranger, unmoved in his saddle, bore the wide leap which his startled horse made in passing. 'Bueno Caballero! That fellow sits well, signior.' 'Like a hero,' replied I, equally pleased with the dexterity of the horseman; but before the words had passed my lips he had disappeared, and we again moved solitarily along. When we had proceeded about a mile further, to our great surprise, the single horseman again dashed by us at his utmost speed. But this time he came in the direction of Lima, and rode so furiously as almost to capsize the guarda-costa. After passing us, he turned at right angles to the road, and continued his way far to our left. He had scarcely vanished in the mist, before a vidette of Spanish cavalry came on us, with almost equal speed. The officer commanding it reined his horse upon its haunches beside me, and asked imperatively the direction taken by the single horseman, whose appearance and dress he described. I, however, had no idea of turning informer, so I pretended not to understand him, and talked as fast in English as he did in Spanish. He cursed big and large, and then repeated his questions to the guarda-costa. I was afraid all would be blown now, and was consoling myself by calculating the advantage the delay had given to the fugitive, when I heard my guide log a deliberate lie, in assuring the Spaniard that 'Caballero' had pushed on to Callao; and in a moment more, the vidette were, as they supposed, pushing after him. We now continued our way. The Peruvian chuckled, and did not pretend to conceal his satisfaction at having crossed the trail of the vidette. 'Santa Maria! how he rode!' said the guarda-costa, as if thinking aloud; 'and those cursed Spaniards to think to overtake him.' 'You speak roughly of your friends,' said I. 'Friends!' repeated the man, in as fiendish a tone as I ever heard. He laid his hand upon the pommel of the saddle, threw back the broad brim of his straw hat, and rose many inches in height, as he darted his quick keen eyes full in my face, to read in the deep gloom the expression of my countenance. For a moment he looked cautiously around, and then rapidly whispered, 'I, signior, am a Peruvian, but not a free-born man. Who made me? who made the Incas slaves? The Spaniards.' The guarda-costa paused; then, pointing first in the direction of San Martin's camp, and then towards the Chilian fleet, he continued in the same energetic tone. 'No, signior, there are our friends.' I scarcely recognised the stupid custom-house drudge in the man who now addressed me. His extended arm—his bold carriage—his upright figure, which loomed large in the evening mist, belonged, I thought, to another being. But the change was momentary. The soldier turned slowly away, and before I could reply, he was again as when I hired him.

"In the meantime we approached the city. The guarda-costa appeared to have struck upon a train of thought which was far from pleasing, for he strode rapidly along, and occasionally muttered discontented sounds, as thought came unwittingly to his tongue. I tried to catch his meaning, without success. His sultry answers prevented conversation, and we proceeded most unsociably, until challenged by the sentinel at the gate. 'Que viva?' sounded hoarsely from beneath the old archway. 'San Martin,' fiercely replied my guide. In a moment the musket of the Spanish soldier on guard rattled in his hands. I heard the sharp click as he cocked it. Another second, and the guarda-costa had been a dead man. I sprung from my horse in time to strike up the levelled weapon, and shouted 'viva le rey,' in tones that brought the whole guard to the spot. My guide was more alarmed than I was. San Martin was uppermost in his thoughts, and the name of the patriot chief, at which the Limanians trembled, was pronounced, instead of the usual reply to the hail of the Spanish sentinel. We were now overhauled by the officers on duty; and after some impertinent examination, I was damned as a North American, and suffered to proceed. My guide, however, was detained. This was unlucky enough. I knew nothing of Lima, and none of those whom the bustle at the gate had collected, seemed at all disposed to assist me. Recollecting that Frank Lindesay's horse, in old Virginia—and I rode it often enough to know—stopped at all the grog-shops, I threw the reins on the neck of my steed, hoping that he would carry me to the place where his master usually put up. The animal's intentions may have been good; but I soon saw that the crowd were determined to thwart them. To make a long story short, I was in the centre of a Lima mob, led on by a little contemptible looking rascal, who persuaded the people that I was the head spy of San Martin's army. At first I pretended not to understand what was said, but my valour at last got the better of my discretion, and I could not resist the temptation of putting my fist between the eyes of a villain who was grinning his impudence in my face. This brought things to a crisis: 'A la muerte' was the cry, and the last thing I can recollect was a blow on the temple, which brought me to the ground.

"How long I remained insensible I cannot exactly say. When I recovered, I found that I had been laid at the door of a huge church; under the idea, I suppose, that I was dead. I felt miserably stiff and cold, and for some minutes did not attempt to move; at last, after one or two efforts, I got upon my feet, and ascertained that my limbs were unbroken, and that my doubloons were still at the bottom of my fob. Some Peruvian gentleman had taken a fancy to my watch, and to a new chapeau, mounted for the occasion. He might have spared them, as they were borrowed articles. No matter, however, the watch never had any insides, and the hat must have suffered pretty severely in the scuffle. The first thing I did, on turning around, was to peep in at the door of the church, which stood conveniently ajar. As I peeped in, some one from the interior peeped out; for I thrust my nose into the pale face of a tall, monkish-looking person, who was about leaving the building. Both of us were sadly scared, and starting back, we stood staring at each other in the star-light, until, recovering the first from the panic produced by the unexpected rencontre, I turned and ran with the best speed my stiff limbs would admit of. After going a considerable distance, I stopped to listen. No sounds came from the direction of the church; but from the opposite quarter, I heard the steps and clattering arms of a relief of soldiers. I stood by a low garden wall, and in a moment I was on the other side of it. The relief passed by, and the noise it made was soon lost in the turning of the streets. I was now in a large and handsome garden. The smooth walks, the fountain which tossed its waters so coolly on the night, broad grass-plats, the rows of flowers, the neatly trimmed hedges, amused me for some time, and resolving to wait here the return of light, I threw myself upon a garden-bench, and summoned all the recollections of past pleasures to assist the slow progress of time. But time, notwithstanding, took his own way, and jogged most lazily on. I got up—I drank at the fountain—I walked about, and at last, attracted by the sound of music, set myself to discover whence it proceeded. After losing it, and recovering it several times, I found myself under the verandah of the house to which the garden was attached, and which some lines of tall hedges had at first prevented me from seeing. Curiosity brought me to the house; curiosity led me into the verandah; and curiosity placed me snugly enough at the window of the very room at which the musician was. Of course I went on tiptoes, and, scarcely daring to breathe, ventured to peep into the apartment; intending, if all things permitted, to discover myself, and ask for a night's lodging, and a hat of some sort or other. The room was a large one, lighted by a shaded lamp, which hung from the ceiling, and made every thing appear soft and moonshiny. Next to the window at which I sat, was the door leading to the verandah, directly opposite to which was another door, and in the right-hand wall a third, of a much smaller size, might have led to a sleeping apartment. A table covered with a crimson cloth stood in the centre, and upon a sofa beside it, and opposite to the small door, was reclining the minstrel of the hour. The guitar which had attracted me was lying on the table, and the lady who had touched it was reading what appeared to me to be a letter. I'd tell you what, reefers, she was worth looking at. I could not see her eyes; but then her exquisite figure, and the prettiest little foot you ever beheld, seen to such advantage on the dark covering of the sofa, and her jet black hair, and beautiful mouth, and high commanding forehead—she was a glorious craft, such as I have not seen since I left old Virginia.

"Thinks I, she can't be hard-hearted enough to refuse me shelter; and I was on the point of giving an introductory 'hem!' when, 'tap, tap, tap,' on the opposite door, announced a visitor. Not at all alarmed, the lady put away the letter, and answering the summons, introduced a tall, strapping fellow, dressed in the common apparel of a guarda-costa. Matters looked promising, I thought, for another adventure, and drawing myself a little farther from the window, I awaited it. The guarda-costa sat down without much ceremony, and had not uttered twenty words before I ascertained the whole secret of the matter, and heard some of the finest love-speeches that were ever made to mortal woman, so far as my knowledge of Spanish enabled me to comprehend them."

"Let us have them, Hal, do," said the listeners, crowding even closer round the orator. He shook his head, and proceeded.

"Such things always lose in the telling, and are, in fact, arrant nonsense to all but the parties interested. The Peruvian took off his straw hat, and showed a noble countenance, and a head of thick and curling hair. He threw the poncho over his shoulder, and I saw plainly enough, the uniform of one of San Martin's officers; another glance, and I became convinced that this was the stranger whose horsemanship had excited my admiration on my way from Callao. It was not very fair to be a listener, I allow; but I considered the Peruvian as a friend, having seen him before, and curiosity to see a real love affair, after one or two twinges, overcame all scruples of conscience. From what I could gather, the lady was the daughter of a Spanish royalist, and the officer was a lover of unprecedented constancy. The country had made him join the patriot father had retained the lady in Lima, was conquering with San Martin."

the capital of Peru. Arrived at last in its neighbourhood, and fearing for her safety if the place was entered by force, he had obtained admission to the town in disguise, appointed the present hour, in the letter which I had seen her reading, for an interview, and now urged her rapid and immediate flight with him to Valparaiso, in a vessel lying in the harbour. She spoke of her father, his hatred of the patriot cause, and his consequent inveteracy against her lover; she urged her duty, and the danger of flight. To all this my friend pleaded like a hero, as I have no doubt he is. He rose from the seat which he had occupied beside her, and paced the room with impatient steps; and at last stopping before her, with his back turned towards the smaller door, began to repeat his arguments for flight. Suddenly her eye became fixed, the colour fled from her face; she looked as if she would have screamed, but could not. Her lover bent forward with anxious eagerness, and vainly solicited the cause of her visible alarm. I saw it, and one moment more found me involved in difficulty and adventure. While the impetuous lover was detailing his plans, the smaller door had been pushed gently open, and a person, whom I can swear was the father, followed by two others, all well armed, entered the room and sprung towards the Peruvian. I shrieked aloud, however, before they reached him, and he turned in time for defence. In a moment the broad straight sword was gleaming over the head of the companion of the old man, and would have descended fatally, had it not struck against and extinguished the only light in the chamber, that hanging from the ceiling. All was shrieking and screaming for a moment, when some one jumped from the open window, overturned me, and darted into the garden. I was now very seriously bruised, and, when lights were brought, was discovered lying in the verandah. But the Peruvian was gone, and the lady was no where to be found. The broken glass of the lamp, and an immense straw hat, were all that remained in evidence of the occurrence.

"The old don swore at me until he was exhausted, and shut me up for the night in the cellar, as an accomplice of the Peruvian. In the morning, he carried me before a magistrate, who would have committed me to prison, had I not been recognized by a Spanish gentleman who had seen me in the frigate. By his exertions I was released, and with the sombrero of the runaway lover to pay me for bruises and broken bones, I joined the liberty boys; and here I am, spinning long yarns to a parcel of sleepy reefers."

The attention of many of the listeners had, during the latter portion of the Virginian's story, been diverted by the crowd which had collected on the quarter-deck, and were leaning over the larboard side of the ship, and the Virginian now joined a group of them himself, with the question,

"Well, reefers, what's the go now? Is this the first time you have seen a whaler's boat towing his casks to the watering-place, after eight bells?"

"Devilish big casks those the leading boat has in tow," said a sailor, who had ascended a few feet in the main-shrouds.

"Casks!" repeated a midshipman, dropping a night-glass at the same time into his left hand. "If those black-looking things are not boats filled with men, and coming on with a long and steady pull, this glass is not worth a rotten rope-yarn."

Every eye was now exerted to its utmost powers of vision; the glass was passed from hand to hand, and in a few minutes all on deck were satisfied that a long line of barges, each crowded with men, was pulling up directly astern of the Macedonian.

"The Scotchman is on the waters to-night," whispered the Virginian. "What did I tell you in the boat? My life for it, Cochrane is in the foremost barge; and see how he keeps us between him and the Esmeralda."

His companion made no reply, but turned to look at the tall masts and taper spars of the Spanish frigate, and then again upon the advancing boats. By this time the word which had been passed below, had brought the whole ship's crew upon deck, every man of which watched with almost breathless interest the approach of the barges. The topmen stole silently aloft, and most of the sailors and officers instinctively placed themselves in the neighbourhood of their respective posts. Not a wave was upon the waters, and the night breeze, as it passed fore and aft the ship, was scarcely felt against the cheek. The Chilians came on with muffled oars, and their long steady strokes soon brought them under the stern of the Macedonian. So silently did they move, that, as they passed along-side, no sound of voice or oar could be distinguished, and, clad as they were in white, they seemed like a band of spirits, rather than mortal men, moving on the deep. No hail was given by the American ship. Officers, quartermasters, sailors, were spell-bound with intense interest, and the very sentinels seemed to forget their existence, as they gazed on the Chilians, whose approach undiscovered by the Spaniards became every moment more doubtful. Already had they passed, and breaking off alternately to the larboard and starboard of the Esmeralda, clasped the fated vessel in their embrace. Instead of following in the line, the last of Cochrane's boats pulled under the cabin windows of the Macedonian, and held on to the rudder chains. The officer commanding begged, entreated, threatened his crew. They would not proceed. In sullen cowardice they concealed themselves during the combat which followed. In vain did the officers of the Macedonian order them to let go, and urge them to avoid disgrace; the chaplain even joined his entreaties; they made no answer, but kept their place, the only cowards of that eventful night. When the fight was over, they pulled silently to the Esmeralda, and, preserving the secret of their baseness, participated in the honours of the occasion.

In the mean time one of the barges glided to a gunboat under the bows of the American. The clash of sabre upon steel, the words "silencio o muerte," a hum of voices, a dead stillness, and the gunboat had changed masters. This broke the spell on board the Macedonian. A kedge was carried out, the gib hauled up, the chain slipped, and as the head fell off from the wind, a cloud of canvass dropped from her spars and solicited the breeze. Long ere these preparations were complete, the Esmeralda was the scene of conflict. The first man who boarded from the main-chains, after cutting down the sentinel at the gangway, was shot by the sentinel at the fore-castle. Cochrane was the next, and in a few moments the deck was crowded with his followers. The Spaniards were sleeping on their arms, and as they struggled from below, the contest became fierce and doubtful. There was one pause only in which the assailants ceased to slay, as they watched with intense anxiety the effect of the wind upon the gib. Had the head fallen towards the shore, the Esmeralda must have been deserted and burnt by the Chilians; but fate decreed it otherwise, and there was one loud "hurrah" as the bows gently turned towards the island of San Lorenzo. The Chilian sailors on the spars soon clothed the vessel with her canvass. From royals to courses every sail was set, and falling astern of the Macedonian, the Esmeralda followed her slowly from the shore.

The fight continued while the vessel got under way, and "Jesu," "Santa Maria," "caramba," joined with English oaths and exclamations, came loud through the din of battle. At one time the voice of Lord Cochrane was heard encouraging his men, and ordering more sail to be packed upon the spars. Then came a volley of fire-arms, which drowned all sounds besides, and illuminating the deck, showed the rapid gleam of descending sabres. Then there would be a momentary pause, as one party or the other gained a temporary advantage, and then again the wild uproar swelled with redoubled fury. At last the Chilians collecting in a dense mass upon the quarter-deck, made a quick and fierce charge upon their opponents. It was met, and for an instant met successfully; but the strength of the Spaniards was broken, and the next moment they were heard dropping into the sea, as their pursuers forced them over the bows. The spar-deck was now still, but below all was confusion. A gun-brig, which had repelled its assailants, fired its single piece of artillery directly under the cabin windows of the Esmeralda, and the indiscriminate slaughter of friend and foe was the consequence. This, however, produced no effect upon the combatants, and the victory on the gun-deck was still doubtful, when Cochrane, with his successful followers, rushed down the gangway, and quickly decided the fate of the Spaniards. The wave was their only refuge; and springing from the ports, some gained the shore by swimming, others found their graves where they fell.

The Virginian, and his companion in the cutter, had watched the progress of the fight from their station in the foretop of the Macedonian, and were still gazing on the deck of the Esmeralda, when a flash from the shore, the howl of a ball passing between the masts, and the dull report of a cannon, drew their attention to another quarter. Lights were seen hurrying along the ramparts of the fortress of Callao, and the sound of drums came faintly from them. Flash after flash succeeded the first in quick succession, until one continued stream of fire gushed from the long line of batteries. To the eyes of the young men, every gun seemed intended especially for them.

"What! not a spar gone yet? and only one hole through the main-top-sail?" said the Virginian at last, after coolly casting his eyes upwards upon the canvass of the ship. "It can't be so long, however; the light duck scarcely draws, and the courses and top-sails hang like lead. There goes the cross-jack-yard," he continued, as the crash of splintered wood was heard upon the quarter-deck. "The lanterns at the peak and gib-boom end would have distinguished us from the Esmeralda, if Cochrane had not hoisted them as soon as we did."

"By heavens! though, there goes his peak light," cried his companion, as a shot severed the rope. The lantern fell over into the sea, floated a moment, and was extinguished.

A better aim on the part of the Spanish gunners, or the gradual approach of the vessel within the range of some of the cannon of the fortress, made the situation of the ship more perilous than it had yet been, and three or four balls almost grazed the heads of the fore-top men. Still both spar and sail were uninjured, and the only effect of the shot was to hush the whispered conversation which had been hitherto maintained.

The silence was at last interrupted by an interjectional whistle from the Virginian, as a shot went through the sail immediately above him.

"This firing will deaden the wind until canvass nor duck will hold it: and the Scotchman hangs on our quarter, determined that, if he sinks, so shall we."

"Don't whistle for the wind, mister," said an old sailor in a superstitious tone; "it never comes when it is called, and we want it too much to anger it."

"That whistle brought it, though," cried the other. "The Esmeralda's courses draw, and our heavy sails begin to feel it; we'll walk yet, if the puff holds."

The communication was accompanied by a visible change in the spirits of the seamen, as the sail, after one or two heaves, swelled steadily before the wind. The progress of the vessel, however, was still slow, although the danger every moment decreased, and it was upwards of an hour before the shot of the fortress fell short. Daylight by this time began to dawn, and showed the sullen batteries, surmounted by a heavy dun cloud, and frowning over a bay which they had so fruitlessly attempted to guard. The Macedonian cast anchor far beyond their reach, and the Esmeralda, uninjured, and in gallant style, moved to the island of San Lorenzo.

During this eventful night, the captain of the American frigate had been detained in Lima, and at sunrise of the second day after the fight, the launch and gig were ordered down to Chorillos to meet him, and to receive on board such Americans as feared the consequences of remaining in the city during the first moments of excitement which would follow the intelligence of the capture of the Esmeralda. The gig was commanded by our friend the Virginian, and after a long and heavy pull, he found himself beneath the high and rugged cliffs of Chorillos. Here the boats remained without the surf, while the Indians, wading through it, brought the passengers on board. "All aboard," had been already cried, and the oars were in the rowlocks to return, when the appearance of a troop of San Martin's cavalry on shore, and their loud shouts and earnest beckonings, delayed their departure. As the sailors rested on their oars, an officer, who appeared to be the commander of the soldiers, came hurrying to the beach, bearing on his arm a female, whose horse he had been seen to guide as his troops came full gallop on. He gave her to the huge Indian who offered his assistance, and followed him into the surf. A short and low conversation was held between San Martin's officer and the American commander. The former then returned to the shore, and the latter gave his rapid orders to proceed to Callao. By evening the party were again in their frigate, and a knot was soon seen to assemble round the young Virginian, as on the preceding evening. He seemed to be urging a doubtful point with peculiar energy.

"How did I know them? Why, didn't I see him plain enough in the room, and didn't I hear his plan of getting her to Valparaiso? The captain ordered me to the launch, but not before I saw her face. No, reefers, no! True love got the weathergauge of the old don, her father, in Lima, and kept it at Chorillos."

FEMALE BEAUTY.

It has been said by some one, and if not said, it shall be said now, that no woman is incapable of inspiring love, fixing affection, and making a man happy. We are far less influenced by outward loveliness than we imagine. Men speak with admiration and write with rapture of the beauty which the artist loves, which, like genius in the system of Gall, is ascertained by scale and compass: but in practice, see how they despise those splendid theories, and yield to a sense of beauty and loveliness, of which the standard is in their own hearts. It is not the elegance of form, for that is often imperfect; it is not in loveliness of face, for there nature has been perchance neglectful; nor is it in the charm of sentiment or sweet words, for even among women there is an occasional lack of that; neither is it in the depth of their feelings, nor in the sincerity of their affection, that their whole power over man springs from. Yet every woman, beautiful or not, has that power more or less; and every man yields to its influence.

The women of all nations are beautiful. Female beauty, in the limited sense of the word, is that outward form and proportion which corresponds with the theories of poets and the rules of artists—of which every nation has examples, and of which every woman has a share. But beauty, by a more natural definition of the word, is that indescribable charm, that union of many qualities of person, and mind, and heart, which insures to man the greatest portion of happiness. One of our best poets has touched on this matter with the wisdom of inspiration; these are his words:

She dwelt among the untrodden ways
Beside the springs of Dove,
A maid whom there were none to praise,
And very few to love.
She lived unknown, and few could know
When Lucy ceased to be:
But she is in her grave, and, oh!
The difference to me!

This was a maiden something more to the purpose than the slender damsels whom academics create on canvass, or of whom some bachelor bards dream. The poet of Rydal Mount is a married man, and knows from what sources domestic happiness comes. The gossamer creations of the fancy, were they transformed to breathing flesh and blood, would never do for a man's bosom. Those delicate aerial visions, those personified zephyrs, are decidedly unfit for the maternal wear and tear of the world. Not so the buxom dames of our two fine islands. Look at them as they move along. If art with its scale and its compasses, and its eternal chant of "the beau ideal—the beau ideal," had peopled the world, we would have been a nation of ninnies, our isles would have been filled with lay figures and beings "beautiful exceedingly," but loveless, joyless, splendidly silly, and elegantly contemptible. It has been better ordered.

I have looked much on man, and more on woman. The world presents a distinct image of my own perception of beauty; and from the decisions of true love I could lay down the law of human affection, and the universal sense entertained respecting female loveliness. There is no need to be profound, there is no occasion for research; look on wedded society, it is visible to all. There, a man very plain is linked to a woman very lovely; a creature silent as marble, to one eloquent, fluent, and talkative; a very tall man to a very little woman; a very portly lady to a man short, slender, and attenuated; the brown weds the black, and the white the golden; personal deformities are not in the way of affection; love contradicts all our theories of loveliness, and happiness has no more to do with beauty than a good crop of corn has with the personal looks of him who sowed the seed. The question, therefore, which some simple person has put, "which of the three kingdoms has the most beautiful ladies?" is one of surpassing absurdity. Who would ever think of going forth with rules of artists in their hands, and scraps of idle verse on their lips, to measure and adjust the precedence of beauty among the three nations? Who shall say which is the fairest flower of the field, which is the brightest of the stars of heaven? One loves the daisy for its modesty, another the rose for its splendour, and a third the lily for its purity; and they are all right.

We know not, indeed, by our natural theory of female loveliness, which of the nations has the most beautiful women, because we know not which of them is the happiest. Wherever there is most bosom tranquillity, most domestic happiness, there beauty reigns in all its strength. Look at that mud hovel on one of the wild hills of Ireland: smoke is streaming from door and window; a woman, to six healthy children and a happy husband, is portioning out a simple and scanty meal; she is a good mother and an affectionate wife; and though tinged with smoke and touched by care, she is warmly beloved; she is lovely in her husband's eyes, and is therefore beautiful. Go into yon Scottish cottage; there is a clean floor, a bright fire, merry children, a thrifty wife, and a husband who is nursing the youngest child and making a whistle for the eldest. The woman is lovely and beautiful, and an image of thrift and good housewifery, beyond any painter's creation; her husband believes her beautiful too, and whilst making the little instrument of melody to please his child, he thinks of the rivals from whom he won her, and how fair she is compared to all her early companions. Or here is a house at hand, hemmed round with fruit trees and flowers, while the blossoming tassels of honeysuckle perfume us as we pass in at the door. Enter and behold that Englishwoman, out of keeping with all the rules of academic beauty, full and ample in her person, her cheeks glowing with health, her eyes shining with quiet happiness, her children swarming like summer bees, her house shining like a new clock, and her movements as regular as one of Murray's chronometers. There sits her husband, a sleek contented man, well fed, clean lodged, and softly handled, who glories in the good looks and sagacity of his wife, and eyes her affectionately as he holds the shining tankard to his lips, and swallows slowly, and with protracted delight, the healthy beverage which she has brewed. Now, that is a beautiful woman; and why is she beautiful? She is beautiful, because the gentleness of her nature and the kindness of her heart throw a halo around her person, adorning her as a honey-suckle adorns an ordinary tree, and impressing her mental image on our minds. Such is beauty in my sight—a creation more honourable to nature, and more beneficial to man, and in itself infinitely more lovely, even to look upon, than those shapes made according to the line and level of art, which please inexperienced eyes, delude dreamers, fascinate old bachelors, and catch the eye and vex the heart.

The following selections are from the Keepsake:

THE THIEF DETECTED.

As lovely Nature once explored
Her cave of treasures, rich and rare,
She missed of female charms a hoard,
Enough to form a thousand fair.

To Love the goddess quickly flew,
And plainly told him her belief,
Indeed, conviction, that he knew
The person who had been the thief.

Scarce ended was her tale of woe,
Ere roguish Love the goddess left,
And speeding straight to one I know,
Abruptly charged her with the theft.

The trembling maid denied with grief;
But Cupid has a judgment sound:
"Tis plain," he cried, "that you're the thief.
"For on you all the goods are found."—REYNOLDS.

ON TWO SISTERS.

Young Dora's gentle, pure, and kind,
With lofty, clear, and polished mind;
But Dora, rich in mental grace,
Alas! is somewhat poor in face:
Pity her noble soul don't warm
A Grecian statue's perfect form!
But, Ann, in thee all charms combine;
Each gift of beauty, sweet, is thine!
Thy form surpasses e'en desire;
Thine eyes are rolling orbs of fire!
Enchanting, perfect, is the whole:
Pity the statue wants a soul!—REYNOLDS.

EPIGRAMS.

Last Monday all the papers said
That Mr. — was dead;
Why, then, what said the city?
The tenth part sadly shook their head,
And shaking sighed, and sighing said,
"Pity, indeed, 'tis pity."
But when the sad report was found
A rumour wholly without ground,
Why, then, what said the city?
The other nine parts shook their head,
Repeating what the tenth had said,
"Pity, indeed, 'tis pity."—COLERIDGE.

That e'er my visits will become Too frequent, much I doubt;
For though I've found you oft at home,
Too oft I've found you out.—REYNOLDS.

Your poem must eternal be,
Dear sir—it cannot fail—
For 'tis incomprehensible,
And wants both head and tail.—COLERIDGE.

They told me with their feelings bitter,
That in your wealth your beauty lies;
And I believed them, for there glitter
Ten thousand diamonds in your eyes.—REYNOLDS.

Swans sing before they die—'twere no bad thing
Did certain persons die before they sing.—COLERIDGE.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

New Works.—By the late arrivals from London, we have received the Keepsake, the Anniversary, the Bijou, and several other elegant and entertaining volumes. These being expensive works, and but a few copies having been imported, we shall, after a more careful perusal—even to the exclusion of ORIGINAL matter—make further extracts from them next week.

Correspondents will grant us their usual indulgence. Their kind favours shall be attended to in due season.

In order to make room for "Esmeralda," and the interesting selections contained in the present number, we are necessarily compelled to postpone any editorial remarks.

So grant me, God, from every care,
And stain of passion free,

Aloft, through virtue's purer air,
To hold my course to Thee!

No sin to cloud—no lure to stay
My soul, as home she springs;

Thy sunshine on her joyful way,
Thy freedom in her wings!

LINES FROM THE PORT-FOLIO

OF THE LATE EDWARD C. PINKNEY.

NO. II.

By woods and groves the oracles
Of the old age were nursed;
To Brutus came in solitude
The spectral warning first,
When murdered Caesar's mighty shade
The sanguine homicide dismayed,
And fantasy rehearsed
The ideas of March, and, not in vain,
Showed forth Philippi's penal plain.
In loneliness I heard my hopes
Pronounce, "Let us depart!"
And saw my mind—a Marius—
Desponding o'er my heart:
The evil genius, long concealed,
To thought's keen eye itself revealed,
Unfolding like a chart—
But rolled away, and left me free
As stoics once aspired to be.
It brought, thou spirit of my breast,
And Naiad of the tears,
Which have been welling coldly there,
Although unshed, for years!
It brought, in kindness or in hate,
The final menaces of fate,
But prompted no base fears—
Ah, could I with ill feelings see
Aught, love, so near allied to thee?
The drowsy harbinger of death,
That slumber dull and deep,
Is welcome, and I would not wake
Till thou dost join my sleep.
Life's conscious calm—the flapping sail—
The stagnant sea, nor tide, nor gale,
In pleasing motion keep—
Oppress me; and I wish release
From this to more substantial peace.
Star of that sea!—the cynosure
Of magnet-passions, long!—
A ceaseless apparition, and
A very ocular song!—
My skies have changed their hemisphere,
And forfeited thy radiant cheer:
Thy shadow still is strong;

And, beaming darkness, follows me,
Far duskier than obscurity.

Star of that sea!—its currents bear
My vessel to the bourne,
Whence neither busy voyager
Nor pilgrim may return.
Such consummation I can brook,
Yet, with a fixed and lingering look,
Must anxiously discern
The far horizon, where thy rays
Surceased to light my night-like days.

Unwise, or most unfortunate,
My way was; let the sign,
The proof of it, be simply this—
Thou art not, wert not, mine!
For 'tis the wont of chance to bless
Pursuit, if patient, with success;
And envy may repine,
That, commonly, some triumph must
Be won by every lasting lust.

How I have lived imports not, now
I am about to die,
Else I might chide thee that my life
Has been a stifled sigh:
Yes, life; for times, beyond the line
Our parting traced, appear not mine,
Or of a world gone by;
And often almost would evince,
My soul had transmigrated since.

Pass wasted powers; alike the grave,
To which I fast go down,
Will give the joy of nothingness
To me, and to renown;
Unto its careless tenants, fame
Is idle as that gilded name,
Of vanity the crown,
Helvetian hands inscribe upon
The forehead of a skeleton.

List the last cadence of a lay
That, closing as begun,
Is governed by a note of pain,
Oh, lost and worshipped one!—
None shall attend a sadder strain,
Till Memnon's statue stand again
To mourn the setting sun—
Nor sweeter, if my numbers seem
To share the nature of their theme.

THE SLEEPERS.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Sleep!—let thy mother's spirit bless her child!
And let thy sisters, to the dreaming land,
Greet thee with song! each gentle voice be there
Of early fondness—each familiar face—
Only th' unkind be absent!

Oh! lightly, lightly tread!
A holy thing is sleep,
On the worn spirit shed,
And eyes that wake to weep:

A holy thing from heaven,
A gracious dewy cloud,
A covering mantle, given
The weary to enshroud.

Oh! lightly, lightly tread!
Revere the pale still brow,
The meekly-drooping head,
The long hair's willowy flow!

Ye know not what ye do,
That call the slumberer back,
From the world unseen by you,
Unto life's dim faded track.

Her soul is far away,
In her childhood's land perchance,
Where her young sisters play,
Where shines her mother's glance.

Some old sweet native sound
Her spirit haply weaves;
A harmony profound
Of woods with all their leaves:

A murmur of the sea,
A laughing tone of streams:
Long may her sojourn be
In the music-land of dreams!

Each voice of love is there,
Each gleam of beauty fled,
Each lost one still more fair—
Oh! lightly, lightly tread!

WRITTEN ON A HUNDRED-POUND NOTE.

A little while ye have been mine,
Nae langer can I keep ye;
I fear ye'll ne'er be mine again,
Nor only itner like ye.

FROM THE ITALIAN.

As o'er a bright and rapid rill
A self-enamoured rose was bending,
A loveliness more lovely still
The waters to her image lending;
An envious gust, with ruthless power,
Of all her leaves despoiled the flower.

Her leaves the brooklet's mirror strew'd,
O'er which they smiled so sweet before:
The brook its heedless path pursued:
They past, and were beheld no more:
And thus, alas! without a stay,
The bloom of beauty flits away!

TIME.

Warm is the heart in boyhood's days,
And warmer are the smiles which greet it:
But time will come when those light rays
Of hope and love no longer meet it.
How bright the dream when young eyes sleep
And brighter glows the heart with gladness;
But time will doom such eyes to weep,
And change their beams to tears of sadness.

How beautiful the book of life;
If fancy glances o'er its pages,
She feels no sorrow, sees no strife,
In the fair scenes of future ages.
But changed are those unblotted lines,
When feelings, hopes, and all are slighted:
And dim the fire of genius shines,
When all its wanderings have been blighted.

AN EVENING THOUGHT.

Mark how that cloud, whose blackness blots the skies,
Beneath yon planet, unilluminated, lies;
While the bright star with scintillating ray,
Strives, but in vain, to chase its gloom away.
So vainly bright, so impotently fair,
Shines Joy's remembrance, smiling on Despair.

NUMBER 31.

POPULAR TALES.

FROM THE KEPSAKE.

THE TAPESTRIED CHAMBER.

BY THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY.

THE following narrative is given from the pen, so far as memory permits, in the same character in which it was presented to the author's ear; nor has he claim to further praise, or to be more deeply censured, than in proportion to the good or bad judgment which he has employed in selecting his materials, as he has studiously avoided any attempt at ornament which might interfere with the simplicity of the tale.

At the same time it must be admitted, that the particular class of stories which turns on the marvellous, possesses a stronger influence when told, than when committed to print. The volume taken up at noonday, though rehearsing the same incidents, conveys a much more feeble impression than is achieved by the voice of the speaker on a circle of fire-side auditors, who hang upon the narrative as the narrator details the minute incidents which serve to give it authenticity, and lowers his voice with an affectation of mystery, while he approaches the fearful and wonderful part. It was with such advantages that the present writer heard the following events related, more than twenty years since, by the celebrated Miss Seward, of Lichfield, who, to her numerous accomplishments, added, in a remarkable degree, the power of narrative in private conversation. In its present form the tale must necessarily lose all the interest which was attached to it, by the flexible voice and intelligent features of the gifted narrator. Yet still, read aloud, to an undoubting audience, by the doubtful light of the closing evening, or, in silence, by a decaying taper, and amidst the solitude of a half-lighted apartment, it may redeem its character as a good ghost-story. Miss Seward always affirmed that she had derived her information from an authentic source, although she suppressed the names of the two persons chiefly concerned. I will not avail myself of any particulars I may have since received concerning the localities of the detail, but suffer them to rest under the same general description in which they were first related to me; and, for the same reason, I will not add to, or diminish the narrative, by any circumstance, whether more or less material, but simply rehearse, as I heard it, a story of supernatural terror.

About the end of the American war, when the officers of Lord Cornwallis's army, which surrendered at Yorktown, and others, who had been made prisoners during the impetuous and ill-fated controversy, were returning to their own country, to relate their adventures, and repose themselves, after their fatigues; there was amongst them a general officer, to whom Miss Seward gave the name of Browne, but merely, as I understood, to save the inconvenience of introducing a nameless agent in the narrative. He was an officer of merit, as well as a gentleman of high consideration for family and attainments.

Some business had carried General Browne upon a tour through the western counties, when, in the conclusion of a morning stage, he found himself in the vicinity of a small country town, which presented a scene of uncommon beauty, and of a character peculiarly English.

The little town, with its stately old church, whose tower bore testimony to the devotion of ages long past, lay amidst pastures and cornfields of small extent, but bounded and divided with hedge-row timber of great age and size. There were few marks of modern improvement. The environs of the place intimated neither the solitude of decay, nor the bustle of novelty; the houses were old, but in good repair; and the beautiful little river murmured freely on its way to the left of the town, neither restrained by a dam, nor bordered by a towing-path.

Upon a gentle eminence, nearly a mile to the southward of the town, were seen, amongst many venerable oaks and tangled thickets, the turrets of a castle, as old as the wars of York and Lancaster, but which seemed to have received important alterations during the age of Elizabeth and her successor. It had not been a place of great size; but whatever accommodation it formerly afforded, was, it must be supposed, still to be obtained within its walls; at least, such was the inference which General Browne drew from observing the smoke arise merrily from several of the ancient wreathed and carved chimney-stalks. The wall of the park ran alongside of the highway for two or three hundred yards; and through the different points by which the eye found glimpses into the woodland scenery, it seemed to be well stocked. Other points of view opened in succession; now a full one, of the front of the old castle, and now a side glimpse at its particular towers; the former rich in all the bizarrerie of the Elizabethian school, while the simple and solid strength of other parts of the building seemed to show that they had been raised more for defence than ostentation.

Delighted with the partial glimpses which he obtained of the castle through the woods and glades by which this ancient feudal fortress was surrounded, our military traveller was determined to inquire whether it might not deserve a nearer view, and whether it contained family pictures, or other objects of curiosity worthy of a stranger's visit; when, leaving the vicinity of the park, he rolled through a clean and well-paved street, and stopped at the door of a well-frequented inn.

Before ordering horses to proceed on his journey, General Browne made inquiries concerning the proprietor of the chateau which had so attracted his admiration; and was equally surprised and pleased at hearing, in reply, a nobleman named, whom we shall call Lord Woodville. How fortunate! Much of Browne's early recollections, both at school and at college, had been connected with young Woodville, whom, by a few questions, he now ascertained to be the same with the owner of this fair domain. He had been raised to the peerage by the decease of his father a few months before, and, as the general learned from the landlord, the term of mourning being ended, was now taking possession of his paternal estate, in the jovial season of merry autumn, accompanied by a select party of friends to enjoy the sports of a country famous for game.

This was delightful news to our traveller. Frank Woodville had been Richard Brown's sag at Eton, and his chosen intimate at Christ Church; their pleasures and their tasks had been the same; and the honest soldier's heart warmed to find his early friend in possession of so delightful a residence, and of an estate, as the landlord assured him with a nod and a wink, fully adequate to maintain and add to his dignity. Nothing was more natural than that the traveller should suspend a journey, which there was nothing to render hurried, to pay a visit to an old friend under such agreeable circumstances.

The fresh horses, therefore, had only the brief task of conveying the general's travelling-carriage to Woodville castle. A porter admitted them at a modern gothic lodge, built in that style to correspond with the castle itself, and at the same time rang a bell to give warning of the approach of visitors. Apparently the sound of the bell had suspended the separation of the company, bent on the various amusements of the morning; for, on entering the court of the chateau, several young men were lounging about in their sporting-dresses, looking at, and criticising, the dogs which the keepers held in readiness to attend their pastime. As General Browne alighted, the young lord came to the gate of the hall, and for an instant gazed, as at a stranger, upon the countenance of his friend, on which war, with its fatigues and its wounds, had made a great alteration. But the uncertainty lasted no longer than till the visitor had spoken, and the hearty greeting which followed was such as can only be exchanged betwixt those who have passed together the merry days of careless boyhood or early youth.

"If I could have formed a wish, my dear Browne," said Lord Woodville, "it would have been to have you here, of all men, upon this occasion, which my friends are good enough to hold as a sort of holiday. Do not think you have been unwatched during the years you have been absent from us. I have traced you through your dangers, your triumphs, your misfortunes, and was delighted to see that, whether in victory or defeat, the name of my old friend was always distinguished with applause."

The general made a suitable reply, and congratulated his friend on his new dignities, and the possession of a place and domain so beautiful.

"Nay, you have seen nothing of it as yet," said Lord Woodville, "and I trust you do not mean to leave us till you are better acquainted with it. It is true, I confess, that my present party is pretty large, and the old house, like other places of the kind, does not possess so much accommodation as the extent of the outward walls appear to promise. But we can give you a comfortable old-fashioned room, and I venture to suppose that your campaigns have taught you to be glad of worse quarters."

The general shrugged his shoulders and laughed. "I presume," he said, "the worst apartment in your chateau is considerably superior to the old tobacco-cask in which I was fain to take up my night's lodging when I was in the bush, as the Virginians call it, with the light corps. There I lay, like Diogenes himself, so delighted with my covering from the element, that I made a vain attempt to have it rolled on to my next quarters; but my commander for the time would give way to no such luxurious provision, and I took farewell of my beloved cask with tears in my eyes."

"Well, then, since you do not fear your quarters," said Lord Woodville, "you will stay with me a week at least. Of guns, dogs, fishing-rods, flies, and means of sport by sea and land, we have enough and to spare; you cannot pitch on an amusement but we will find the means of pursuing it. But if you prefer the gun and pointers, I will go with you myself, and see whether you have mended your shooting since you have been amongst the Indians of the back settlements."

The general gladly accepted his friendly host's proposal in all its points. After a morning of manly exercise, the company met at dinner, where it was the delight of Lord Woodville to condescend to the display of the high properties of his recovered friend, so as to recommend him to his guests, most of whom were persons of distinction. He led General Browne to speak of the scenes he had witnessed; and as every word marked alike the brave officer and the sensible man, who retained possession of his cool judgment under the most imminent dangers, the company looked upon the soldier with general respect, as on one who had proved himself possessed of an uncommon portion of personal courage; that attribute, of all others, of which every body desires to be thought possessed.

The day at Woodville castle ended as usual in such mansions. The hospitality stopped within the limits of good order: music, in which the young lord was a proficient, succeeded to the circulation of the bottle: cards and billiards, for those who preferred such amusements, were in readiness: but the exercise of the morning required early hours, and not long after eleven o'clock the guests began to retire to their several apartments.

The young lord himself conducted his friend, General Browne, to the chamber destined for him, which answered the description he had given of it, being comfortable and old-fashioned. The bed was of the massive kind of the seventeenth century, and faded silk, heavily trimmed with tarnished gold. But then the sheets, pillows, and blankets looked delightful to the campaigner, when he thought of his "mansion, the cask." There was an air of gloom in the tapestry hangings, which, with their worn-out graces, curtained the walls of the little chamber, and gently undulated as the autumnal breeze found its way through the ancient lattice-window, which pattered and whistled as the air gained entrance. The toilette, too, with its mirror, turbaned, after the manner of the beginning of the century, with a coiffure of murrey-coloured silk, and its hundred strange-shaped boxes, providing for arrangements which had been obsolete for more than fifty years, had an antique, and in so far a melancholy, aspect. But nothing could blase more brightly and cheerfully than the two large wax candles; or if aught could rival them, it was the flaming bickering faggots in the chimney, that sent at once their gleam and their warmth through the snug apartment; which, notwithstanding the general antiquity of its appearance, was not wanting in the least convenience that modern habits rendered either necessary or desirable.

"This is an old-fashioned sleeping apartment, general," said the young lord, "but I hope you find nothing that makes you envy your old tobacco-cask."

"I am not particular respecting my lodgings," replied the general; "yet were I to make any choice, I would prefer this chamber, by many degrees, to the gayer and more modern rooms of your family mansion. Believe me, that when I unite its modern air of comfort with its venerable antiquity, and recollect that it is your lordship's property, I shall feel in better quarters here than if I were in the best hotel London could afford."

"I trust—I have no doubt—that you will find yourself as comfortable as I wish you, my dear general," said the young nobleman; and once more bidding his guest good night, he shook him by the hand, and withdrew.

The general once more looked round him, and internally congratulating himself on his return to peaceful life, the comforts of which were endeared by the recollection of the hardships and dangers he had lately sustained, undressed himself, and prepared for a luxurious night's rest.

Here, contrary to the custom of this species of tale, we leave the general in possession of his apartment until the next morning.

The company assembled for breakfast at an early hour, but without the appearance of General Browne, who seemed the guest that Lord Woodville was desirous of honouring above all whom his hospitality had assembled around him. He more than once expressed surprise at the general's absence, and at length sent a servant to make inquiry after him. The man brought back information that General Browne had been walking abroad since an early hour of the morning, in defiance of the weather, which was misty and ungenial.

"The custom of a soldier," said the young nobleman to his friends—"many of them acquire habitual vigilance, and cannot sleep after the early hour at which their duty usually commands them to be alert."

Yet the explanation which Lord Woodville then offered to the company seemed hardly satisfactory to his own mind, and it was in a fit of silence and abstraction that he awaited the return of the general. It took place near an hour after the breakfast bell had rung. He looked fatigued and feverish. His hair—the powdering and arrangement of which was at this time one of the most important occupations of a man's whole day, and marked his fashion as much as, in the present time, the tying of a cravat, or the want of one—was dishevelled, uncurled, void of powder, and dank with dew. His clothes were huddled on with a careless negligence, remarkable in a military man, whose real or supposed duties are usually held to include some attention to the toilette; and his looks were haggard and ghastly in a peculiar degree.

"So you have stolen a march upon us this morning, my dear general," said Lord Woodville, "or you have not found your bed so much to your mind as I had hoped, and you seemed to expect. How did you rest last night?"

"Oh, excellently well! remarkably well! never better in my life!" said General Browne rapidly, and yet with an air of embarrassment which was obvious to his friend. He then hastily swallowed a cup of tea, and, neglecting or refusing whatever else was offered, seemed to fall into a fit of abstraction.

"You will take the gun to-day, general?" said his friend and host, but had to repeat the question twice ere he received the abrupt answer, "No, my lord; I am sorry I cannot have the honour of spending another day with your lordship: my post-horses are ordered, and will be here directly."

All who were present showed surprise, and Lord Woodville immediately replied, "Post-horses, my good friend! what can you possibly want with them, when you promised to stay with me quietly for at least a week?"

"I believe," said the general, obviously much embarrassed, "that I might, in the pleasure of my first meeting with your lordship, have said something about stopping here a few days; but I have since found it altogether impossible."

"That is very extraordinary," answered the young nobleman. "You seemed quite disengaged yesterday, and you cannot have had a summons to-day; for our post has not come up from the town, and therefore you cannot have received any letters."

General Browne, without giving any further explanation, muttered something of indispensable business, and insisted on the absolute necessity of his departure in a manner which silenced all opposition on the part of his host, who saw that his resolution was taken, and forbore all further importunity.

"At least, however," he said, "permit me, my dear Browne, since go you will, or must, to show you the view from the terrace, which the mist, that is now rising, will soon display."

He threw open a sash-window, and stepped down upon the terrace as he spoke. The general followed him mechanically, but seemed little to attend to what his host was saying, as, looking across an extended and rich prospect, he pointed out the different objects worthy of observation. Thus they moved on till Lord Woodville had attained his purpose of drawing his guest entirely apart from the rest of the company, when, turning round upon him with an air of great solemnity, he addressed him thus:

"Richard Browne, my old and very dear friend, we are now alone. Let me conjure you to answer me upon the word of a friend, and the honour of a soldier. How did you in reality rest during last night?"

"Most wretchedly, indeed, my lord," answered the general, in the same tone of solemnity; "so miserably, that I would not run the risk of such a second night, not only for all the lands belonging to this castle, but for all the country which I see from this elevated point of view."

"This is most extraordinary," said the young lord, as if speaking to himself; "then there must be something in the reports concerning that apartment." Again, turning to the general, he said, "For heaven's sake, my dear friend, be candid with me, and let me know the disagreeable particulars which have befallen you under a roof where, with consent of the owner, you should have met nothing save comfort."

The general seemed distressed by this appeal, and paused a moment before he replied. "My dear lord," he at length said, "what happened to me last night is of a nature so peculiar and so unpleasant, that I could hardly bring myself to detail it even to your lordship, were it not that, independent of my wish to gratify any request of yours, I think that sincerity on my part may lead to some explanation about a circumstance equally painful and mysterious. To others, the communication I am about to make might place me in the light of a weak-minded, superstitious fool, who suffered his own imagination to delude and bewilder him; but you have known me in childhood and youth, and will not suspect me of having adopted, in manhood, the feelings and frailties from which my early years were free." Here he paused, and his friend replied:

"Do not doubt my perfect confidence in the truth of your communication, however strange it may be; I know your firmness of disposition too well to suspect you could be made the object of imposition, and am aware that your honour and your friendship will equally deter you from exaggerating whatever you may have witnessed."

"Well, then," said the general, "I will proceed with my story as well as I can, relying upon your candour; and yet distinctly feeling that I would rather face a battery than recall to my mind the odious recollections of last night."

He paused a second time, and then perceiving that Lord Woodville remained silent, and in an attitude of attention, he commenced, though not without obvious reluctance, the history of his night's adventures in the Tapestry Chamber.

"I undressed and went to bed so soon as your lordship left me yesterday evening; but the wood in the chimney, which nearly fronted my bed, blazed brightly and cheerfully, and, aided by a hundred exciting recollections of my childhood and youth, which had been recalled by the unexpected pleasure of meeting your lordship, prevented me from falling immediately asleep. I ought, however, to say, that these reflections were all of a pleasant and agreeable kind, grounded on a sense of having, for a time, exchanged the labour, fatigues, and dangers of my profession for the enjoyments of a peaceful life, and the reunion of those friendly and affectionate ties, which I had torn asunder at the rude summons of war.

"While such pleasing reflections were stealing over my mind, and gradually lulling me to slumber, I was suddenly aroused by a sound like that of the rustling of a silken gown, and the tapping of a pair of high-heeled shoes, as if a woman were walking in the apartment. Ere I could draw the curtain to see what the matter was, the figure of a little woman passed between the bed and the fire. The back of this form was turned to me, and I could observe, from the shoulders and neck, it was that of an old woman, whose dress was an old-fashioned gown, which, I think, ladies call a sacque; that is, a sort of robe completely loose in the body, but gathered into broad plaits upon the neck and shoulders, which fall down to the ground, and terminate in a species of train.

"I thought the intrusion singular enough, but never harboured for a moment the idea that what I saw was any thing more than the mortal form of some old woman about the establishment, who had a fancy to dress like her grandmother, and who, having, perhaps—as your lordship mentioned that you were rather straitened for room—been dislodged from her chamber for my accommodation, had forgotten the circumstance, and returned by twelve, to her old haunt. Under this persuasion I moved myself in bed and coughed a little, to make the intruder sensible of my being in possession of the premises. She turned slowly round, but, gracious heaven! my lord, what a countenance did she display to me! There was no longer any question what she was, or any thought of her being a living being. Upon a face which wore the fixed features of a corpse, were imprinted the traces of the vilest and most hideous passions which had animated her while she lived. The body of some atrocious criminal seemed to have been given up from the grave, and the soul restored from the penal fire, in order to form, for a space, an union with the ancient accomplice of its guilt. I started up in bed, and sat upright, supporting myself on my palms, as I gazed on this horrible spectre. The hag made, as it seemed, a single and swift stride to the bed where I lay, and squatted herself down upon it in precisely the same attitude which I had assumed in the extremity of my horror, advancing her diabolical countenance within half a yard of mine, with a grin which seemed to intimate the malice and the derision of an incarnate fiend."

Here General Browne stopped, and wiped from his brow the cold perspiration with which the recollection of his horrible vision had covered it.

"My lord," he said, "I am no coward. I have been in all the mortal dangers incidental to my profession, and I may truly boast that no man ever saw Richard Browne dishonour the sword he wears; but in these horrible circumstances, under the eyes, and as it seemed, almost in the grasp of an incarnation of an evil spirit, all firmness forsook me, all manhood melted from me like wax in the furnace, and I felt my hair individually bristle. The current of my life-blood ceased to flow, and I sank back in a swoon, as very a victim to panic terror as ever was a village girl, or child of ten years old. How long I lay in this condition I cannot pretend to guess.

"But I was roused by the castle clock striking one, so loud that it seemed as if it were in the very room. It was some time before I dared open my eyes, lest they should again encounter the horrible spectacle. When, however, I summoned courage to look up, she was no longer visible. My first idea was to pull my bell, wake the servants, and remove to a garret or a hay-loft, to be ensured against a second visitation. Nay, I will confess the truth, that my resolution was altered, not by the shame of exposing myself, but by the fear that, as the bell-cord hung by the chimney, I might, in making my way to it, be again crossed by the fiendish hag, who, I figured to myself, might be still lurking about some corner of the apartment.

"I will not pretend to describe what hot and cold fever-

fits tormented me for the rest of the night, through broken sleep, weary vigils, and that dubious state which forms the neutral ground between them. An hundred terrible objects appeared to haunt me; but there was the great difference betwixt the vision which I have described, and those which followed, that I knew the last to be deceptions of my own fancy and over-excited nerves.

"Day at last appeared, and I rose from my bed ill in health, and humiliated in mind. I was ashamed of myself as a man and a soldier, and still more so at feeling my own extreme desire to escape from the haunted apartment, which, however, conquered all other considerations; so that, huddling on my clothes with the most careless haste, I made my escape from your lordship's mansion, to seek in the open air some relief to my nervous system, shaken as it was by this horrible rencounter with a visitant, for such I must believe her, from the other world. Your lordship has now heard the cause of my discomposure, and of my sudden desire to leave your hospitable castle. In other places I trust we may often meet; but heaven protect me from ever spending a second night under that roof!"

Strange as the general's tale was, he spoke with such a deep air of conviction that it cut short all the usual commentaries which are made on such stories. Lord Woodville never once asked him if he was sure he did not dream of the apparition, or suggested any of the possibilities by which it is fashionable to explain apparitions—wild vagaries of the fancy, or deception of the optic nerves. On the contrary, he seemed deeply impressed with the truth and reality of what he had heard; and, after a considerable pause, regretted, with much appearance of sincerity, that his early friend should, in his house, have suffered so severely.

"I am the more sorry for your pain, my dear Browne," he continued, "that it is the unhappy, though most unexpected result, of an experiment of my own. You must know, that, for my father and grandfather's time at least, the apartment which was assigned to you last night, had been shut on account of reports that it was disturbed by supernatural sights and noises. When I came, a few weeks since, into possession of the estate, I thought the accommodation which the castle afforded for my friends was not extensive enough to permit the inhabitants of the invisible world to retain possession of a comfortable sleeping apartment. I therefore caused the Tapestried Chamber, as we call it, to be opened; and without destroying its air of antiquity, I had such new articles of furniture placed in it as became the more modern times. Yet, as the opinion that the room was haunted very strongly prevailed among the domestics, and was also known in the neighbourhood and to many of my friends, I feared some prejudice might be entertained by the first occupant of the Tapestried Chamber, which might tend to revive the evil report which it had laboured under, and so disappoint my purpose of rendering it as useful part of the house. I must confess, my dear Browne, that your arrival yesterday, agreeable to me for a thousand reasons besides, seemed the most favourable opportunity of removing the unpleasant rumours which attached to the room, since your courage was indubitable, and your mind free from any preoccupation on the subject. I could not, therefore, have chosen a more fitting subject for my experiment."

"Upon my life," said General Browne, somewhat hastily, "I am infinitely obliged to your lordship—very particularly indebted indeed. I am likely to remember, for some time, the consequences of the experiment, as your lordship is pleased to call it."

"Nay, now you are unjust, my dear friend," said Lord Woodville. "You have only to reflect, for a single moment, in order to be convinced that I could not augur the possibility of the pain to which you have been so unhappily exposed. I was yesterday morning a complete sceptic on the subject of supernatural appearances. Nay, I am sure that, had I told you what was said about that room, the very reports would have induced you, by your own choice, to select it for your accommodation. It was my fortune, perhaps my error, but really cannot be termed fault, that you have been afflicted so strangely."

"Strangely, indeed!" said the general, resuming his temper; "and I acknowledge that I have no right to be offended with your lordship for treating me like what I think myself—a man of some firmness and courage. My post-horses are arrived, and I must not detain your lordship from your amusement."

"My old friend," said Lord Woodville, "since you cannot stay with us another day, which, indeed, I can no longer urge, give me at least half an hour more. You used to love pictures, and I have a gallery of portraits, some of them by Vandyke, representing ancestry to whom this property and castle formerly belonged. I think that several of them will strike you as possessing merit."

General Browne accepted the invitation, though somewhat unwillingly. It was evident he was not to breathe freely, or at ease, till he left Woodville castle far behind him. He could not refuse his friend's invitation, however; and the less so, that he was a little ashamed of the peevishness which he had displayed towards his well-meaning entertainer.

The general, therefore, followed Lord Woodville through several rooms, into a long gallery hung with pictures, which the latter pointed out to his guest, telling the names, and giving some account of the personages whose portraits presented themselves in progression. General Browne was but little interested in the details which these accounts conveyed to him. They were, indeed, of the kind which are usually found in an old family gallery. Here, was a cavalier who had ruined the estate in the royal cause; there, a fine lady who had reinstated it by contracting a match with a wealthy round-head. There, hung a gallant who had been in danger for corresponding with the exiled court at Saint Germain's; here, one who had taken arms for William at the revolution; and there, a third that had thrown his weight alternately into the scale of whig and tory.

While Lord Woodville was cramming these words into his guest's ear, "against the stomach of his sense," they gained the middle of the gallery, when he beheld General Browne suddenly start, and assume an attitude of the utmost surprise, not unmixed with fear, as his eyes were caught, and suddenly riveted, by a portrait of an old lady in a sacque, the fashionable dress of the end of the seventeenth century.

"There she is," he exclaimed, "there she is, in form and features, though inferior in demoniac expression to the accursed hag who visited me last night."

"If that be the case, said the young nobleman, "there can no longer remain any doubt of the horrible reality of your apparition. That is the picture of a wretched ancestress of mine, of whose crimes a black and fearful catalogue is recorded in a family history in my charter-chest. The recital of them would be too horrible: it is enough to say, that, in yon fatal apartment, incest and unnatural murder were committed. I will restore it to the solitude to which the better judgment of those who preceded me had consigned it; and never shall any one, so long as I can prevent it, be exposed to a repetition of the supernatural horrors which could shake such courage as yours."

Thus the friends who had met with such glee, parted in a very different mood; Lord Woodville to command the Tapestried Chamber to be unmantled, and the door built up; and General Browne to seek, in some less beautiful country, and with some less dignified friend, forgetfulness of the painful night which he had passed in Woodville Castle.

THE BUTTERFLY.

The butterfly was a gentleman,
Of no very good repute;
And he roved in the sunshine all day long,
In his scarlet and purple suit:
And he left his lady-wife at home,
In her own secluded bower;
Whilst he, like a bachelor, flirted about,
With a kiss for every flower.

His lady-wife was a poor glow-worm,
And seldom from home she'd stir;
She loved him better than all the world,
Though little he cared for her.
Unheeded she passed the day—she knew
Her lord was a rover then;
But, when night came on, she lighted her lamp,
To guide him over the glen.

One night the wanderer homeward came,
But he saw not the glow-worm's ray:
Some wild-bird saw the neglected one,
And flew with her far away.
Then beware, ye butterflies all, beware,
If to you such a time should come:
Forsaken by wandering lights, you'll wish
You had cherish'd the lamp at home.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

PRIDE.—Pride, in its usual acceptation, is an opinion of our superiority, far beyond what we can justly entertain. In different individuals we see it variously directed: some pride themselves on intellectual, others upon personal gifts: some derive to themselves merit from their ancestry, and others value, more than they deserve, the favours of fortune. In all these cases, admiration, submission to the will of judgment, and sometimes adulation, are required from surrounding connections and dependents, while the return granted—degrading the objects on whom it is bestowed—is either condescending affability, or contempt and scorn. Pride is easily mortified when the homage it demands is not duly paid; and by this mortification many disorders of the heart and mind are engendered and cherished—unjust anger, dislike, revenge and tyranny, ill-humour, and the loss of that cheerful spirit which is common to those only who are neither discontented with their fellow-creatures, nor with themselves or their lot in life.

PROPRIETY.—A venerable authoress, in one of her earliest publications, says, that propriety is to a woman what it has been said action is to an orator, the first, and second, and third essential: that propriety is the centre in which the lines of duty and amiability meet: and is to the character, what proportion is to the figure, and grace to the attitude. Propriety, thus characterized, is the union of every desirable quality in woman, by which her conduct and manners are influenced under every circumstance. Propriety never desires a deviation from any of the laws of refined society, and neither seeks notice nor admiration, which, from their natures, would be incompatible with its own characteristics. Improper familiarities, haughtiness, intrusive forwardness to superiors, and insolence to inferiors; the indulgence of any whim, by which our conduct to others may be influenced, are all equally unknown to propriety.

MANNER.—Ease of manner in a woman is very pleasing, when the self-possession which gives it is unaccompanied by masculine courage, or by an undue value for herself. In general, the manners will be free from any painful degree of constraint, when the mind is not engaged upon self, or occupied with the idea of exciting attention and admiration from those around. Affectation has its origin from these sources; and this, besides being a symptom of a weak mind, is entirely destructive of good manners. Good sense and simplicity of manners are generally companions, forming a natural gentility, which is far preferable to any artificial politeness, inasmuch as the one is a part of the individual herself, and the other only a garb worn when occasion calls for it. However, those who possess this natural gentility may, by mixing in good society, have the additional polish given to it, which afterwards distinguishes it as the perfection of good manners.

CONVERSATION.—Is there not range sufficient for the exercise of the greatest wit, or for the display of the liveliest humour, without touching upon hallowed or licentious ground? Good taste, as well as good feeling, if permitted to mark out the boundary of conversation, will yet leave space enough for it to "flow like waters after summer showers."

THE MIND.—A mind, even if not naturally vigorous, may receive from the aid of good principles the strength which nature has denied to it, and may be enabled to act with judgment and decision on every point which can be balanced in the scales of right and wrong.

SINCERITY.—Sincerity is as essential to the health of our minds, as wholesome food and pure air to our bodies. Whatever may be our other deficiencies and defects, this sterling virtue should be our sheet anchor.

RETIREMENT.—A life of retirement soon renders us unfit and unwilling to mingle in general society.

CENSURE.—Deserved censure is more difficult to endure than that which is unmerited.

PROVERBS.—Put a bridle on thy tongue, set a guard before thy lips, lest the words of thine own mouth destroy thy peace.

Let him that scoffeth at the lame, take care that he do not himself. Whoso speaketh of another's fault for pleasure, shall hear of his own with bitterness.

A talkative man is a nuisance to society of his babbling, the torrent of his words.

REFLECTIONS.

I look back on the vanished year, and sigh
To think upon its changes—Time has crushed
Hope's sweetest flowers, in passing on his course,
And left them, in their early bloom, to die.
My heart foreboded it—I knew, for me,
They could not blossom in their beauty long;
I knew that disappointment's blight must come,
Ere they had shed their fragrance o'er my path;
For it was ever thus: and each new bud,
Blown by the breath of this cold world, still wears
A paler, sicker hue. I hear the words,
"A happy new-year," and I look for those
Whose once-familiar voices seemed to thrill
Like echoes of sweet music on my ear.
I thought not that the change would come on all,
All I have loved—e'en he whom I had placed
Above all others, in my silent thoughts;
Whose name I never classed with other names;
Whose friendship was, to me, a sacred thing,
Shrined in my inmost soul, and kept apart
From other feelings—even he came not,
As he was wont, to hail the opening year,
To speak the hackneyed words of compliment
In custom's form—and leave the passing wish
For me to separate in memory
From blending voices, and to register
With unforgotten things. He never dreamed,
Perhaps, that the omission would be felt.
He thinks but little of the etiquette,
And idle ceremonies of the world.
Surrounded by admirers, he is still
A solitary being on this earth.
It is his destiny—for he was born
To tread the lofty and the lonely track
Of talent and of genius—and the crowd
Who seem to hold companionship with him,
Have still, in spirit, no communion. Life
Will be to him but as a meteor-spark,
Whose flashing light shall burst on others. Thus
The magic of his brilliant converse bids
The sands of time to glitter as they pass,
Like fabled gold beneath Pactolus' waves.
His smile comes o'er the anxious, troubled heart,
Like moonlight on the ocean—and his glance
Seems ever, like the first bright star of eve,
The harbinger of sparkling gems concealed.
But it is past for me. The parted year
Has borne its pleasures with it; and has left
Its marks of desolation on my heart.
What is existence worth, when its young hopes
Have proved a falsehood, and a mockery—
When its bright dreams have faded, and its joys
Are covered by the hand of ruin? Few
Would cling to life when happiness is fled;
But, that there still is spread such mystery
Over the "visioned future," that we wait
Unconsciously, for something yet in store;
Some unknown good, some unimagined bliss;
Some fertile spot amidst the desert waste,
Where bright and fragrant flowers may bloom again,
And form, like Pæstum's roses for the year,
A second spring in life.

ESTELLE.

THE REPOSITORY.

FROM THE ANNIVERSARY.

SIR GEORGE BEAUMONT,

BART.

We have met with few men whom we wished so much to meet again as Sir George Beaumont. We have met with men of greater talents, of higher rank, of equal learning, and of finer powers of conversation; but we never met with one who represented so gracefully and naturally the man of rank, of learning, and of literature. He had all the easy dignity which we assign to the Sidneys and the Raleighs of Elizabeth's court; united to the polished manners, refined taste, and sense of propriety which distinguish that of George the Fourth. His kindness of nature and generosity of heart were his own. The man and his manners had a dignity about them which were inherited, not copied. His learning was extensive, and sat gracefully on him, like an every-day dress; while his love of literature, and his admiration of art, dawned modestly out, and brightened upon you fuller and fuller.

He was of old descent, and had reason to be proud of it, for he came from a race of great warriors and poets, yet he was not proud; he had cause to be vain of his possessions, for they were ample, and of that picturesque kind which the owner loved, yet he was not vain; he had also good cause to be proud of his learning, his taste, his talents, and his influence, yet he seemed unconscious of them all. You could see at once that he was not of the common order of men, for his looks were full of talent and intelligence; nor could you fail to feel that the graceful and simple stateliness of his manners was something hereditary—belonged a little to other days, and had nothing at all to do with the upstart lordliness of those who are the first of their family that find a gold spoon in their mouths.

If we had uttered the words we have now written, during the lifetime of our friend, and had they been doubted by any one, a single glance of the unbeliever at Sir George Beaumont, at the company he loved to keep, and at the house which he inhabited, would have wrought his cure. At home, his good taste and his good sense were alike visible. His house was not a glittering museum of shells and spars, and specimens of clay and bits of bone, and cracked porringers, and things rare and strange, and dirty and far-fetched—for the walls were hung with the noblest paintings, the finest efforts of the human intellect, which taste and riches had united in obtaining; his shelves were stored with the learning and genius of all ages, and his table was surrounded by men who had a claim on the world, not because the fire-new stamp of honour was upon them, nor because their fathers had been the "tenth transmitter of a foolish face," but from the more unquestioned title, of learning, talent, and genius. Men were there whose genius honoured the age; men of rank, whose taste and attainments rendered their titles less necessary; the poets and the artists most famous in their time. Nor were they there because they happened to be momentary bubbles sparkling on the stream of fashion; but from a sense of their worth and a feeling of their merits. Their entertainer could taste their various excellencies for himself; he could anticipate their future as well as present fame; he was no feeder of the popular lion that roars in the mobs which surround the mere rich man's table.

There were few men of eminence with whom Sir George Beaumont was not friendly and familiar. Of the genius of Wordsworth he was a rewarder, as well as a warm admirer; and the poet has repaid his affection by many touching verses and graceful allusions embodied in his works. They were companions. They planted trees, planned arbours, erected altars, and ornamented fountains among the picturesque domains of Charnwood and Grace-Dieu; and nothing can display more touchingly the brotherhood of nature and union of taste and feeling than their joint employments. The fame of the poet was warmly aided by the friendship of Sir George. It is true that the original power of thought and deep sympathy with nature, and the supremacy claimed for genius over the artificial dignities of the earth, which distinguish the poet's works, were sure to make their way to public affection, for nature will assert her own power at last; but all this is wondrously facilitated by a friendly voice calling out, like the herald in scripture, "Behold the man whom the king delighteth to honour."

Let Wordsworth speak for himself of this honourable brotherhood. "Several of my best poems were composed under the shade of your own groves—upon the classic ground of Coleorton—where I was animated by the recollection of those illustrious poets of your name and family who were born in that neighbourhood; and, we may be assured, did not wander with indifference by the dashing stream of Grace-Dieu, and among the rocks that diversify the forest of Charnwood. Nor is there any one to whom such parts of this collection as have been inspired or coloured by the beautiful country from which I now address you, could be presented with more propriety than to yourself, who have composed so many admirable pictures from the suggestions of the same scenery."

To the former illustrious proprietor the poet elsewhere refers when he is singing of Coleorton—and refers very happily:

"There, on the margin of a streamlet wild,
"Did Francis Beaumont sport, an eager child;
"There, under shadow of the neighbouring rocks,
"Sang youthful tales of shepherds and their flocks;
"Unconscious prelude to heroic themes,
"Heartbreaking tears, and melancholy dreams
"Of slighted love, and scorn, and jealous rage,
"With which his genius shook the buskin'd stage."

This is very honourable to all. In an age like this, when the patrons of literature are far from abounding; and in a country where a marketable borough, which contains ten inhabitants, and returns two members to parliament, has more influence than all the genius of the land united, we could ill spare such a man as Sir George Beaumont. He lived long and profitably for his country; he influenced its works of art and its productions in literature, and gave his friendship to modest worth, and his protection to all who merited it.

We remember once of meeting at his table that wizard in conversation, Coleridge the poet. The discourse at first was discursive, and shifted with the shifting dishes; it glanced upon art, upon prose romances, and then shone full upon poetry. Coleridge burst out like a conflagration. We had met the inspired man before, and were aware of the untiring fascination of his eloquence, and how effectually he could keep a listener captive. It was at a midnight supper; he took up a prawn, and from that diminutive text preached upon the flux and reflux of the ocean, the wild theory of St. Pierre, the immensity of the leviathan, and the magnificence of the great deep. Had we supped upon a whale entire, he could not have done more with his subject. At the baronet's table, however, he seemed less inclined to pursue his wild career, though verse presented an ample field, and Lady Beaumont found time to say, "I wish, Mr. Coleridge, you would give us a volume of such poems as the Genevieve." "The Genevieve, my lady," said the bard, in a voice as musical as the inimitable poem itself, "I shall give you a far worthier work than the Genevieve." He then proceeded to draw the character of a work of a devout nature, in which his learning and his talent would be poured freely out; and if the excellence of the book equal the splendid summary of its contents, it will be a treasure to the church. From this a transition to the Revelation was easy and natural; but if it had been neither, the orator would have made it both, for he is unequalled in the art of transition, and never seems embarrassed for a moment. From the Revelation, the hand of his friend, the Rev. Edward Irving, was then seeking to lift the veil, and to this new and magnificent task the poet turned with sparkling eyes and glowing brow—he had found a theme suitable to his own lofty imagination, and as mystical as his own mind. How he soared! He appeared to think that the Apocalypse was a divine poem rather than a revelation.

We have said that Sir George Beaumont was a lover of art; he was much more; he was a very beautiful landscape painter. But he felt the poetry of the profession better than he could fix his conceptions in suitable colours. His works have less of the fresh glow of nature—the dashing freedom which deals with grand scenes, and the sunshiny radiance of open fields and sloping hills—than some of the high masters of the calling. He had the soul of the artist—he wanted the complete discipline of hand, without which all feeling is vain and useless. The dignity of his household was well maintained by his lady, who in look and taste so much resembled him that they seemed akin. We have known many men of old descent and fine taste, inheriting splendid houses and enjoying fair estates, but we know of no one who continues to the nation the dignified image which Sir George Beaumont has left on our heart and mind.

EATING.

Pars in frustra secant, veribusque tremantia figunt.
Ligne ab-uo locant alii, flammisque ministrant.
Tum victu revocant vires: fusique per herbas
Implentur veteris Bacchi, pinguisque ference.—Virgil.

The limbs, yet trembling, in the caldron boil;
Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil.
Stretched on the grassy turf at ease they dine,
Restore their strength with meat, and cheer their souls with wine.

My subject needs no elaborate explanation. It is our common lot thus to wind up the machinery of the human system, and I have often felt grateful to nature that she has made the process so agreeable. Notwithstanding the triumphs of intellect and the endearments of affection, the most scientific and sensitive descend like statues from their pedestals, and meet at the dinner-table upon a common level. The lover forgets his mistress and the poet his song, the mathematician studies out angles only upon his plate, and even the wretched wonder at the weakness of their mind and the meanness of their organization, which, after the ruin of all they most valued, still derive satisfaction from so unromantic a source. We all understand that eating and drinking are very ancient and general practices. Cookery has become a trade. Like the rest of the simple pleasures which nature has bestowed on man, civilization has elevated it to new importance. It has been cultivated with great assiduity by all enlightened nations. It has been moulded into extraordinary shapes, and hunted down into subtle refinements. Earth, air, and sea, are ransacked for discoveries, by which new combinations may be effected, and other objects collected to add to its treasures. The sciences descend from their wildest flights to minister to its wants and vary its perfection, and it branches out into such innumerable ramifications as, in many instances, to seem the sole and often the fatal object of man's existence. The suppers of Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, were said to have cost six thousand pounds every night, and Mark Antony expended sixty thousand pounds in an entertainment given to Cleopatra. Æsop, the famous Roman tragedian, had upon his table a single dish valued at eight hundred pounds, filled, we are told, with speaking and singing birds, some of which cost fifty pounds. His son dissolved pearls for his guests to drink, a piece of silly extravagance not uncommon among the ancients, and the king of Wurtemberg, who preceded the present monarch, is reported to have glutted his appetite with a hash composed of the tongues of nightingales.

It is asserted by physicians, that a great share of the diseases which have come into the world with its improvements, and which are unknown to nations in a barbarous state, result from immoderate eating and drinking; and it is probable that most of us have sufficiently experienced its evil consequence to acknowledge how it stupifies the spirits, and clogs the operations of the mind. Well said poor Cæsar,

"Let me have men around me that are fat
"Sleek-headed men, and such as sleep of nights.
"You Cassius has a lean and hungry look.
"He thinks too much—such men are dangerous."

Our bad habits of eating and drinking, like many others which pester us through our course of life, are formed during early youth. When master Dickey comes home from boarding-school he must be denied nothing which his appetite demands. Pa and ma think, while he has been away he has had nothing but thin beef-soup and stalo bread-and-butter, so now he must be compensated for his deprivations. Like the camel upon the desert, who, when he comes after weary travel to a delicious spring, not only quenches his present thirst, but drinks in sufficient to last him until he reaches another, so the dear boy is stuffed with the choicest morsels, and indulged with sips of the richest wines. The ordinary temperate fare of his school fades into insignificance when contrasted with the various profusion which here dazzles his eyes and seduces his appetite, and is afterwards associated with tedious confinements and hackneyed books. He trudges off to his old quarters, stuffed full of sweetmeats, giuberbread, and sugar-candy, and drags through his duties with careless haste, till time again conducts him to new dainties.

I remember one of my school-mates who was distinguished only for eating and drinking. Whether it was that a vulgar nature led him to seek gratification only in sensual enjoyments, or whether the excesses in which he indulged degraded a character not naturally bad to the level which it then occupied, might have been a question with some; yet it always seemed to me that he had not been created without many excellent qualities both of head and heart; but the habits of gluttony into which he had fallen, led him away from all lofty feelings and noble pursuits. He was the veriest young epicure I ever knew. To eat and drink seemed his only joy—to carve his only ambition. He adopted system about nothing except his victuals. He was mad if he could not get his favourite slice of beef or part of chicken, and he measured out the pepper, salt, mustard, and vinegar, with the precision of an apothecary weighing drugs. When the meal was concluded, grace pronounced, and his companions were in their ranks and marching out to their sports, I have often laughed to behold Peter sneaking back towards the dining-room, stealing affectionate glances at the relics which strewed the table, like the confused wrecks of a hard-fought field of battle, and peeping into the hollow bone of the abandoned beef to disengage the luscious marrow with the handle of a teaspoon. The same taste pervaded all his hours. He was never satisfied with the ordinary meals; but at frequent intervals would draw forth from some secret and seemingly inexhaustible source his little tit-bits, and you might catch him often with his back turned, swallowing, in solitary delight, the last of some nameless and particular piece of confectionary, which had probably haunted his imagination for the previous hour, until the temptation to despatch it admitted of no longer delay. His desk and his pockets were generally full of crumbs, and the leaves of half his books were stained with cranberry tarts, or glued together with little pieces of molasses candy. To feel an interest in his education was out of the question. He loathed his lesson as a labour, and hated his teacher as a tyrant. Fear of disgrace would not drive, nor the hope of approbation influence him.

We were all one day much amused by a scene between him and his instructor. It seems poor Peter had committed one of those heinous offences which generally swell the criminal records of such literary institutions, and his rude and reckless character, and uninteresting manners, rendered him, according to universal opinion, the most unlucky dog among them all. It was necessary to address him before his class. The venerable man upon whom this duty devolved was of a mild and insinuating disposition, and from the variety and extent of his information, and the unfeigned kindness of his manners, admirably calculated to acquire influence over his pupils. He possessed a kind of simple and natural eloquence, by which he could generally touch the heart as well as enlighten the understanding, and when he flung his hand across the strings of their feelings, the whole system thrilled. But friend Peter's strings were not fashioned of an over-delicate material, and as for the thrilling—heaven saw the mark!—you might as well have speechified to an old rail-fence. Peter's cause came on at the proper time. He was brought out in form, after the invariable fashion of seminaries of learning, and stood in the middle of the floor, in awful and conspicuous solitude. Around was a circle of some eighty or ninety faces—of all kinds of shapes and dimensions, full of inquiry and expectation—some slightly faded into unwonted paleness, from the mischievous representations of their own conscience, some distended with pity, and others wrinkled with mirth.

The master took his seat. The various noises of the eager crowd died entirely away. There stood Peter with his toes in; his hands—by no means "whiter than monumental alabaster"—twirling and twisting the corner of his pocket-flap into divers shapes—his head down, and his under lip out. The judge proceeded to the necessary preliminaries, and explained, in a clear style, the nature of his crime. This had little effect. He next appealed to his reason in a forcible manner, and demonstrated, from the intimate connexion which existed between wickedness and misery, that Peter was in a very bad way. Still the offender remained quiet, and appeared thinking about something else. The kind monitor then instituted a comparison between him and his more innocent and happy school-fellows. No change yet in the subject. His feelings were next attacked. He had a father, mother, and sisters. The disgrace of the transaction was not confined to himself: it extended to them; and, although he did not seem to suffer from remorse, what must be their sorrow? Peter stood all the while as if he had been hewn out of granite; not a feature of his face relaxed from the stupid firmness into which his dull and contented countenance had settled. But when, at length, he heard pronounced against him the awful sentence of bread-and-water for one or two days, his composure fled. The nerve was touched. His eyes filled with tears. His wide mouth was screwed up into wrinkles of anguish, and as the fragrant dishes, upon which his affections were now vainly placed, rose up in fancy before him, he seemed suffering under a pain as violent, if not as tender, as that of the lover who bids farewell to the object of all his thoughts.

I should probably have forgotten this little incident, had I not accidentally met friend Peter the other day in the street, and found, that although time has matured him from the boy into manhood, he yet preserves the same character, and has become exactly the kind of man which I had anticipated. I followed him before he recognized me, for some distance, and observed the old peculiarities of his dress and manner. He still walks with his toes in and his head down. His face retains all its ancient stupidity triumphant over the efforts of experience, and his hands, as they hung dangling down by his pocket-flaps, looked as if they had scarcely been thoroughly washed since the bread-and-water tragedy in which he was the principal actor. Some alterations, however, were obvious. The soft complexion and boyish form of youth had disappeared, and, in their place, he had a shape resembling Falstaff's, and a nose not unlike that of Bardolph's. He knew me after a moment's vacant stare, and invited me, before we had walked the distance of five blocks, to slip into a confectioner's and take a lunch. I was too polite to refuse, or else too curious to discover how much of his old appetite yet remained, so in we went. He drew largely on the long-necked cordial-bottle, whose oily sweets seemed rather to excite than quench his thirst; and the good woman's eyes sparkled to behold with what rapidity her cream-tarts, pound-cakes, and other nick-nacks, disappeared from before her.

I complimented him upon his good health.

"How do you know I am in good health?" he asked with a bluntness which brought back upon my memory a throng of half-faded associations.

"I perceive it by your appetite," answered I, "which is generally an excellent criterion."

"Pshaw, nonsense!" he exclaimed, munching a delicate tart with the energy of a steam-mill, and wiping off from his mouth the crumbs and apple with the sleeve of his coat. "Nonsense. I have been out of health these ten years. The doctors have almost given me up. The gout, dyspepsy, and two or three other complaints, allow me no peace. They have prescribed a course of diet; but that is worse than all the rest. I tried it a little while, however. They gave me thin chicken-broth, bread-and-milk, and roasted apples." Here he uttered a horse-laugh, and tossed into his mouth a couple of gingersnats with the motion of a cartman heaving coal into a cellar. "Bread-and-milk and roasted apples! But it would not do. I got along tolerably well for a day or two; but then I went to see a friend of mine about dinner time. There was a strong smell of roast turkey and onions in the room. I am very fond of onions. Up they came. Down I sat. I had eaten a hearty meal, rounded it off with a piece of mince-pie, and treated myself to a couple glasses of brandy-and-water, before the doctor came into my head at all. I never could go back to bread-and-milk and roasted apples. I know they would be the death of me.

I parted from him soon, and never saw him again. He fell down, a short time afterwards, in a fit of apoplexy, as he was returning from an ordinary where he had been partaking of a luncheon of mock-turtle soup.

REFLECTIONS.

I LOOK back on the vanished year, and sigh
 To think upon its changes—Time has crushed
 Hope's sweetest flowers, in passing on its course,
 And left them, in their early bloom, to die.
 My heart foreboded it—I knew, for me,
 They could not blossom in their beauty long;
 I knew that disappointment's blight must come,
 Ere they had shed their fragrance o'er my path;
 For it was ever thus: and each new bud,
 Blown by the breath of this cold world, still wears
 A paler, sicklier hue. I hear the words,
 "A happy new-year," and I look for those
 Whose once-familiar voices seemed to thrill
 Like echoes of sweet music on my ear.
 I thought not that the change would come on all,
 All I have loved—e'en he whom I had placed
 Above all others, in my silent thoughts;
 Whose name I never classed with other names;
 Whose friendship was, to me, a sacred thing,
 Shrined in my inmost soul, and kept apart
 From other feelings—even he came not,
 As he was wont, to hail the opening year,
 To speak the hackneyed words of compliment
 In custom's form—and leave the passing wish
 For me to separate in memory
 From blending voices, and to register
 With unforgotten things. He never dreamed,
 Perhaps, that the omission would be felt.
 He thinks but little of the etiquette,
 And idle ceremonies of the world.
 Surrounded by admirers, he is still
 A solitary being on this earth.
 It is his destiny—for he was born
 To tread the lofty and the lonely track
 Of talent and of genius—and the crowd
 Who seem to hold companionship with him,
 Have still, in spirit, no communion. Life
 Will be to him but as a meteor-spark,
 Whose flashing light shall burst on others. Thus
 The magic of his brilliant converse bids
 The sands of time to glitter as they pass,
 Like fabled gold beneath Pactolus' waves.
 His smile comes o'er the anxious, troubled heart,
 Like moonlight on the ocean—and his glance
 Seems ever, like the first bright star of eve,
 The harbinger of sparkling gems concealed.
 But it is past for me. The parted year
 Has borne its pleasures with it, and has left
 Its marks of desolation on my heart.
 What is existence worth, when its young hopes
 Have proved a falsehood, and a mockery—
 When its bright dreams have faded, and its joys
 Are covered by the hand of ruin? Few
 Would cling to life when happiness is fled;
 But, that there still is spread such mystery
 Over the "visioned future," that we wait
 Unconsciously, for something yet in store;
 Some unknown good, some unimagined bliss;
 Some fertile spot amidst the desert waste,
 Where bright and fragrant flowers may bloom again,
 And form, like Pæstum's roses for the year,
 A second spring in life.

THE REPOSITORY.

FROM THE ANNIVERSARY.

SIR GEORGE BEAUMONT,

BART.

WE have met with few men whom we wished so much to meet again as Sir George Beaumont. We have met with men of greater talents, of higher rank, of equal learning, and of finer powers of conversation; but we never met with one who represented so gracefully and naturally the man of rank, of learning, and of literature. He had all the easy dignity which we assign to the Sidneys and the Raleighs of Elizabeth's court; united to the polished manners, refined taste, and sense of propriety which distinguish that of George the Fourth. His kindliness of nature and generosity of heart were his own. The man and his manners had a dignity about them which were inherited, not copied. His learning was extensive, and sat gracefully on him, like an every-day dress; while his love of literature, and his admiration of art, dawned modestly on him, and brightened upon you fuller and fuller.

He was of old descent, for he came from a race he was not proud; he had no pretensions, for they were which the owner lovproud of it, poets, yet is possessed of a kind of grandeur, which also good cause to be proud of his learning, his taste, his talents, and his influence, yet he seemed unconscious of them all. You could see at once that he was not of the common order of men, for his looks were full of talent and intelligence; nor could you fail to feel that the graceful and simple stateliness of his manners was something hereditary—belonged a little to other days, and had nothing at all to do with the upstart lordliness of those who are the first of their family that find a gold spoon in their mouths.

If we had uttered the words we have now written, during the lifetime of our friend, and had they been doubted by any one, a single glance of the unbeliever at Sir George Beaumont, at the company he loved to keep, and at the house which he inhabited, would have wrought his cure. At home, his good taste and his good sense were alike visible. His house was not a glittering museum of shells and spars, and specimens of clay and bits of bone, and cracked porringers, and things rare and strange, and dirty and far-fetched—for the walls were hung with the noblest paintings, the finest efforts of the human intellect, which taste and riches had united in obtaining; his shelves were stored with the learning and genius of all ages, and his table was surrounded by men who had a claim on the world, not because the fire-new stamp of honour was upon them, nor because their fathers had been the "tenth transmitter of a foolish face," but from the more unquestioned title, of learning, talent, and genius. Men were there whose genius honoured the age; men of rank, whose taste and attainments rendered their titles less necessary; the poets and the artists most famous in their time. Nor were they there because they happened to be momentary bubbles sparkling on the stream of fashion; but from a sense of their worth and a feeling of their merits. Their entertainer could taste their various excellencies for himself; he could anticipate their future as well as present fame; he was no feeder of the popular lion that roars in the mobs which surround the mere rich man's table.

There were few men of eminence with whom Sir George Beaumont was not friendly and familiar. Of the genius of Wordsworth he was a rewarder, as well as a warm admirer; and the poet has repaid his affection by many touching verses and graceful allusions embodied in his works. They were companions. They planted trees, planned arbours, erected altars, and ornamented fountains among the picturesque domains of Charnwood and Grace-Dieu; and nothing can display more touchingly the brotherhood of nature and union of taste and feeling than their joint employments. The fame of the poet was warmly aided by the friendship of Sir George. It is true that the original power of thought and deep sympathy with nature, and the supremacy claimed for genius over the artificial dignities of the earth, which distinguish the poet's works, were sure to make their way to public affection, for nature will assert her own power at last; but all this is wondrously facilitated by a friendly voice calling out, like the herald in scripture, "Behold the man whom the king delighteth to honour."

Let Wordsworth speak for himself of this honourable brotherhood. "Several of my best poems were composed under the shade of your own groves—upon the classic ground of Coleorton—where I was animated by the recollection of those illustrious poets of your name and family who were born in that neighbourhood; and, we may be assured, did not wander with indifference by the dashing stream of Grace-Dieu, and among the rocks that diversify the forest of Charnwood. Nor is there any one to whom such parts of this collection as have been inspired or coloured by the beautiful country from which I now address you, could be presented with more propriety than to yourself, who have composed so many admirable pictures from the suggestions of the same scenery."

To the former illustrious proprietor the poet elsewhere refers when he is singing of Coleorton—and refers very happily:

"There, on the margin of a streamlet wild,
 Did Frank Beaumont sport, an eager child;
 "There, under shadow of the neighbouring rocks,
 Sang youthful tales of shepherds and their flocks;
 "Unconscious prelude to heroic themes,
 "Heartbreaking tears, and melancholy dreams
 "Of slighted love, and scorn, and jealous rage,
 "With which his genius shook the buskin'd stage."

This is very honourable to all. In an age like this, when the patrons of literature are far from abounding; and in a country where a marketable borough, which contains ten inhabitants, and returns two members to parliament, has more influence than all the genius of the land united, we could ill spare such a man as Sir George Beaumont. He lived long and profitably for his country; he influenced its works of art and its productions in literature, and gave his friendship to modest worth, and his protection to all who merited it.

We remember once of meeting at his table that wizard in conversation, Coleridge the poet. The discourse at first was discursive, and shifted with the shifting dishes; it glanced upon art, upon prose romances, and then shone full upon poetry. Coleridge burst out like a conflagration. We had met the inspired man before, and were aware of the untiring fascination of his eloquence, and how effectually he could keep a listener captive. It was at a midnight supper; he took up a prawn, and from that diminutive text preached upon the flux and reflux of the ocean, the wild theory of St. Pierre, the immensity of the leviathan, and the magnificence of the great deep. Had we supped upon a whale entire, he could not have done more with his subject. At the baronet's table, however, he seemed less inclined to pursue his wild career, though verse presented an ample field, and Lady Beaumont found time to say, "I wish, Mr. Coleridge, you would give us a volume of such poems as the Genevieve." "The Genevieve, my lady," said the bard, in a voice as musical as the inimitable poem itself, "I shall give you a far worthier work than the Genevieve." He then proceeded to draw the character of a work of a devout nature, in which his learning and his talent would be poured freely out; and if the excellence of the book equal the splendid summary of its contents, it will be a treasure to the church. From this a transition to the Revelation was easy and natural; but if it had been neither, the orator would have made it both, for he is unequalled in the art of transition, and never seems embarrassed for a moment. From the Revelation, the hand of his friend, the Rev. Edward Irving, was then seeking to lift the veil, and to this new and magnificent task the poet turned with sparkling eyes and glowing brow—he had found a theme suitable to his own lofty imagination, and as mystical as his own mind. How he soared! He appeared to think that the Apocalypse was a divine poem rather than a revelation.

We have said that Sir George Beaumont was a lover of art; he was much more; he was a very beautiful landscape painter. But he felt the poetry of the profession better than he could fix his conceptions in suitable colours. His works have less of the fresh glow of nature—the dashing freedom which deals with grand scenes, and the sunshiny radiance of open fields and sloping hills—than some of the high masters of the calling. He had the soul of the artist—he wanted the complete discipline of hand, without which all feeling is vain and useless. The dignity of his household was well maintained by his lady, who in look and taste so much resembled him that they seemed akin. We have known many men of old descent and fine taste, inheriting splendid houses and enjoying fair estates, but we know of no one who continues to the nation the dignified image which Sir George Beaumont has left on our heart and mind.

EATING.

Pars in frustra secant, verubosque tremantia figunt.
 Livore ab-nu locant alii, flammisque ministrant.
 Tum victu revocant vires: fusiue per herbas
 Implentur veteris Bacchi, pinguisque ference—Vergil.

The limbs, yet trembling, in the caldron boil;
 Some on the fire the reeking entrails broil;
 Stretched on the grassy turf at ease they dine,
 Restore their strength with meat, and cheer their souls with wine.

My subject needs no elaborate explanation. It is our common lot thus to wind up the machinery of the human system, and I have often felt grateful to nature that she has made the process so agreeable. Notwithstanding the triumphs of intellect and the endearments of affection, the most scientific and sensitive descend like statues from their pedestals, and meet at the dinner-table upon a common level. The lover forgets his mistress and the poet his song, the mathematician studies out angles only upon his plate, and even the wretched wonder at the weakness of their mind and the meanness of their organization, which, after the ruin of all they most valued, still derive satisfaction from so unromantic a source. We all understand that eating and drinking are very ancient and general practices. Cookery has become a trade. Like the rest of the simple pleasures which nature has bestowed on man, civilization has elevated it to new importance. It has been cultivated with great assiduity by all enlightened nations. It has been moulded into extraordinary shapes, and hunted down into subtle refinements. Earth, air, and sea, are ransacked for discoveries, by which new combinations may be effected, and other objects collected to add to its treasures. The sciences descend from their wildest flights to minister to its wants and vary its perfection, and it branches out into such innumerable ramifications as, in many instances, to seem the sole and often the fatal object of man's existence. The suppers of Heliogabalus, the Roman emperor, were said to have cost six thousand pounds every night, and Mark Antony expended sixty thousand pounds in an entertainment given to Cleopatra. Æsop, the famous Roman tragedian, had upon his table a single dish valued at eight hundred pounds, filled, we are told, with speaking and singing birds, some of which cost fifty pounds. His son dissolved pearls for his guests to drink, a piece of silly extravagance not uncommon among the ancients, and the king of Wurtemberg, who preceded the present monarch, is reported to have glutted his appetite with a hash composed of the tongues of nightingales.

It is asserted by physicians, that a great share of the diseases which have come into the world with its improvements, and which are unknown to nations in a barbarous state, result from immoderate eating and drinking; and it is probable that most of us have sufficiently experienced its evil consequence to acknowledge how it stupifies the spirits, and clogs the operations of the mind. Well said poor Cæsar,

"Let me have men around me that are fat
"Slew-headed men, and such as sleep o' nights.
"You Cæsar! has a lean and hungry look.
"He thinks too much—such men are dangerous."

Our bad habits of eating and drinking, like many others which pester us through our course of life, are formed during early youth. When master Dickey comes home from boarding-school he must be denied nothing which his appetite demands. Pa and ma think, while he has been away he has had nothing but thin beef-soup and stale bread-and-butter, so now he must be compensated for his deprivations. Like the camel upon the desert, who, when he comes after weary travel to a delicious spring, not only quenches his present thirst, but drinks in sufficient to last him until he reaches another, so the dear boy is stuffed with the choicest morsels, and indulged with sips of the richest wines. The ordinary temperate fare of his school fades into insignificance when contrasted with the various profusion which here dazzles his eyes and seduces his appetite, and is afterwards associated with tedious confinements and hackneyed books. He trudges off to his old quarters, stuffed full of sweetmeats, gingerbread, and sugar-candy, and drags through his duties with careless haste, till time again conducts him to new dainties.

I remember one of my school-mates who was distinguished only for eating and drinking. Whether it was that a vulgar nature led him to seek gratification only in sensual enjoyments, or whether the excesses in which he indulged degraded a character not naturally bad to the level which it then occupied, might have been a question with some; yet it always seemed to me that he had not been created without many excellent qualities both of head and heart; but the habits of gluttony into which he had fallen, led him away from all lofty feelings and noble pursuits. He was the veriest young epicure I ever knew. To eat and drink seemed his only joy—to carve his only ambition. He adopted system about nothing except his victuals. He was mad if he could not get his favourite slice of beef or part of chicken, and he measured out the pepper, salt, mustard, and vinegar, with the precision of an apothecary weighing drugs. When the meal was concluded, grace pronounced, and his companions were in their ranks and marching out to their sports, I have often laughed to behold Peter sneaking back towards the dining-room, stealing affectionate glances at the relics which strewed the table, like the confused wrecks of a hard-fought field of battle, and peeping into the hollow bone of the abandoned beef to disengage the luscious marrow with the handle of a teaspoon. The same taste pervaded all his hours. He was never satisfied with the ordinary meals; but at frequent intervals would draw forth from some secret and seemingly inexhaustible source his little tit-bits, and you might catch him often with his back turned, swallowing, in solitary light, the last of some nameless and particular piece of confectionary, which had probably haunted his imagination for the previous hour, until the temptation to despatch admitted of no longer delay. His desk and his pockets were generally full of crumbs, and the leaves of half his books were stained with cranberry tarts, or glued together with little pieces of molasses candy. To feel an interest in his education was out of the question. He loathed his lesson as a labour, and hated his teacher as a tyrant. Fear of disgrace would not drive, nor the hope of approbation influence him.

We were all one day much amused by a scene between him and his instructor. It seems poor Peter had committed one of those heinous offences which generally swell the criminal records of such literary institutions, and his rude and reckless character, and uninteresting manners, rendered him, according to universal opinion, the most unlucky dog among them all. It was necessary to address him before his class. The venerable man upon whom this duty devolved was of a mild and insinuating disposition, and from the variety and extent of his information, and the unfeigned kindness of his manners, admirably calculated to acquire influence over his pupils. He possessed a kind of simple and natural eloquence, by which he could generally touch the heart as well as enlighten the understanding, and when he flung his hand across the strings of their feelings, the whole system thrilled. But friend Peter's strings were not fashioned of an over-delicate material, and as for the thrilling—heaven saw the mark—you might as well have speechified to an old rail-fence. Peter's cause came on at the proper time. He was brought out in form, after the invariable fashion of seminaries of learning, and stood in the middle of the floor, in awful and conspicuous solitude. Around was a circle of some eighty or ninety faces—of all kinds of shapes and dimensions, full of inquiry and expectation—some slightly faded into unwonted paleness, from the mischievous representations of their own conscience, some distended with pity, and others wrinkled with mirth.

The master took his seat. The various noises of the eager crowd died entirely away. There stood Peter with his toes in; his hands—by no means "whiter than monumental alabaster"—twirling and twisting the corner of his pocket-flap into divers shapes—his head down, and his under lip out. The judge proceeded to the necessary preliminaries, and explained, in a clear style, the nature of his crime. This had little effect. He next appealed to his reason in a forcible manner, and demonstrated, from the intimate connexion which existed between wickedness and misery, that Peter was in a very bad way. Still the offender remained quiet, and appeared thinking about something else. The kind monitor then instituted a comparison between him and his more innocent and happy school-fellows. No change yet in the subject. His feelings were next attacked. He had a father, mother, and sisters. The disgrace of the transaction was not confined to himself: it extended to them; and, although he did not seem to suffer from remorse, what must be their sorrow? Peter stood all the while as if he had been hewn out of granite; not a feature of his face relaxed from the stupid firmness into which his dull and contented countenance had settled. But when, at length, he heard pronounced against him the awful sentence of bread-and-water for one or two days, his composure fled. The nerve was touched. His eyes filled with tears. His wide mouth was screwed up into wrinkles of anguish, and as the fragrant dishes, upon which his affections were now vainly placed, rose up in fancy before him, he seemed suffering under a pain as violent, if not as tender, as that of the lover who bids farewell to the object of all his thoughts.

I should probably have forgotten this little incident, had I not accidentally met friend Peter the other day in the street, and found, that although time has matured him from the boy into manhood, he yet preserves the same character, and has become exactly the kind of man which I had anticipated. I followed him before he recognized me, for some distance, and observed the old peculiarities of his dress and manner. He still walks with his toes in and his head down. His face retains all its ancient stupidity triumphant over the efforts of experience, and his hands, as they hung dangling down by his pocket-flaps, looked as if they had scarcely been thoroughly washed since the bread-and-water tragedy in which he was the principal actor. Some alterations, however, were obvious. The soft complexion and boyish form of youth had disappeared, and, in their place, he had a shape resembling Falstaff's, and a nose not unlike that of Bardolph's. He knew me after a moment's vacant stare, and invited me, before we had walked the distance of five blocks, to slip into a confectioner's and take a lunch. I was too polite to refuse, or else too curious to discover how much of his old appetite yet remained, so in we went. He drew largely on the long-necked cordial-bottle, whose oily sweets seemed rather to excite than quench his thirst; and the good woman's eyes sparkled to behold with what rapidity her cream-tarts, pound-cakes, and other nick-nacks, disappeared from before her.

I complimented him upon his good health.

"How do you know I am in good health?" he asked with a bluntness which brought back upon my memory a throng of half-faded associations.

"I perceive it by your appetite," answered I, "which is generally an excellent criterion."

"Pshaw, nonsense!" he exclaimed, munching a delicate tart with the energy of a steam-mill, and wiping off from his mouth the crumbs and apple with the sleeve of his coat. "Nonsense. LOVE.

BY PERCY BYSSHE SHELLEY.

WHAT is love? Ask him who lives, what is life; ask him who adores, what is God.

I know not the internal constitution of other men, nor even of thine whom I now address. I see that in some external attributes they resemble me, but when, misled by that appearance, I have thought to appeal to something in common and unburthen my inmost soul to them, I have found my language misunderstood, like one in a distant and savage land. The more opportunities they have afforded me for experience, the wider has appeared the interval between us, and to a greater distance have the points of sympathy been withdrawn. With a spirit ill fitted to sustain such proof, trembling and feeble through its tenderness, I have every where sought, and have found only repulse and disappointment.

Thou demandest what is love. It is that powerful attraction towards all we conceive, or fear, or hope beyond ourselves, when we find within our own thoughts the chasm of an insufficient void, and seek to awaken in all things that are, a community with what we experience within ourselves. If we reason, we would be understood; if we imagine, we would that the airy children of our brain were born anew within another's; if we feel, we would that another's nerves should vibrate to our own, that the beams of their eyes should kindle at once and mix and melt into our own; that lips of motionless ice should not reply to lips quivering and burning with the heart's best blood—this is love. This is the bond and the sanction which connects not only man with man, but with every thing which exists. We are born into the world, and there is something within us, which, from the instant that we live, more and more thirsts after its likeness. We dimly see within our intellectual nature, a miniature as it were of our entire self, yet deprived of all that we condemn or despise, the ideal type of every thing excellent and lovely that we are ble of conceiving as belonging to the nature of man. Not only the portrait of our external being, but an assemblage of the minutest particles of which our nature is composed: a mirror whose surface reflects only the forms of purity and brightness: a soul within our own soul that describes a circle around its proper paradise, which pain and sorrow and evil dare not overleap. To this we eagerly refer all sensations, thirsting that they should resemble and correspond with it. The discovery of its antitype; the meeting with an understanding capable of clearly estimating our own; an imagination which should enter into and seize upon the subtle and delicate peculiarities which we have delighted to cherish and unfold in secret, with a frame, whose nerves, like the chords of two exquisite lyres, strung to the accompaniment of one delightful voice, vibrate with the vibrations of our own; and a combination of all these in such proportion as the type within demands: this is the invisible and unattainable point to which love tends; and to attain which, it urges forth the powers of man to arrest the faintest shadow of that, without the possession of which, there is no rest nor respite to the heart over which it rules. Hence in solitude, or that deserted state when we are surrounded by human beings, and yet they sympathize not with us, we love the flowers, the grass, the waters, and the sky. In the motion of the very leaves of spring, in the blue air, there is then found a secret correspondence with our heart.—There is eloquence in the tongueless wind, and a melody in the flowing brooks and the rustling of the reeds beside them, which, by their inconceivable relation to something within the soul, awakens the spirits to dance of breathless rapture, and bring tears of mysterious tenderness to the eyes, like the enthusiasm of patriotic success, or the voice of one beloved singing to you alone. Sterne says, that if he were in a desert he would love some cypress. So soon as this want or power is dead, man becomes a living sepulchre of himself, and what yet survives is the mere husk of what once he was.

VARIETIES.

AS FAIR AS I AM.—The following anecdote of Benjamin West, the celebrated artist, a native of Pennsylvania, is copied from a volume of his memoirs, compiled by John Galt. In the early part of his life he visited Rome for the purpose of studying the fine arts, where he was kindly received by many distinguished gentlemen. Mr. Robinson, his conductor, had accompanied him to the house of an English gentleman, where an evening party was to be held. Among the distinguished persons whom Mr. West found in the company, was the celebrated cardinal Albani. His eminence, although quite blind, had acquired, by the exquisite delicacy of his touch, and the combining powers of his mind, such a sense of ancient beauty, that he excelled all the virtuosi then in Rome, in the correctness of his knowledge of the verity and peculiarities of the smallest medals and intaglios. Mr. Robinson conducted the artist to the inner apartment, where the cardinal was sitting, and said, "I have the honour to present a young American, who has a letter of introduction to your eminence, and who has come to Italy for the purpose of studying the fine arts." The cardinal, fancying that the American must be an Indian, exclaimed, "Is he black or white?" and on being told that he was very fair, "What, as fair as I am?" cried the cardinal, still more surprised. This latter expression excited a good deal of mirth at the cardinal's expense, for his complexion was of the darkest Italian olive, and West's was even of more than the usual degree of English fairness. For some time after, if it be not still in use, the expression of "as fair as the cardinal," acquired proverbial currency in the Roman conversations, applied to persons who had any inordinate conceit of their own beauty.

A BOLD PRACTITIONER.—A steam doctor in Cincinnati, in a publication, acknowledges that he actually had the temerity to take a dose of his own medicine, in presence of a witness; and to the astonishment of Æsculapius, he survived it.

PIQUANT REPROOF.—The Chevalier Duplessis, a very middling poet, and author of a bad opera, called Pizarro, used to indulge himself in the bitterest satire against other poets. Once he asserted, with great vehemence, that he did not know a worse lyric poet than Guillard. Cheron, the actor, archly replied, "Ah, chevalier, you forget yourself."

ON HEARING A LADY PLAY ON THE PIANO.

Whence come those strains that onward roll,
And, gently rising with seraphic swell,
Enchain each sense, and bind the soul
In music's soft and mystic spell?
Is that some bard of former days,
Who wakes his harp of ancient fire;
That sings again prophetic lays,
And strikes with master-hand the lyre?
Ah, no! those notes, so soft and clear,
From Mary's hand derive their charm;
Her gentle touch enchants the ear,
And bids the heart with rapture warm.
Then, Mary, strike those chords again,
For ever thus my senses bind;
Thy touch can free the heart from pain,
And wake to ecstasy the drooping mind.

AWKWARD MISTAKE.—A mistake of rather an awkward description occurred a few evenings ago to a couple of youthful lovers, residing not far from Chelmsford. The unfortunate swain, it appears, had incurred the displeasure of his mistress's father, who forbade him to enter the house, and laid a strict injunction on his daughter not to "pass the threshold" without leave. This she obeyed to the very letter, but hit upon an expedient to gratify her lover also, by breaking a square of glass in the pantry window, through which many

"A long, long kiss—a kiss of youth and love," had been given. Three times had the square been replaced, and four times had it been broken, when Miss attributing it to the cats, her father concealed himself in the place, in order to watch. About ten o'clock, the lover approached, with slow and "cautious step;" which the father hearing, put his face to the aperture, to ascertain who was coming at "that unhallowed hour;" and the swain, mistaking it for his soul's softest treasure," saluted him with the "heart's token." The whiskered face made him start. "By heavens!" thought he, "it is not you—it is somebody else;" and soon the direful truth flashed upon him, in the shape of the sturdy farmer and an old musket. A parley now ensued, and the mistaken swain agreeing to pay the glazier's bill, he was allowed to depart.

NAPOLEON AND THE STONE-CUTTER.—Napoleon, when in the height of his power, being once at Amiens, whilst traversing the square, in the midst of the acclamations of the inhabitants who had assembled around him, cast his eyes upon the multitude, and perceived, in one of the corners of the square, a stone-cutter, who had not been induced to quit his work by the curiosity which animated the crowd by whom he was surrounded. The indifference of this man excited the curiosity of Napoleon. He wished to know something about him; and, passing through the crowd, urged on his horse until he arrived close to him. "What are you doing there?" said Napoleon. The workman raised his eyes, and recognised the emperor "I am cutting stone." "You have served under me," quickly observed the emperor, who recognised an old soldier. "It is true, sire." "You were present at the campaign of Egypt—you were a brigadier in such a corps?" "Yes, sire." "Why have you quitted the service?" "Because I had completed my time, and obtained my discharge." "I am sorry for it; you were a brave man—I shall be happy to do for you any thing in my power: say, what do you require from me?" "That your majesty will leave me to cut my stone in quiet; my work suffices me; I am in want of nothing." This fact brings to mind the interview of Diogenes with Alexander; but the modest pride of the Greek philosopher was not equal to the reply of the stone-cutter.

LOVE AND RESPECT.—The following lines—says the American—were written by an elderly lady of this city, on receiving a pair of scissors from a friend:

How sweet to the heart, when stricken in years,
When the lamp of existence burns dimly and slow,
Is a proof of regard; for attention endears
The profession of friendship you warmly bestow.
No fears are allied to my bosom whatever,
That a sharp-pointed steel could have any effect
On the cherished affection that time cannot sever,
For the friend and the donor I love and respect.

SEA AIR.—The atmosphere, in the vicinity of the sea, usually contains a portion of the muriates over which it has been wafted. It is a curious fact, but well ascertained, that the air best adapted to vegetables is pernicious to animal life, and vice versa. Now, upon the sea-coast, accordingly, animals thrive and vegetables decline.

FLOWERS.—The following fact is deserving of record, as an interesting addition to what has hitherto been discovered on the subject of vegetable physiology, and as enabling the lovers of flowers to prolong for a day the enjoyment of their short-living beauty. Most flowers begin to fade after being kept twenty-four hours in water; a few may be revived by submitting fresh water; but all—the most fugacious, such as the poppy, and perhaps one or two others excepted—may be completely restored by the use of hot water. For this purpose, place the flowers in scalding water, deep enough to cover about one third of the stem, and, by the time the water has become cold, the flowers will become erect and fresh; then cut off the codled ends and put them into cold water.

LONGEVITY OF A BEE.—A short time ago—says a Hull paper—the stone-masons employed in repairing Trinity church, when cutting down one of the jambs of the stone work of an old window, found a bee within an aperture in the centre of the stone, where it is supposed to have been confined for at least five hundred years! The insect was quite lively; indeed, attraction was drawn to the stone by its humming, on a chisel being withdrawn, which had been driven into the jamb; and it would have taken flight had not one of the workmen enclosed it in a glass. After that period it gradually became more and more torpid, until the other evening, when apparently it ceased to exist. The bee, and the fragment of the stone in which it was discovered, are in the possession of the workmen, by whom they have been exhibited to a great number of persons. The aperture, in size and shape, would contain a small pear, and there was not the least seam or outlet in the stone by which air could be admitted.

SPLENDID BANKER.—It was in the reign of Edward VI. and his father, that the very celebrated firm of the Foulcare, Foulkers, or Fuggers—as called in the King's Journal—was established at Antwerp; a firm to which the sovereigns of Europe, in general, were driven to have recourse for assistance in the way of loans. From this firm, the Emperor Charles V. in particular, had borrowed a very large sum, in order to carry on his famous expedition against Tunis. The emperor, afterwards, in the year 1534, had occasion to visit Antwerp, and was invited by Fugger to a grand entertainment at his house; on which occasion the proud, but liberal banker, caused a fire to be made in his hall entirely of cinnamon, and when lighted, threw into it, before the face of the emperor, all the imperial bonds. Eleven years after this, the very same merchant gave to Henry VIII. of England, an acquittance for the sum of one hundred and fifty-two thousand one hundred and eighty pounds, Flemish, which the king had borrowed of him.

DENNIS THE CRITIC.—Among the peculiarities of this author was his intolerance of punning. So much did he execrate this species of wit, that he would quit the company where puns were made and tolerated. One night, at Button's, Steele was desirous of excluding Dennis from a party he wished to make, but which he could not conveniently manage, Dennis being at that time in the coffee-room. While he was at a loss to get rid of him, he observed Rowe sitting on the opposite side of the box to Dennis, the latter of whom he asked, "What was the matter with him?" "Why do you ask the question?" inquired the critic. Steele replied, "you appear to me like an angry waterman, for you look one way and Rowe another." The effect of this pun was successful; and the critic left the room execrating all puns and punsters.

DOUBLE MISTAKE.—An Englishman, travelling a few weeks since in one of the northern mails, in company with an Irishman, charged the latter with having taken his handkerchief; but, on afterwards finding it in his own hat, where he himself had placed it, he stammered out an apology, and expressed a hope that no offence would be taken at what he had said. The Irishman answered, quite gaily—"Faith, an' as to that, you may keep your mind aisy. I, sur, was as far wrong as yourself; for you, you know, took me for a rogue, and I, botheration, took you for a gentleman."

HOW TO DRY A CANDLE.—In a village not far from Chester, a lady entered her kitchen, and found the oven swimming with grease. On asking the servant, a Welsh girl, the cause, the Cambrian maid answered with the greatest simplicity, "Look you, mistress, the candle was fall in the water, and I was put her in the oven to dry."

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

NEW-YORK.

Famed city of Gotham—proud queen of the west!

With your steeples and spires, and short narrow streets;
Your Park and your Broadway, and, what I like best,
Your wave-girdled garden and Battery with seats!
Your Hall of white marble, which looks, where it stands,
Like hope springing up from surrounding despair;
Your bay, sprinkled over with ships from all lands,
And small-craft as countless as birds of the air.

Proud city of Gotham—where mirth, wit, and song,
Flow free as the streams your manhattan supplies,
Where the day would be short were it ever so long,
For the gay, busy throngs who catch time as he flies.
The mart for all ages—the refuge for all,
Where nature's antipodes neighbourly greet:
Salmagundi of cities—where nothing can pall,
For salt, sweet, and sour promiscuously meet.

Fair city of Gotham—though "crooked your ways,"
Like spots on the sun, your defects all appear,
The tongue of the poet has spoken your praise,
Yes, "enterprise, genius, and spirit are here."
Where wit is home-made, ay, and sentiment too,
Where editors flourish, and newspapers thrive;
Where nothing is thought of, but just something new,
And constant excitement keeps fancy alive.

Famed city of Gotham—though often my way
Thro' your long muddy streets I've been forced to inquire,
Still justice and candour compel me to say,
Though much to condemn, you've far more to admire.
There the warm social current unfrozen may flow,
And the spice of variety gives it a zest:
Great city of Gotham—this much we all know,
Thou'rt of places the oddest, the worst and the best.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Infant Schools.—It is high time that the public attention, in this city, should be directed to the general encouragement and support of these useful establishments. We believe that to Mr. Brougham is due the credit of having first demonstrated their utility in a number of spirited and practical essays which appeared in the English reviews, and which attracted no small share of attention here. Repeated attempts have been made, in consequence, to introduce them into our large towns, and in Boston these attempts have been remarkably successful. At a fair, lately held in that enlightened place, for the benefit of two infant school societies, and which was conducted exclusively by the ladies as managers, the amount received for sale of tickets of admission was five hundred and nine dollars and eleven cents; for the sale of articles for Salem-street school, one thousand five hundred and nineteen dollars and two cents, and for the sale of those of the Bedford-street school, six hundred dollars—total, two thousand six hundred and twenty-eight dollars and thirteen cents. This exhibition of liberality is highly creditable to "the cradle of American liberty," and, we hope, it will be imitated in New-York. It may not be uninteresting to state, in this place, the more immediate plans upon which these schools are founded, and the good results attending their successful erection. Children, from eighteen months to six years old, are admitted, and, for their accommodation, an ample and well ventilated apartment, a spacious play-ground, and means of recreation and amusement, combined with those of instruction and general improvement, are liberally provided. The mind of the infant is directed to the attainment of knowledge by having presented to it sensible objects, calculated, by their agreeable and useful qualities, to awaken its curiosity and furnish it with ideas. Moral example and instruction are, however, the leading features of the system, and it is to the beneficial effects resulting from an enlightened administration of these indispensable helps to virtue and knowledge, that the greatest blessings of these infantile seminaries are to be attributed. Objections have been raised against them, on the ground that children are removed from parental authority, and are thus exposed to a diminution, if not an utter extinction of social and family relations. Allowing full force to this argument, it will apply to those cases only in which parents have the means and the capacity to inspire their offspring with these desirable affections. A large class of the community, however, is prevented, by necessity, from attending to this duty; and the nature of their avocations too, frequently removes them, for the greater portion of their time, from home altogether. Their infants are then left either wholly unattended ed to, or in the care of some inexperienced and indiscreet person, generally a child itself. It is to meet the exigencies of this class, more especially, that these institutions are intended; and it requires no deep sagacity, or acquaintance with the facts of the case, to foresee the immense advantages attending their establishment amongst us.

State of Education in New-York.—If we were called upon to designate the most meritorious and public-spirited of our citizens, we do not know whom we could, in fairness, name before the teachers of the Sunday schools. Their disinterested application of time and talent to the noble object of redeeming the rising generation from ignorance and vice, fully entitles them to this distinguished rank. Not satisfied, however, with the cold and bare performance of a duty voluntarily assumed, they have displayed an ardour and enthusiasm above all praise. Undertaking the laborious task of investigating the condition of the whole population of this diversified and large city, they have ascertained the extent to which education has been enabled to reach its hallowed influences, and the actual wants and sufferings to which a large number is in this important view still subjected. From the returns furnished from ten out of the fourteen wards, and partial returns from all, excepting the tenth, it appears that there are twenty-two thousand and two children, between the ages of four and fifteen living in these wards. Of these, nine thousand three hundred and sixty-eight attend Sunday schools, and twelve thousand five hundred and sixty-eight do not; four thousand six hundred and forty-three are willing to attend; five thousand six hundred and twenty-five attend the public schools, and four thousand five hundred and sixty-eight attend no day-school. There are three hundred and fifty-five white adults who cannot read; twelve hundred and eighty-nine blacks who do read, and nine hundred and sixty blacks who do not. There are fit subjects, under four years of age, for the infant school, three thousand four hundred and forty. These statements are alike interesting to the philanthropist, the political economist, and the mere inhabitant of New-York, jealous of its reputation for diffused intelligence and moral character. They call aloud upon every thinking mind to lend its active efforts in support of a system calculated to extend the dominion of knowledge, and lessen the amount of poverty, infamy, and general ruin.

Ladies' Reading Room.—It is in contemplation to establish a ladies' reading room in Boston. We shall not wish our brethren of "Athens" joy on the success of the scheme. It has, to us, a most unfeminine and untoward aspect. What! remove our wives, mothers and sisters, even in the hours they devote to intellectual recreation, from their proper sphere and circle at home! What becomes, then, of "the domestic duties" and the endearing ties which bind our rougher sex to the fireside, lighted up more by the animated smiles of the beings which welcome us there, than even by the intense flames of the most brilliant Lehigh? Away with the thought! It is enough to dye the whole population blue.

Gymnastics for Ladies.—An institution to extend to females the benefits of physical, in addition to their moral and intellectual education, has been established in Paris under very favourable auspices. Mad'llie Masson, who has, for twenty years, devoted her time and attention to this subject, is the conductress of the establishment, while Dr. Morge, a physician of talents and experience, assists her in regulating the degrees of exercise suitable to each individual case. All the means calculated to develop the bodily strength, and impart to the muscles and limbs grace and agility, are put in requisition. The parallel bars, the spring-board, the ladder, dumb bells, &c. are had recourse to. These instruments, used with judgment, may even be used for the invaluable purpose of removing or correcting personal deformities, such as high shoulders, irregular projections of the spine and ribs, and curvatures of the same, when not too far advanced. To reduce distortions generally, no means are more useful; and in promoting the general health, affording an innocent and healthful source of recreation, and diverting the youthful mind in its hours of leisure from foolish or dangerous amusements, none are more efficient or more generally approved of by the medical and moral philosopher. We sincerely hope to see similar institutions successfully attempted in the United States, and particularly in this city.

Literature in New-York.—It is stated, in some of the daily papers, that one bookselling establishment alone, in Philadelphia, has paid to authors, during the last year, the sum of twenty thousand dollars, and that they expect to pay thirty thousand in the current year. If this be indeed the case, and we have no reason to dispute it, it may be regarded as an honourable and decisive evidence of the advancement made by the inhabitants of that city in general literature, and of their generous encouragement of its professed votaries. We should be pleased to ascertain the amount paid by all the biblioplists of New-York for the same purpose, and in the same period; but we much fear it would leave an overwhelming balance against us, and one not much calculated to flatter our vanity. There are, in fact, so many other evidences existing of a deficiency of literary taste in New-York, that we think it the bounden duty of every one of its journalists to direct public attention to the lamentable fact, and lend his efforts towards awakening a better spirit in the community. Certain it is, that no means more efficacious can be suggested in diverting the ardent mind of youth from the pursuits of idleness and dissipation, than the diffusion of a taste for elegant literature, and the formation of intellectual habits. Removed at once from the seducing but gross joys of sense, and the uninviting mysteries of profound and abstract studies, they offer to all classes, of whatever rank, age, or occupation, the most delightful and edifying themes for thought and employment in the hours necessarily abstracted from the fatigues and cares of business, and wisely devoted to reflection and amusement. And it is a just remark, often made, that in proportion to the relish evinced by a people for the belles-lettres and the fine arts, is the estimate of their moral and intellectual character to be more or less favourable. What result the application of this test to our citizens would produce, we are not prepared to say. The removal of Signor Daponte's Italian library to Washington does not, in our opinion, warrant a very auspicious decision. After the rapturous love, affected by certain classes since the introduction of the Italian opera, for whatever related to Italy and its rich stores of elegant and finished composition, we are utterly at a loss to account for the want of spirit that could not be awakened to a single effort to detain that valuable and varied collection here. Is it not, with justice, suspected, that the professions of attachment to Rossini and Monti, which were in the mouth of every would-be dilettante, were the mere offspring of conceit and imitation? Far be it from us to underrate the talent, the learning, and the cultivated taste, abundantly existing in our community; but a master-mind seems wanting to collect the scattered rays, give them a proper direction and force, and elicit their real intellectual fire, to enlighten and adorn our literary horizon. A day will come, sooner or later, fraught with these happy results. Be it our individual care and aim not to retard, but accelerate its advent.

Increase of Pauperism.—It appears that the number of paupers in New-York has increased, during the past year, to an alarming extent, viz. from sixteen hundred and sixty-five to two thousand one hundred and twenty-nine, or twenty-eight per cent. a ratio truly astonishing, when we consider the general state of the country. This surprise will abate much of its force, however, when we investigate the local condition and history of our city for the last twelve months. The number of strangers who arrived in the port, during that period, has been eighteen thousand nine hundred and forty-five, a number which, of itself, was sufficient to furnish the addition made to our pauper list. When to this fact are added the great depression of commerce, stopping up the avenues to employment among the lower classes—there being no houses, or but few, erecting; no ships on the stocks, and few coming in or going out—we shall have sufficient means to account for the increase of distress and suffering, without having recurrence, as many of our contemporaries have had, to the dram-shop and the theatre. These, undoubtedly, have some share in producing the evil; but it is comparatively trifling. Both of them are necessarily neglected for the want of the wherewith to enter the one and make the usual libation at the other.

In Press.—We are requested to state that "Adalia, or the Belles of Broadway, with particulars of the last fancy ball, a poem, by a member of good society," is in press, and will shortly be published.

Bachelors' Ball.—The approaching anniversary of St. Valentine will be celebrated by a splendid ball, at the city hotel. A brisk, dapper, young bachelor, has just called to inform us that it will be "a most brilliant affair."

MARIUS IN PRISON.

"A Gaul was commanded to cut off his head in the dungeon, but the stern countenance of Marius disarmed the courage of the executioner, and when he heard the exclamation of 'Tunc, homo, audes occidere Calpum Marium,' the dagger dropped from his hand. They released Marius from prison," &c.—
Lempriere.

THE bolt, the bar, the massy wall,
The damp discoloured stone,
The light that scarcely deigned to fall
Upon a scene so lone;
All—all betrayed a prison's gloom,
A dungeon's cheerless cave,
And spoke to him within that room
A speedy grave.

But he upon his couch of straw
Slept quietly and deep,
And even then the Roman saw
Proud visions in his sleep;
For Glory to her votary came,
And crowned his care-worn brow,
And conquered nations, at his name,
Bent deep and low.

But soon he woke; no sign of fear
Whitened his crimson cheek,
Though on his calm and listening ear
Came harsh the portal's creak.
Shall he who bears a thousand scars,
Whose falchion waved so high,
The victor in an hundred wars,
Thus basely die?

He spurned the dust beneath his feet,
He raised his chains on high,
And looked a rock prepared to meet
The lightnings of the sky.
With eagle eye, with giant frame,
With deeply knitted brow,
And robed within his mighty name,
Stood Marius now.

With steady pace the Gaul came on;
"Spare my course is o'er,
And thy crimes are done,
There no more."

He raised the glittering brand on high,
With bare and nerve-strained arm;
He caught the Roman's steady eye,
Fearless of harm:

And Marius still before him stood,
Calmly erect and proud,
And, keeping on his dauntless mood,
Burst forth in accents loud:
"Darest thou to raise thy servile hands
Against a Roman free?
"Tis Marius that before thee stands;
"Hence, slave, and flee."

Then pallid grew the Gaul's red cheek,
Then powerless fell his brand—
To one so proud he dared not speak,
Or 'gainst him raise his hand.
Thus Marius lived—with Roman gore
To swell the Tiber's stream,
And, as a conqueror, once more
Fulfilled his dream. G. A. S.

FROM THE BLOU.

WOMAN.

BY THE ETTRICK SHEPHERD.

Ay, now I've lit upon a theme
Unbounded, thrilling, and supreme;
So let me try my mountain lore
In the oblivious theme once more;
For what is bard, with all his art,
Who scorns to take the fair one's part,
And never hath in life perceived—
What once I sparingly believed—
That woman's fair and lovely breast
Was framed the sanctuary blest,
The home, all other homes above,
Of virtuous and of faithful love?
Sweet sex! I fear, with all my zeal,
I ne'er can laud you as I feel:
If nature's glowing hand imbue
Thy early bloom with beauty's dew,
Stamp in thine eye the 'witching wile,
And light with love thy opening smile,
Ere prudence rises to thine aid,
A thousand snares for thee are laid:

While still to revel, wrong or right,
Among these snares is thy delight.
'Tis thus that thousands wreck'd and hurl'd
From virtue's paths, traverse the world,
Regardless of creation's scorn,
Unblest, unfavoured, and forlorn.
Oh! take not one degraded mind
For model of dear womankind;
But let us rise in our compare,
To beauties of the earth and air,
With their revenges—range the sea,
The wood, the waste, the galaxy,
And rather urge a parable
'Twixt rays of heaven and shades of hell,
Than woman's fair and virtuous fame
Should suffer but in thought or aim,
Or from her sacred temples fall
The smallest flower celestial.
Take woman as her God hath made her,
And not as mankind may degrade her,
Else as well may you take the storm
In all its hideousness, to form
An estimate of nature's cheer,
And glories of the bounteous year:
As well compare the summer flower
With dark December's chilling shower,
Or summer morning, pearled with dew,
With winter's wan and deadly hue;
The purple ocean, calm and glowing,
With ocean when the tempest's blowing;
Then say, with proud discourtesy,
"This is the earth, and that the sea;
"And this is woman—what you will
"Please you to say, she's woman still;
"And will be woman, more or less
"A being prone to perverseness.
"Hath it not flowed from sage's tongue,
"And hath not moral poet sung,
"That men to war or business take,
"But woman is at soul a rake?"
Injurious hard, such things to say,
Degraded be thy shameless lay,
Such ruinous principle to own,
And damning dogma to lay down;
'Tis false:—wo to the blighted name
That would attach promiscuous blame
To all the gentle, fair, and wise,

And only view to generalize.
For me, I'm woman's slave confest—
Without her, hopeless and unblest;
And so are all, gainsay who can,
For what would be the life of man,
If left in desert or in isle,
Unlighted up by beauty's smile?
Even though he boasted monarch's name,
And o'er his own sex reigned supreme,
With thousands bending to his sway,
If lovely woman were away,
What were his life?—What could it be?—
A vapour on a shoreless sea;
A troubled cloud in darkness tossed,
Amongst the waste of waters lost;
A ship deserted in the gale,
Without a steersman or a sail,
A star, or beacon-light before,
Or hope of haven evermore;
A thing without a human tie,
Unloved to live, unwept to die.
Then let us own, through nature's reign:
Woman, the light of her domain;
And if to maiden love not given,
The dearest bliss below the heaven,
At least due homage let us pay,
In reverence of a parent's sway.
To that dear sex whose favour still
Our guerdon is in good or ill—
A motive that can never cloy
Our glory, honour, and our joy;
And humbly on our bended knee
Acknowledge her supremacy.

AND wilt thou think of him who traced
This tributary lay,
Or will his image be effaced,
As foot-prints in the dew are chased

Can memory's light become so dim
That thou wilt not remember HIM?
I will not libel thus a heart
Where every grace resides,
Where modest nature, void of art,
Directed still by virtue's chart,
In peerless state presides:
She shall thy silent prompter be,

POPULAR TALES.

MY AUNT MARGARET'S MIRROR.

BY THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY.

"There are times
When fancy plays her gambols, in despite
Even of our watchful senses, when in sooth
Substance seems shadow, shadow substance seems;
When the broad, palpable, and mark'd partition
Twist that which is and is not, seems dissolved;
As if the mental eye gain'd power to gaze
Beyond the limits of the existing world.
Such hours of shadowy dreams I better love
Than all the gross realities of life."

My Aunt Margaret was one of that respected sisterhood upon whom devolve all the trouble and solicitude incidental to the possession of children, excepting only that which attends their entrance into the world. We were a large family, of very different dispositions and constitutions. Some were dull and peevish—they were sent to Aunt Margaret to be amused; some were rude, romping, and boisterous—they were sent to Aunt Margaret to be kept quiet, or rather, that their noise might be removed out of hearing: those who were indisposed, were sent with the prospect of being nursed—those who were stubborn, with the hope of their being subdued by the kindness of Aunt Margaret's discipline: in short, she had all the various duties of a mother, without the credit and dignity of the maternal character. The busy scene of her various cares is now over—of the invalids and the robust, the kind and the rough, the peevish and pleased children who thronged her little parlour from morning to night, not one now remains alive but myself; who, afflicted by early infirmity, was one of the most delicate of her nurselings, yet, nevertheless, have outlived them all.

It is still my custom, and shall be so while I have the use of my limbs, to visit my respected relation at least three times a week. Her abode is about half a mile from the suburbs of the town in which I reside; and is accessible, not only by the high road, from which it stands at some distance, but by means of a green-sward foot-path, leading through some pretty meadows. I have so little left to torment me in life, that it is one of my greatest vexations to know that several of these sequestered fields have been devoted as sites for building. In that which is nearest the town, wheel-barrows have been at work for several weeks, in such numbers, that, I verily believe, its whole surface, to the depth of at least eighteen inches, was mounted in these monotrochs at the same moment, and in the act of being transported from one place to another. Huge triangular piles of planks are also reared in different parts of the devoted message; and a little group of trees, that still grace the eastern end, which rises in a gentle ascent, have just received warning to quit, expressed by a daub of white paint, and are to give place to a curious grove of chimneys.

It would, perhaps, hurt others in my situation to reflect that this little range of pasturage once belonged to my father—whose family was of some consideration in the world—and was sold by patches, to remedy distresses in which he involved himself, in an attempt, by commercial adventure, to redeem his diminished fortune. While the building scheme was in full operation, this circumstance was often pointed out to me by the class of friends who are anxious that no part of your misfortunes should escape your observation. "Such pasture ground!—lying at the very town's-end—in turnips and potatoes, the packs would bring twenty pounds per acre, and if leased for building—O, it was a gold mine!—And all sold for an old song, out of the ancient possessor's hands." My comforters cannot bring me to repine much on this subject. If I could be allowed to look back on the past without interruption, I could willingly give up the enjoyment of present income, and the hope of future profit, to those who have purchased what my father sold. I regret the alteration of the ground only because it destroys associations, and I would more willingly—I think—see the Earl's Closes in the hands of strangers, retaining their sylvan appearance, than know them for my own, if torn up by agriculture, or covered with buildings. Mine are the sensations of poor Logan:

"The horrid plough has razed the green
"Where yet a child I stray'd;
"The axe has fell'd the hawthorn screen,
"The school-boy's summer shade."

I hope, however, the threatened devastation will not be consummated in my days. Although the adventurous spirit of times short while since passed gave rise to the undertaking, I have been encouraged to think, that the subsequent changes have so far damped the spirit of speculation, that the rest of the woodland foot-path leading to Aunt Margaret's retreat will be left undisturbed for her time and mine. I am interested in this, for every step of the way, after I have passed through the green already mentioned, has for me something of early remembrance: there is the stile at which I can recollect a cross child's maid upbraiding me with my infirmity, as she lifted me coarsely and carelessly over the flinty steps, which my brothers traversed with shout and bound. I remember the suppressed bitterness of the moment, and, conscious of my own inferiority, the feeling of envy with which I regarded the easy movements and elastic steps of my more happily formed brethren. Alas! these goodly barks have all perished on life's wide ocean, and only that which seemed so little seaworthy, as the naval phrase goes, has reached the port when the tempest is over. Then there is the pool where, manœuvring our little navy, constructed out of the broad water-flags, my elder brother fell in, and was scarce saved from the watery element, to die under Nelson's banner. There is the hazel copse, also, in which my brother Henry used to gather nuts; thinking little that he was to die in an Indian jungle, in quest of rupees.

There is so much more of remembrance about the little walk, that, as I stop, rest on my crutch-headed cane, and look round with that species of comparison between the thing I was and that which I now am—it almost induces me to doubt my own identity; until I find myself in face of the honey-suckle porch of Aunt Margaret's dwelling, with its irregularity of front, and its odd projecting latticed windows; where the workmen seem to have made a study that no one of them should resemble another, in form, size, or in the old-fashioned stone entablature, and labels, which adorn them. This tenement, once the manor-house of Earl's Closes, we still retain a slight hold upon; for, in some family arrangements, it had been settled upon Aunt Margaret during the term of her life. Upon this frail tenure depends, in a great measure, the last shadow of the family of Bothwell of Earl's Closes, and their last slight connexion with their paternal inheritance. The only representative will then be an infirm old man, moving not unwillingly to the grave, which has devoured all that were dear to his affections.

When I have indulged such thoughts for a minute or two, I enter the mansion, which is said to have been the gatehouse only of the original building, and find one being on whom time seems to have made little impression; for the Aunt Margaret of to-day bears the same proportional age to the Aunt Margaret of my early youth, that the boy of ten years old does to the man of—by'r lady!—some fifty-six years. The old lady's invariable costume has doubtless some share in confirming one in the opinion, that time has stood still with Aunt Margaret.

The brown or chocolate-coloured silk gown, with ruffles of the same stuff at the elbow, within which are others of Mechlin lace—the black silk gloves, or mitts, the white hair combed back upon a roll, and the cap of spotless cambric, which closes around the venerable countenance, as they were not the costume of 1780, so neither were they that of 1826; they are altogether a style peculiar to the individual Aunt Margaret. There she still sits, as she sat thirty years since, with her wheel or the stocking, which she works by the fire in winter, and by the window in summer; or, perhaps, venturing as far as the porch in an unusually fine summer evening. Her frame, like some well-constructed piece of mechanics, still performs the operations for which it had seemed destined; going its round with an activity which is gradually diminished, yet indicating no probability that it will soon come to a period.

The solicitude and affection which had made Aunt Margaret the willing slave to the inflictions of a whole nursery, have now for their object the health and comfort of one old and infirm man; the last remaining relative of her family, and the only one who can still find interest in the traditional stores which she hoards; as some miser hides the gold which he desires that no one should enjoy after his death.

My conversation with Aunt Margaret generally relates little either to the present or to the future: for the passing day we possess as much as we require, and we neither of us wish for more; and for that which is to follow we have, on this side of the grave, neither hopes, nor fears, nor anxiety. We naturally look back to the past, and sent fallen fortunes and declined importance of our family, in recalling the hours when it was wealthy and prosperous.

With this slight introduction, the reader will know as much of Aunt Margaret and her nephew as is necessary to comprehend the following conversation and narrative.

Last week, when, late in a summer evening, I went to call on the old lady to whom my reader is now introduced, I was received by her with all her usual affection and benignity; while, at the same time, she seemed abstracted and disposed to listen. I asked her the reason. "They have been clearing out the old chapel," she said; "John Clayhudgeons having, it seems, discovered that the stuff within—being, I suppose, the remains of our ancestors—was excellent for top-dressing the meadows."

Here I started up with more alacrity than I have displayed for some years; but sat down, while my aunt added, laying her hand upon my sleeve, "The chapel has been long considered as common ground, my dear, and used for a penfold; and what objection can we have to the man for employing what is his own, to his own profit? Besides, I did speak to him, and he very readily and civilly promised that, if he found bones or monuments, they should be carefully respected and reinstated; and what more could I ask? So, the first stone they found bore the name of Margaret Bothwell, 1585, and I have caused it to be laid carefully aside, as I think it betokens death; and having served my namesake two hundred years, it has just been cast up in time to do me the same good turn. My house has been long put in order, as far as the small earthly concerns require it; but who shall say that their account with heaven is sufficiently revised?"

"After what you have said, aunt," I replied, "perhaps I ought to take my hat and go away; and so I should, but that there is on this occasion a little alloy mingled with your devotion. To think of death at all times is a duty—to suppose it nearer from the finding an old gravestone is superstition; and you, with your strong useful common sense, which was so long the prop of a fallen family, are the last person whom I should have suspected of such weakness."

"Neither would I deserve your suspicions, kinsman," answered Aunt Margaret, "if we were speaking of any incident occurring in the actual business of human life. But, for all this, I have a sense of superstition about me, which I do not wish to part with: it is a feeling which separates me from this age, and links me with that to which I am hastening; and even when it seems, as now, to lead me to the brink of the grave, and bids me gaze on it, I do not love that it should be dispelled. It soothes my imagination, without influencing my reason or conduct."

"I profess, my good lady," replied I, "that had any one but you made such a declaration, I should have thought it as capricious as that of the clergyman, who, without vindicating his false reading, preferred, from habit's sake, his old Mumpsimus to the modern Sumpsimus."

"Well," answered my aunt, "I must explain my inconsistency in this particular, by comparing it to another. I am, as you know, a piece of that old-fashioned thing called a Jacobite; but I am so in sentiment and feeling only; for a more loyal subject never joined in prayers for the health and wealth of George the Fourth, whom God long preserve! But I dare say that kind-hearted sovereign would not deem that an old woman did him much injury, if she leaned back in her arm-chair, just in such a twilight as this, and thought of the high-mettled men, whose sense of duty called them to arms against his grandfather; and how, in a cause which they deemed that of their rightful prince and country—

"They fought till their hand to the broadsword was glued,
"They fought against fortune with hearts unsubdued."

Do not come at such a moment, when my head is full of plaids, pibrochs, and claymores, and ask my reason to admit what, I am afraid, it cannot deny—I mean, that the public advantage peremptorily demanded that these things should cease to exist. I cannot, indeed, refuse to allow the justice of your reasoning; but yet, being convinced against my will, you will gain little by your motion. You might as well read to an infatuated lover the catalogue of his mistress's imperfections; for, when he has been compelled to listen to the summary, you will only get for answer, that, 'he lo'es her a' the better.'"

I was not sorry to have changed the gloomy train of Aunt Margaret's thoughts, and replied in the same tone, "Well, I can't help being persuaded that our good king is the more sure of Mrs. Bothwell's loyal affection, that he has the Stuart right of birth, as well as the act of succession, in his favour."

"Perhaps my attachment, were its source of consequence, might be found warmer for the union of the rights you mention," said Aunt Margaret; "but, upon my word, it would be as sincere if the king's right were founded only on the will of the nation, as declared at the revolution. I am none of your jure divino folks."

"And a jacobite notwithstanding?"

"And a jacobite notwithstanding; or rather, I will give you leave to call me one of the party which, in queen Anne's time, were called whimsicals; because they were sometimes operated upon by feelings, sometimes by principle. After all, it is very hard that you will not allow an old woman to be as inconsistent in her political sentiments, as mankind in general show themselves in all the various courses of life; since you cannot point out one of them, in which the passions and prejudices of those who pursue it are not perpetually carrying us away from the path which our reason points out."

"True, aunt; but you are a wilful wanderer, who should be forced back into the right path."

"Spare me, I entreat you," replied Aunt Margaret.

"You remember the Gaelic song, though I dare say I mispronounce the words—

"Hatil mobail, na dowski ml."
"I am asleep, do not waken me."

I tell you, kinsman, that the sort of waking dreams which my imagination spins out, in what your favourite Wordsworth calls 'moods of my own mind,' are worth all the rest of my more active days. Then, instead of looking forwards, as I did in youth, and forming for myself fairy palaces upon the verge of the grave, I turn my eyes backward upon the days and manners of my better time; and the sad, yet soothing recollections, come so close and interesting, that I almost think it sacrilege to be wiser or more rational, or less prejudiced, than those to whom I looked up in my younger years."

"I think I now understand what you mean," I answered, "and can comprehend why you should occasionally prefer the twilight of illusion to the steady light of reason."

"Where there is no task," she rejoined, "to be performed, we may sit in the dark, if we like it—if we go to work, we must ring for candles."

"And amidst such shadowy and doubtful light," continued I, "imagination frames her enchanted and enchanting visions, and sometimes passes them upon the senses for reality."

"Yes," said Aunt Margaret, who is a well-read woman, "to those who resemble the translator of Tasso,

'Prevailing poet, whose undoubting mind
'Believed the magic wonders which he sung,'

It is not required for this purpose, that you should be sensible of the painful horrors which an actual belief in such prodigies inflicts—such a belief, now-days, belongs only to fools and children. It is not necessary that your ears should tingle, and your complexion change, like that of Theodore, at the approach of the spectral huntsman. All that is indispensable for the enjoyment of the milder feeling of supernatural awe is, that you should be susceptible of the slight shuddering which creeps over you when you hear a tale of terror—that well-vouched tale which the narrator, having first expressed his general disbelief of all such legendary lore, selects and produces, as having something in it which he has been always obliged to give up as inexplicable. Another symptom is, a momentary hesitation to look round you, when the interest of the narrative is at the highest; and the third, a desire to avoid looking into a mirror, when you are alone in your chamber, for the evening. I mean, such are signs which indicate the crisis, when a female imagination is in due temperature to enjoy a ghost story. I do not pretend to describe those which express the same disposition in a gentleman."

"That last symptom, dear aunt, of shunning the mirror, seems likely to be a rare occurrence amongst the fair sex."

"You are a novice in toilette fashions, my dear cousin. All women consult the looking-glass with anxiety before they go into company; but when they return home, the mirror has not the same charm. The die has been cast—the party has been successful or unsuccessful, in the impression which she desired to make. But, without going deeper into the mysteries of the dressing-table, I will tell you that I, myself, like many other honest folks, do not like to see the blank black front of a large mirror in a room dimly lighted, and where the reflection of the candle seems rather to lose itself in the deep obscurity of the glass, than to be reflected back again into the apartment. That space of inky darkness seems to be a field for fancy to play her revels in. She may call up other features to meet us, instead of the reflection of our own; or, as in the spells of hallowe'en, which we learned in childhood, some unknown form may be seen peeping over our shoulder. In short, when I am in a ghost-seeing humour, I make my hand-maiden draw the green curtains over the mirror before I go into the room, so that she may have the first shock of the apparition, if there be any to be seen. But, to tell you the truth, this dislike to look into a mirror, in particular times and places, has, I believe, its original foundation in a story, which came to me by tradition from my grandmother, who was a party concerned in the scene of which I will now tell you."

THE MIRROR.

CHAPTER I.

You are fond—said my aunt—of sketches of the society which has passed away. I wish I could describe to you Sir Philip Forester, the "chartered libertine" of Scottish good company, about the end of the last century. I never saw him, indeed; but my mother's traditions were full of his wit, gallantry, and dissipation. This gay knight flourished about the end of the seventeenth and beginning of the eighteenth century. He was the Sir Charles Easy and the Lovelace of his day and country; renowned for the number of duels he had fought, and the successful intrigues which he had carried on. The supremacy which he had attained in the fashionable world was absolute; and when we combine it with one or two anecdotes, for which, "if laws were made for every degree," he ought certainly to have been hanged, the popularity of such a person really serves to show, either that the present times are much more decent, if not more virtuous, than they formerly were; or, that high breeding then was of more difficult attainment than that which is now so called; and, consequently, entitled the successful professor to a proportional degree of plenary indulgences and privileges. No beau of this day could have borne out so ugly a story as that of Pretty Peggy Grindstone, the miller's daughter at Sillermills—it had well nigh made work for the lord advocate. But it hurt Sir Philip Forester no more than the hail hurts the hearth-stone. He was as well received in society as ever, and dined with the Duke of A—the day the poor girl was buried. She died of heart-break. But that has nothing to do with my story.

Now, you must listen to a single word upon kith, kin, and ally; I promise you I will not be prolix. But it is necessary to the authenticity of my legend, that you should know that Sir Philip Forester, with his handsome person, elegant accomplishments, and fashionable manners, married the younger Miss Falconer, of King's-Copland. The elder sister of this lady had previously become the wife of my grandfather, Sir Geoffrey Bothwell, and brought into our family a good fortune. Miss Jemima, or Miss Jemmie Falconer, as she was usually called, had also about ten thousand pounds sterling; then thought a very handsome portion indeed.

The two sisters were extremely different, though each had their admirers while they remained single. Lady Bothwell had some touch of the old King's-Copland blood about her. She was bold, though not to the degree of audacity; ambitious, and desirous to raise her house and family; and was, as has been said, a considerable spur to my grandfather, who was otherwise an indolent man; but whom, unless he has been slandered, his lady's influence involved in some political matters which had been more wisely let alone. She was a woman of high principle, however, and masculine good sense, as some of her letters testify, which are still in my wainscot cabinet.

Jemmie Falconer was the reverse of her sister in every respect. Her understanding did not reach above the ordinary pitch, if, indeed, she could be said to have attained it. Her beauty, while it lasted, consisted, in a great measure, of delicacy of complexion and regularity of features, without any peculiar force of expression. Even these charms faded under the sufferings attendant on an ill-sorted match. She was passionately attached to her husband, by whom she was treated with a callous, yet polite indifference; which, to one whose heart was as tender as her judgment was, was more painful perhaps than absolute ill usage. Sir Philip was a voluptuary, that is, a completely selfish egotist, whose disposition and character resembled the rapier he wore, polished, keen, and brilliant, but inflexible and un pitying. As he observed carefully all the usual forms towards his lady, he had the art to deprive her even of the compassion of the world; and useless and unavailing as that may be while actually possessed by the sufferer, it is, to a mind like Lady Forester's, most painful to know she has it not.

The tattle of society did its best to place the peccant husband above the suffering wife. Some called her a poor spiritless thing, and declared, that, with a little of her sister's spirit, she might have brought to reason any Sir Philip whatsoever, were it the termagant Falconbridge himself. But the greater part of their acquaintance affected candour, and saw faults on both sides; though, in fact, there only existed the oppressor and the oppressed. The tone of such critics was—"To be sure, no one will justify Sir Philip Forester; but then we all know Sir Philip; and Jemmie Falconer might have known what she had to expect from the beginning. What made her set her cap at Sir Philip? He would never have looked at her, if she had not thrown herself at his head, with her poor ten thousand pounds. I am sure, if it is money he wanted, she spoiled his market. I know where Sir Philip could have done much better. And then, if she would have the man, could not she try to make him more comfortable at home, and have his friends oftener, and not plague him with the squalling children, and take care all was handsome and in good style about the house? I declare I think Sir Philip would have made a very domestic man, with a woman who knew how to manage him."

Now these fair critics, in raising their profound edifice of domestic felicity, did not recollect that the corner-stone was wanting; and that, to receive good company with good cheer, the means of the banquet ought to have been furnished by Sir Philip; whose income—dilapidated as it was—was not equal to the display of the hospitality required, and at the same time to the supply of the good knight's menus plaisirs. So, in spite of all that was so sagely suggested by female friends, Sir Philip carried his good humour every where abroad, and left at home a solitary mansion and a pining spouse.

At length, inconvenienced in his money affairs, and tired even of the short time which he spent in his own dull house, Sir Philip Forester determined to take a trip to the continent, in the capacity of a volunteer. It was then common for men of fashion to do so; and our knight perhaps was of opinion that a touch of the military character, just enough to exalt, but not render pedantic, his qualities as a beau garcon, was necessary to maintain possession of the elevated situation which he held in the ranks of fashion.

Sir Philip's resolution threw his wife into agonies of terror; by which the worthy baronet was so much annoyed, that, contrary to his want, he took some trouble to sooth her apprehensions; and once more brought her to shed tears, in which sorrow was not altogether unmingled with pleasure. Lady Bothwell asked, as a favour, Sir Philip's permission to receive her sister and her family into her own house during his absence on the continent. Sir Philip readily assented to a proposition which saved expense, silenced the foolish people who might have talked of a deserted wife and family, and gratified Lady Bothwell; for whom he felt some respect, as for one who often spoke to him, always with freedom, and sometimes with severity, without being deterred either by his raillery, or the prestige of his reputation.

A day or two before Sir Philip's departure, Lady Bothwell took the liberty of asking him, in her sister's presence, the direct question, which his timid wife had often desired, but never ventured to put to him.

"Pray, Sir Philip, what route do you take when you reach the continent?"

"I go from Leith to Helvoet by a packet with advices."

"That I comprehend perfectly," said Lady Bothwell drily; "but you do not mean to remain long at Helvoet, I presume, and I should like to know what is your next object?"

"You ask me, my dear lady," answered Sir Philip, "a question which I have not dared to ask myself. The answer depends on the fate of war. I shall, of course, go to head-quarters, wherever they may happen to be for the time; deliver my letters of introduction; learn as much of the noble art of war as may suffice a poor interloping amateur; and then take a glance at the sort of thing of which we read so much in the gazette."

"And I trust, Sir Philip," said Lady Bothwell, "that you will remember that you are a husband and a father; and that, though you think fit to indulge this military fancy, you will not let it hurry you into dangers which it is certainly unnecessary for any save professional persons to encounter."

"Lady Bothwell does me too much honour," replied the adventurous knight, "in regarding such a circumstance with the slightest interest. But, to sooth your flattering anxiety, I trust your ladyship will recollect, that I cannot expose to hazard the venerable and paternal character which you so obligingly recommend to my protection, without putting in some peril an honest fellow, called Philip Forester, with whom I have kept company for thirty years, and with whom, though some folks consider him a coxcomb, I have not the least desire to part."

"Well, Sir Philip, you are the best judge of your own affairs; I have little right to interfere—you are not my husband."

"Heaven forbid!" said Sir Philip hastily; instantly adding, however, "heaven forbid that I should deprive my friend Sir Geoffrey of so inestimable a treasure."

"But you are my sister's husband," replied the lady; "and I suppose you are aware of her present distress of mind?"

"If hearing of nothing else from morning to night can make me aware of it," said Sir Philip, "I should know something of the matter."

"I do not pretend to reply to your wit, Sir Philip," answered Lady Bothwell; "but you must be sensible that all this distress is on account of apprehensions for your personal safety."

"In that case, I am surprised that Lady Bothwell, at least, should give herself so much trouble upon so insignificant a subject."

"My sister's interest may account for my being anxious to learn something of Sir Philip Forester's motions; about which otherwise, I know, he would not wish me to concern myself. I have a brother's safety too to be anxious for."

"You mean Major Falconer, your brother by the mother's side. What can he possibly have to do with our present agreeable conversation?"

"You have had words together, Sir Philip," said Lady Bothwell.

"Naturally, we are connexions," replied Sir Philip, "and as such have always had the usual intercourse."

"That is an evasion of the subject," answered the lady. "By words, I mean angry words, on the subject of your usage of your wife."

"If," replied Sir Philip Forester, "you suppose Major Falconer simple enough to intrude his advice upon me, Lady Bothwell, in my domestic matters, you are indeed warranted in believing that I might possibly be so far displeased with the interference, as to request him to reserve his advice till it was asked."

"And being on these terms, you are going to join the very army in which my brother Falconer is now serving."

"No man knows the path of honour better than Major Falconer," said Sir Philip. "An aspirant after fame, like me, cannot choose a better guide than his footsteps."

Lady Bothwell rose and went to the window, the tears gushing from her eyes.

"And this heartless raillery," she said, "is all the consideration that is to be given to our apprehensions of a quarrel which may bring on the most terrible consequences? Good heaven! of what can men's hearts be made, who can thus dally with the agony of others?"

Sir Philip Forester was moved; he laid aside the mocking tone in which he had hitherto spoken.

(To be concluded in our next.)

A PRIOR ENGAGEMENT.

GENIUS.

WE sat together alone: she, plying her busy needle, with her blue eyes upon her work, and I, forgetting speech in the thoughts which she excited. I love to look at a sweet girl at any time, but especially when, intent upon her occupation, she is unconscious of being the object of notice. No one could have regarded her without interest. As for me, I knew it was all nonsense to fall in love with her, so I turned away my eyes with a feeling of tenderness most unpardonable in a man of business, and looked around for something which might at once divert my thoughts, and terminate the dangerous and delicious silence into which we had fallen. A book was lying half-opened upon the table. I seized it, and she requested me to read aloud. There were several pieces in it of poetry and prose, from the pen of a young gentleman who had at that time attained considerable celebrity in the literary world. I selected a short poem, and became unconsciously warmed by its tenderness of sentiment, its power of fancy, and eloquence of language. Before I was aware, I found myself disclosing, in the words of another, the very feelings which were busy in my own bosom. As I proceeded, the beauty of the verses increased. The imagery assumed a higher character, and the deeper and more sacred treasures of the heart were drawn forth, like the leaves of new flowers gradually unfolded to the light. A crimson stole over the features of my sweet companion, and a lurking smile appeared about her perfect mouth; till, as her interest rose with the pathos of the subject, and some chord of her own feelings was touched—some slumbering association awakened, or some half-faded hope tinged again with the hue of probability, she lifted up her eyes, and I found them moistened with tears.

It all passed away in a moment; but I envied the poet his magic art. Company came in a little while afterwards, and the volume which I had just been perusing, became the topic of conversation. Curiosity—perhaps envy, induced me to inquire after the author of the lines which had found their way so directly to the gentle bosom for whose esteem I cannot say how many have languished. I found he was young, in health, and possessed of an ample fortune. His residence was one of the pleasantest spots on the island, enriched with all that wealth could furnish, or taste invent. His character was noble, his person handsome, his mind highly cultivated, and his genius universally acknowledged. His society was courted by all, and the advantages of every kind which he possessed, combined with an amiable disposition and most fascinating address, ensured him a marked welcome where the young and warm-hearted of my own sex most value kind looks and familiar actions. I confess this picture filled me with unpleasant emotions. I could not keep away from my gloomy imagination the contrast of my own frequent feelings. While returning to my home, these dark reflections acquired mastery over my mind. It seemed to me that fate was unjust, indeed, in the distribution of her favours. The dazzling career of my more lucky fellow-creature had been paraded before me, and I shrunk away from the solitude and obscurity of my own destiny. It was a prospect hateful to my contemplation, and, for a moment, I felt, that, to avoid it, I could almost be contented to creep even into the grave.**

It was a still spring morning. I had gone forth to taste, for a few moments, the charms of the scene, and been almost unconsciously allured away off, over fields, and down narrow and winding forest-paths, till I found myself in the midst of a lovely wood which shaded the banks of the Hudson. I cannot say what sweet and mysterious principle in the human heart it is, which stirs beneath the gentle influences of nature, and, casting off all grovelling and selfish considerations, inspires the soul only with deep and strange joy in the contemplation of her common and familiar objects; but it was in the enchantment of some such feeling, that I had wandered away from my dark solitary chamber, and thus stood, as a different being, awakened to existence in a new world. We have all gazed upon the exquisite beauties of fine country scenery in those delicious spring mornings which, after the bleakness of winter, come over the face of nature, like love-glances from hearts long estranged by unkindness. With deep and quiet rapture, we have seen the fields, with their gradual and graceful slopes, rising like the peaceful swells of a verdant ocean—the woods, with their deep shadows and entangled vines—the river, lapsing lazily along, here rippling into little eddies, and flashing with the sunbeam, and there, smoothed off into broad expanses of molten silver—the few vessels sleeping upon its transparent waters, their painted sides and snowy sails hanging beneath them in the pellucid element, like a very dream; and as the mingled perfume, which the earth was every where breathing, came over us—and the rich warbling of the birds rung through the sweet forest, and joined with the lapping of the water against its sandy bed, and the roses were bursting with their dew-washed and crimson leaves through the green bushes—and the senses could perceive no object so low but, in its own humble station, it contributed to the perfection of beautiful nature—who has not acknowledged how much more the heart can feel than the tongue can utter? who has not wondered at the deep capacities for happiness which have been neglected amid the busy artifices of a corrupting world? and who has not, in the glowing ardour of his imagination, sketched blissful visions, with hurried and sweet facility? A stream—a scented wood—a sloping meadow—a cottage, with vines clustering around its latticed windows; birds caroling from their curling branches, and—but how I have forgotten my story!

I rambled on and on, revelling in a kind of unbidden and irrepressible rapture, which sometimes steals over me, like a gift from my own overseeing angel, and repays me, in its condensed and delicious fervour, for all the disappointments and apathies, the gloomy doubts, and fruitless wishes, of my more melancholy moments. It seemed that I had been rescued from the debasing influences of common life—as if nature had assumed the heart which she had so often neglected, and was striving to touch all its hidden springs—to call forth all its subtle and mysterious pleasures. As I proceeded on my wanderings—sometimes pausing to listen to the prolonged melody of a bird—sometimes stooping to examine the cunning tinges of a flower—here resting upon the summit of a hill, to take in the whole scenery which stretched itself before me, in all its quiet and fairy contrasts, and again inhaling the odours of the blossoms of peach and cherry, which courted the eye with all the extreme beauty of crimson and snow, my attention was arrested by the sight of a man, who, in the interest of his own meditations, had not been conscious of my approach. His arms were folded, his hat drawn down over his eyes, and his pale and haggard face exhibited the ravages of grief. There was an expression of settled and protracted misery in his countenance. His lip curled, as if his mind were revolving thoughts of bitter scorn and despair; and, when I caught a glance of his eye, I read in it that weary look, which comes only from a sick heart—a heart bereft of its light hopes and verdant feelings, and crushed, as fair flowers and rich fruit are, in some natural convulsion.

I was reflecting what event might have blasted the prospects of the being before me, when he perceived that he had become the object of my observation. He addressed me as if tired of the solitude he had sought, and glad of an opportunity to relieve the anguish of his overloaded bosom. It was not long before our conversation became familiar, and we began to communicate our respective opinions. I found him what I expected; a man weary of the world. He conversed with reckless freedom concerning his own feelings, and drew the picture of a life which must have been wretched indeed. His communicativeness emboldened me to inquire what peculiar misfortune had rendered him so miserable. He replied, as nearly as I can recollect, in the following words:

"I have not suffered any peculiar misfortune; but I look upon my whole existence as an anguish. It is not the want of things which my fellow-creatures enjoy that disturbs my peace; but the contemplation of what they are, and of what I myself am, dashes every cup of pleasure from my lips, and sickens me to the very soul. The selfishness of all human professions—the evanescence of every bliss—the guilt and degradation every where busy around me—the deep anguish of individuals—the awful calamities of nations—the prejudice, bigotry, and malice, which oppose the progress of intelligence, and usurp the throne of truth—who can contemplate the globe, with its millions of irritable and pestilential beings, neglecting the treasures of its bosom, and washing its green mantle with blood, without loathing the terms on which his unbidden existence had been inflicted upon him, and the companions with whom he had awakened into consciousness, and with whom he was lapsing along time's silent current to the inevitable abyss."

I hinted to him that he was under the influence of hypochondria, which exercise and occupation would dissipate; and that his reason would afterwards discover many delights sufficient to compensate him for all his sorrows. Men have always the power to lay down their life, and surely, if it were such a curse, there would be more voluntary deaths.

"It is the weakness of our nature," answered my companion, "which prevents us from embracing the quiet of eternal repose. Death has been surrounded by so many horrors, and life decorated with such sweet enchantments, that the timid and irresolute wretch hesitates, and remains in suspense. The fool of every fancy, the victim of every day, still, as he tramples upon the ruins of a thousand hopes, he pursues others as brilliant and as false, till at length, worn out by long labour, and exhausted with repeated disappointments, with the wrinkles of age and sickness upon his forehead, and the anguish of doubt and despair at his heart, he sinks quietly into his nameless grave, and is thought of no more. As for me, the experience of the past, and the prospect of the future, combine to make me tremble. I dread the fatal carelessness of fate, which seems invariably to render all men's affections vain, and all his wishes fruitless. Shall I love, and let my clinging heart entwine around a being upon whose grave to-morrow's sun may shine? Shall I be a father, and, doating on my boy, send him out upon this reckless and cruel world, to be cut down and tortured with the undying worm of thought, as I myself have been? What is there beautiful that I can grasp, which is not air? What fragrant flower can I pluck, but to see it fade away, and its delicate leaves strew the dust? What tempting fruit shall I seize, which is not poison? From what chalice shall I quench my burning thirst, which is not impregnated with dregs of bitterness and guilt? The earth has no charm which can render me contented. There is not luxury in wealth, nor magic in pleasure, by which I shall ever again realize true joy. The riches of Cræsus—the fame of Cæsar—the genius of Shakspeare—the beauty of Apollo—nothing, nothing can ever dazzle the eyes of my reason, nothing can hide from me the naked and awful reality in which the poor victim of doubt and sorrow must quench the beams of life's most exquisite raptures."

"I will tell you," he added, with a singular expression in his face, "I will tell you how near I have been to this awful precipice. I had, one dark and stormy night, revolved these things in my mind till I determined to take the leap. Something had occurred—no matter what—which brought, in deep distinctness before me, the strong contrast of life as it might have been, and as it must be. We are sensitive beings sometimes, and trifles come over our budding feelings, and wither them, as the scorching sun curls the perishing leaves. I deemed that, for some mysterious reason, heaven's curse was on me—that I had been created a perfect being, and then blighted or forgotten. I thought the qualities of my nature were utterly inconsistent with the degraded existence in which fate had placed me, and that I was driven along over the reckless tumult of the world, as a flower whirling in the wind, or a lute cast on the ocean. I prepared myself, therefore, to quit this weary scene for ever. It was but a pang, and all would be completed. Time would glide on in his noiseless course, and the morning should find me beyond the reach of agony. At first, there was something grand in the idea. I walked with a proud step, and felt that I was acting in a noble adventure. There was a firmness in my mind to which I had been unaccustomed; and, by the time I had arranged all my papers, and left nothing but a single line, bidding farewell to the world which was now flying away behind me, and requesting those who deemed they loved me, to forget that I had ever been, I candidly conceived that I had done with man. As I took my last look upon the familiar objects around me, they seemed strange in their unconscious and ordinary attitudes, and I could with difficulty conceive that I was never to behold them again. I walked forth in the field, and by the banks of the very stream which is now gliding so peacefully by us, and, till this very moment, my soul was as unshaken as a temple. I raised the vial to my mouth; but, as my lips were wet with the potent poison, it seemed that the flood-gates of my mind gave way, and the past world, and the future, and all the sweetness of the present, came pouring upon me with the resistless force of a torrent. The precepts of early education—the simple and dear pleasures of boyhood—kind looks and gentle and beloved faces, with glances of affection and familiar smiles, were before me; and then, the bewitching loveliness of nature—the hill—the river—the green dewy grass—the breath of flowers—the music of the wood—the morning and evening sky—the silken voice of childhood—the winning ways of woman—the frank tones of friendship—the fascinations of love—all came up in my dark fancy, arrayed in the strong hues of life, and elevated even above their natural value. As I paused in this strange state of mind, the clouds, which had darkened the heavens, parted. A soft lucid sheet of blue sky appeared behind the retreating vapours, and a star, twinkling and burning in its silent brightness, shone through the illumined break. For a moment, my whole soul was absorbed in the contemplation of this new object. Then the quiet moon issued from behind a cloud, and shed down her mellow radiance on hill and stream. The scene was hushed and beautiful as the dimmest and most perfect dream. I could not resist the impression. My feelings, like the tides, acknowledge the mysterious influence of the elements, and swell and subside with the changes of nature. The tears which gushed from my eyes relieved the anguish that choked my utterance, and gave my fancy a purer and happier play. I rambled that night long beneath the arched temple, and communed, in strange rapture, with its mighty wonders. The world was a mite from the lofty region to which my untiring spirit soared; and I revelled in the deep unbroken solitude of that still time with mingled feelings only known to wretchedness and contemplation. The next morning I awoke from a brief slumber, descended from my airy flights, and walked exhausted, silent, and unnoticed, in the paths of common men."

We parted; but not before I had discovered in the hypochondriac the young poet whose burning thoughts, dressed in the artifices of poetry, I had lately perused with so much pleasure. He has bent down since beneath his heavy load, and lies quietly in the grave he so often coveted. He has consumed away with the fires of his own sleepless mind, the victim of that quality which, like Percival's ice upon the summit of the mountain, dazzles all the world below, while itself is cold. Peace be to his ashes! I still admire him; but he is no more the object of my envy. Be genius to him on whom nature has bestowed it; but grant me the bliss of peaceful thoughts and warm affections, and let me be unknown to all the world, but such as gather with me around my peaceful home, and beguile the hours of leisure with kind and innocent amusements. GERMAN LITERATURE.

A CARNIVAL SCENE IN ROME.

FROM THE GERMAN OF GOETHE.

EVENING is now approaching, and all the world moving toward the Corso, to see the horse-race. The motion of a long train of carriages is sometimes interrupted two hours before dark—the Corso being already filled.

The infantry and horse-guards of the pope are actively employed in forming the carriages into a line near the side-walks, which gives rise to many vexatious bickerings. Here, a skilful whip makes his horses back the carriage into the place assigned him; another is fairly lifted into it; and again, another less fortunate, is forced from the line into the centre of the street. In vain are the exertions of the unfortunate coachman to regain his station; the space has instantly been filled—and, threatened and assailed on all sides, nothing remains for him, but to make the best possible retreat through the first side-lane he comes to; even these are often choked, and rendered impassable by the carriages which were either too late for the Corso, or had the same fate with himself.

The moment when the horses are to start is now near at hand, and the interest of the thousands of spectators raised to the highest pitch. On all sides you hear from the scaffoldings, the proprietors luoghi: Luoghi avanti! luoghi nodele! Luoghi patroni! It seems to be an object with them, to let, at the last moment, all remaining seats, even at reduced prices, if full ones cannot be obtained. Happy those who have found a seat, for now, a general officer with a division of horse-guards is riding along the centre of the street, between two lines of coaches, to clear the course. Those who have not been so fortunate as to obtain a seat, climb upon the carriages, if they can, or have to creep under, if there is no other vacant spot. In the meantime, the open space before the obelisk has been cleared, and affords to the spectator one of the most magnificent views imaginable. The three facades which enclose this place have been hung with rich tapestry. Thousands of human heads, projecting one above the other on the amphitheatres erected for the occasion, recall to the imagination the ancient amphitheatres and circus. Above the centre amphitheatre, which covers but the pedestal, the obelisk rises in all its majesty into the regions of the air. Comparing it with the mass of population at the base, one becomes sensible of its immense height. The prospect from the piazza del popolo, down the corso to the Venetian palace, a distance of perhaps three thousand five hundred yards, is highly interesting. The general now returns and takes his station on the spot exactly assigned for him; this is considered a signal that the course is clear. The sentinels, however, continue their vigilance, and the entrance to the course is closed by an extended cord. The horses are now brought forward, one by one, according to the numbers drawn by lot, each led by a groom, most splendidly dressed, but so as to be easily distinguished by the rest. The horses have no covering whatever. At the moment of starting, two balls with points, and attached to a line, are thrown over their backs to spur them on. However, they are, even without that, impatient to start; they neigh, they rear, plunge and kick, and it requires all the skill and strength of the grooms to master them. Aware of what they are intended to perform, the ambition to start makes them almost ungovernable; and the sight of so many spectators, foamingly wild. In rearing, they frequently get their forefeet over the extended cord—all is bustle and confusion, and this seems but to increase the excitement of the spectators. The grooms themselves appear agitated, and attentively watch for the signal, as the direction given to the horse on starting, or the quickness in taking off the bridle, often decides the fate of the contest. The cord drops at last, and the horses start at full speed. While on the wider space, there is some chance for trial of speed; but after entering the course, all exertion is in vain; the two lines of carriages narrow the space to such a degree, that horses that are behind, cannot pass the two which are before them. Although the street has previously been thickly covered with puzzolane, the horses' hoofs continually penetrate to the pavement, and strike fire, their manes flutter in the wind, and, like airy phantoms, they, in passing, appear and disappear in a moment. The herd of contending horses succeed each other, generally two and two, sometimes pressing the foremost without being able to pass them. After the fleetest horses have gone by, odd ones of less speed pass singly; and as soon as the last has disappeared, the populace rush forward, and instantly fill the street. Thus ends this festivity, which has excited so much interest, and but few can account to themselves why, or how a contest, which is decided in a moment, has been able to cause so much general excitement.

It may be supposed, that accidents which endanger the lives of men and the animals, are not uncommon. Sometimes it happens that the wheel of a carriage projects beyond the line, or a third horse trying to pass, coming up full speed, runs against it and falls. Frequently they are killed on the spot, and injure some of the spectators. I once was witness of such an accident—where three horses fell in succession, and the rest cleared themselves by leaping over the three. Sometimes the horses, after arriving at the end of the course, as if frantic, force their way through the crowd. The mischief done is not noticed, and no one seems to care.

VARIETIES.

GOD SEEN IN HIS WORKS.—All nature, says Fenelon, shows the infinite skill of its author. I maintain that accident, that is to say, a blind and fortuitous succession of events, could never have produced all that we see. It is well to adduce here one of the celebrated comparisons of the ancients. Who would believe that the Iliad of Homer was not composed by the effort of a great poet; but that the characters of the alphabet being thrown confusedly together, an accidental stroke had placed all the letters precisely in such relative situations, as to produce verses so full of harmony and variety, painting each object with all that was most noble, most graceful, and most touching in its features; in fine, making each person speak in character, and with such spirit and nature? Let any one reason with as much subtlety as he may, he would persuade no man in his senses that the Iliad had no author but accident. Why then should a man, possessing his reason, believe, with regard to the universe—a work unquestionably more wonderful than the Iliad—what his good sense will not allow him to believe of this poem? But let us take another comparison, which is from Gregory Nazianzen. If we heard in a room behind a curtain a sweet and harmonious instrument, could we believe that accident produced it? Who would doubt seriously whether some skilful hand did not touch it? Were any one to find in a desert island a beautiful statue of marble, he would say, surely men have been here. I recognize the hand of the sculptor; I admire the delicacy with which he has proportioned the body, making it instinct with beauty, grace, majesty, tenderness, and life. What would this man reply, if any one were to say to him, no, a sculptor did not make this statue. It is made, it is true, in the most exquisite taste, and according to the most perfect rules of symmetry; but it is accident that has produced it. Among all the pieces of marble, one has happened to take this form of itself. The rains and the wind detached it from the mountain; a violent storm placed it upright upon this pedestal, that was already prepared and placed here of itself. It is an Apollo, as perfect as that of Belvidere; it is a Venus, equal to that of the Medicis; it is a Hercules, which resembles that of Farnese. You may believe, it is true, that this figure walks, that it lives, that it thinks, that it is going to speak, but it owes nothing to art, it is only a blind stroke of chance that has formed it so well, and placed it here.

BENEVOLENCE OF GEORGE THE FOURTH.—Nearly forty years ago, his present majesty, then prince of Wales, was so exceedingly urgent to have eight hundred pounds to an hour on such a day, and in such an unusual manner, that the gentleman who furnished the supply had some curiosity to know for what purpose it was obtained. On inquiry, he was informed that, the moment the money arrived, the prince drew on a pair of boots, pulled off his frock-coat and waistcoat, slipped on a plain morning frock, and, turning his hair to the crown of his head, put on a slouched hat, and thus walked out. This intelligence raised still greater curiosity; and, with some trouble, the gentleman discovered the object of the prince's mysterious visit. An officer of the army had just arrived from America with a wife and six children, in such low circumstances, that, to satisfy some clamorous creditor, he was on the point of selling his commission, which must have been the utter ruin of his family. The prince, by accident, overheard an account of the case. To prevent a worthy soldier suffering, he procured the money; and that no mistake might happen, he resolved to be his own almoner. On asking, at an obscure lodging-house, in a court near Covent-Garden, for the lodger, he was shown up to his room, and there found the family in the utmost distress. Shocked at the sight, he not only presented the money, but told the officer to apply to Colonel Lake, living in — street, and give some account of himself in future; and then departed, without the family knowing to whom they were obliged.

ENGLISH SERVANTS AND THEIR VAILS.—Mr. Jonas Hanway was among the most singular of human eccentricities. A friend of his, Sir Timothy Waldo, had dined with the duke of N—, and, on leaving his house, was contributing to the insolence and covetousness of a train of servants who lined the hall, when, at last, putting a crown into the hand of the cook, the fellow returned it, saying, "Sir, I don't take silver." "Don't you, indeed?" said the worthy baronet, "then I don't give gold," and returned the five shillings to his purse. Mr. Hanway remarked on the disgraceful absurdity of permitting servants to receive vails, and told Sir Timothy of a circumstance which had happened to himself. He was paying the servants of a respectable friend for a dinner which their master had invited him to, one by one, as they appeared. "Sir, your great coat." "There's a shilling, John." "Your hat." "There's a shilling, Dick." "Stick." "A shilling, Joe." "Umbrella." "A shilling, William." "Sir, your gloves." "Why, friend, keep the gloves—they are not worth a shilling," said the facetious Hanway, and walked off as quickly as he could, for fear of a fresh relay of these dinner-tax-gatherers.

KNOWLEDGE OF MUSIC.—Many of the female singers at Naples—says a recent traveller—I am confident, neither know how to read or write. I was one day at the house of one of these performers by profession; after many entreaties that she would favour us with an air, from which she excused herself on the plea of having had a violent cold for a month past, and a swelled throat, which prevented her from singing, she complied with our request. In taking the music-book to place it on the piano-forte, she turned it, as if by mistake, upside down; so that, on opening the first leaf, at the bottom of the page, the words "fine dell' Aria" were written with the letters reversed. As I perceived the mistake, I took the book, and placed it right. The lady was piqued, and not wishing to appear ignorant, took the book rather abruptly, and placed it again as it was before. "Know, signora," said she, "that this is an Hebrew air, sung in the synagogue of the Jews, and that it begins at the end."

LIGHT READING.—A young lady of Brunswick, an attendant on the late duchess, mortified that, from her neglected education, she was precluded from joining in the literary conversations which were frequently introduced at that court, requested her royal mistress to furnish her with such books as might enable her to remedy this defect. Her royal highness, smiling, handed her a dictionary; and next asked her how she liked it. "Oh! it is delightful!" said the fair student: "there are some books which I have seen, where the words are so huddled together that one does not know what to make of them; but here it is quite a pleasure to see them all drawn up in order, like so many soldiers on a parade."

AN IMPOSSIBLE CIRCUMSTANCE.—Sheridan, one day, being dressed in a very handsome pair of new boots, met a friend, when the following dialogue ensued:—"Those are handsome boots, Sherry. Who made them?" "Hoby." "How did you prevail on him?" "Guess." "I suppose you talked him over in the old way." "No—that won't do now." "Then, when they came home, you ordered half a dozen pair more?" "No." "Perhaps you gave a check on Hammersley, which you knew would not be honoured?" "No, no, no—in short, you might guess till to-morrow, before you hit it: I paid for them!"

A HOST IN HIMSELF.—A party having been formed to play at cricket, found, on coming to the field, that they were but twenty-one in number, instead of twenty-two; on which, one party brought the worthy landlord of the tavern where they intended to dine. "Will friend Boniface do to make up the deficiency?" said the Mercury that had brought him. "Why, we only wanted one, Jack," said one of the party; "why the deuce did you bring a host?"

LOVE HUNG A LA LANTERNE.—"Madam," said the late Lord — to a lady of fashion and beauty, on seeing the portrait of a youth, who died of love of her, suspended from her neck, "I am concerned to see my old friend hung in chains at the place of execution."

THE GREATEST FOOLS.—Atheism is folly, and atheists are the greatest fools in nature; for they see there is a world that could not make itself, and yet they will not own there is a God that made it.

PERIODICAL STORIES.—The celebrated Bubb Doddington was very lethargic. Falling asleep one day, after dinner with Sir Richard Temple and Lord Cobham the general, the latter reproached Doddington with his drowsiness. Doddington denied having been asleep; and to prove he had not, offered to repeat all Lord Cobham had been saying. Cobham challenged him to do so. Doddington repeated a story, and Lord Cobham owned he had been telling it. "And yet," said Doddington, "I did not hear a word of it; but I went to sleep, because I knew that, about this time of day, you would tell that story."

CONSTANT EMPLOYMENT.—The office of beadle in a country parish, a few miles to the westward of Dundee, being vacant, a countryman applied to the clergyman, who is of the old school, for the situation, and wished to know what were the fees. Having been very minutely informed on the subject—"Noo, sir," says John, "this may doo vera weel, if ye'll insure me o' constant employment." "Constant employment!" repeated the irritated divine, "gae awa', filthy body, ye would bury a' my paur parish in a week!"

DOGMATICAL AND CATEGORICAL.—A plain-spoken gentleman being asked his opinion as to a compromise between two parties on a certain question, replied, that "a little conciliation and condescension might do wonders; but if one party was determined to be dog-matical, and the other categorical, the matter must end in worrying and scratching."

SWEDISH RESTRICTION.—A restriction of the Swedish government, respecting matrimony, prevents the young men from entering into wedlock before the age of twenty-one, except in cases where property is bequeathed to an heir, who is then at liberty to marry as soon as he attains eighteen. Girls are allowed to marry at fifteen.

AN UNFORTUNATE BRIDE.—At a wedding in Germany, many years since, while the company were playing "hide and go seek," the bride concealed herself in the garret, in a chest which had one of these spring-locks. She was searched for in vain. A long time after, the chest was opened, and her remains discovered, wrapped in the bridal vestment.

TAX ON BACHELORS.—A bill has passed the senate of Ohio, and is expected to pass the house, taxing old bachelors. The revenue from this class of the community must be small, if the taxed are to be credited on the subject of their own age, for you will rarely meet with a bachelor who considers himself old.

JEFFRIES.—Judge Jeffries, of notorious memory, pointing to a man with his cane, who was about to be tried, said, "There is a great rogue at the end of my cane." The man to whom he pointed, looking at him, said, "Which end, my lord?"

DOMESTIC LIFE.—The Earl of Orrery observes, that whenever we step out of domestic life, in search of felicity, we come back again disappointed, tired and chagrined. One day passed under our own roof, with our friends and our family, is worth a thousand in another place.

BON MOT.—A barber, who was in the habit of stunning his customers' ears by the rapidity of his tongue, asked an individual one day, how he wished his beard cut. "Without saying a single word," replied he.

DEGREE OF MURDER.—If the divines do rightly infer from the sixth commandment, thou shalt not kill, scandalizing one's neighbour with false and malicious reports, whereby I vex his spirit, and consequently impair his health, is a degree of murder.

THINGS WORTH REMEMBERING.—What is mine, even to my life, is her's I love; but the secret of my friend is not mine.—Thinking is the nurse of thought.—Gold can gild a rotten stick, and dirt sully an ingot.—Poetry is the art of substantiating shadows, and of lending existence to nothing.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

TO M. P. D.

I will not praise that form of grace,
That modest step and gentle air,
The mild expression of thy face,
Nor yet those locks of yellow hair:

I will not praise that eye of fire,
Whose melting glance inspires the soul;
Nor yet will wake the slumbering lyre,
To praise its mild and modest roll:

But I will praise thy glowing mind,
For genius holds her empire there,
Whose matchless powers are all combined
To speak thee good as thou art fair.

TO A CRITIC,

Who quoted an isolated passage, and declared it obscure.

Most candid critic, what if I,
By way of joke, pluck out your eye,
And holding up the fragment, cry,
"Ha, ha! that men such fools should be!
Behold this shapeless mass!—and he,
"Who owned it, dreamt that it could see!"
The joke were mighty analytic—
But should you like it, candid critic?—COLERIDGE.

THE DRAMA.

ROMEO AND JULIET.

THE character of Juliet, as drawn by Shakspeare, is one of perfect individuality; in which the brightest tints of nature throw love's purple light over the shades of ardent passion. Juliet, we think, is the most interesting of the great bard's heroines. Her artless innocence, and unaffected sincerity, enlist our sympathy. There is nothing coquettish in her manner; her sentiments spring from the fountain of the heart, clear and spontaneous. The very spirit of love seems to have touched her soul with a kind of magic sadness, to have made her tones as sweet as plaintive music, and poured a mild and mellow light around the halo of melancholy brightness.

Of late years, every English or American stranger in Italy is sure to pay a visit to Verona, to have his sympathy excited, and his curiosity gratified, by gazing on the supposed "tomb of Juliet:" and there is no man who admires Shakspeare, but will go fifty miles out of his way, on a pilgrimage to a city which has furnished the bard of Avon with the materials of an affecting tragedy, which, for all the pathetic details of hapless, enthusiastic love, and devoted constancy, stands unrivalled in the whole range of the European drama. We were led to make the preceding remarks, by reading a book, published by a recent traveller in Italy. After giving a descriptive sketch of Verona, he says, "Though much legendary exaggeration is superadded to the circumstances of Juliet's death, yet the main fact is attested by the local history of Verona; and therefore the mind is disposed to admit the probability, that the excavated oblong stone, which is now pointed out in the neglected ruins of the old Franciscan monastery, might have once contained the beauteous form of the unhappy Juliet. Count Persico, in his history of Verona, thus narrates the melancholy circumstances that led to the death of Romeo and Juliet:

"In the year 1303, or about that time, Bartholomew della Scala, being captain of the Veronese, Romeo de Monticoli was enamoured of Juliet de Cappelletti, and she of him, their families being at the time in bitter enmity with each other, on account of party feuds. As, therefore, they could not be openly married, a private union took place between them. Shortly afterwards, Romeo having, in an affray of the two factions, killed Tebaldo the cousin of Juliet, was obliged to seek for safety in flight, and proceeded to Mantua. His unhappy spouse, afflicted beyond measure, sought commiseration and counsel from the intermediate agent of her secret marriage, seeing that there was no longer any hope of a reconciliation between families now still more incensed against each other than before. Therefore, by a preconcerted arrangement, Juliet procured a sleeping draught, and shortly after, according to common report, yielded up her life. Romeo having been apprised of the dire news, before he heard that she was only apparently dead, resolved, in the bitterness of his anguish, to take poison and die likewise. Previously to his doing so, however, not entirely despairing of her life, he went to Verona and availed himself of the evening hour to enter the monastery. Being here assured that his Juliet had been interred not long before, he swallowed the poison which he had with him, and hastened to the tomb, where their mutual friend pointed out the way by a passage beyond that which was ready for his return. The friar wondered very much what had happened to Romeo, unconscious of the hard fate that awaited him. While he endeavoured to assure him that the lady was not in reality dead, the poison began to operate, and now, on the very verge of death, he called on his Juliet with a faint voice. She awoke, and scarcely recognised him. Romeo expired, and Juliet breathed for a moment only to share his hapless doom."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

St. Valentine's Day.—The fourteenth of February was, for a long time, thought to be the day whereon "all the birds of the air wooed and won their tender mates," and, for that reason, it has been considered ominous to lovers. It is from this fact that love-letters, sent on this day, have received the appellation derived from the name of the saint. The ceremonies practised in the olden time, are best described in some of the popular songs of England. Wheatly, in his illustrations of the Common Prayer, states Saint Valentine to have been a man of much love and charity, and that from thence arose the amorous divinations practised at his feast-day. We subjoin the specimen of an ancient Valentine, taken from the Perennial Calendar:

It is the hour of morning's prime,
The young day of the year;
The day of days, before the time
When brighter hopes appear.
It is the time of early love,
When suns but faintly shine;
It is the day, all days above,
The sweet St. Valentine.
The cold snows on the meadows lie,
And not a leaf is green;
Yet here and there, in yonder sky,
A gleam of light is seen.
So love, young love, 'mid storms and snow,
Darts forth a light divine;
So darker days the brightness show
Of thine, St. Valentine!

The following—a more beautiful specimen—is from Dodsley's Miscellanies:

Hark! through the sacred silence of the night,
Loud chanticler doth sound his clarion shrill,
Hailing with song the first pale gleam of light,
Which floats the dark brow of yon eastern hill.
Bright star of morn! oh leave not yet the wave,
To deck the dewy frontlet of the day;
Nor thou, Aurora, quit Titimes' cave,
Nor drive retiring darkness yet away;
Ere these, my rustic hands, a garland twine,
Ere yet my tongue indite a single song;
For her I mean to hail my Valentine,
Sweet maiden, fairest of the virgin throng!

Different—alas, how different! the observances practised in these days of fashion, refinement, and extravagance! Yet do we not mean to deplore the bachelors' fancy-ball, held to-night in honour of the occasion. No, we rejoice to see every means put into requisition by which the unsubdued portion of our sterner sex are brought into direct, but innocent struggle, against the winning smiles of those who should be their companions, not for the festive hour only, or at the social and gay repast, but in the calm seclusion of domestic retirement, and the unceasing interchange of kind offices of hymeneal love. From the ample preparations making, we anticipate no ordinary fall in the prices of baccalaureate stock. Look to it, ye Benedicts!

Society of Mechanics and Tradesmen of the city of New-York.—It must afford every friend to the prosperity of our growing city, great pleasure to learn that this valuable institution has met with extraordinary success in its laudable and beneficial operations. Established, originally, for the object of assisting the widows and orphans of the members, by occasional aid, or by annual pensions, it has been enabled, by a careful and wise economy of its funds, to form an excellent school, inferior to no other in the city, in which all the children of indigent members who apply, are educated gratuitously, and receive an equal share of attention with the most opulent. The society has, likewise, established, with the aid of donations, a library of ten thousand volumes, embracing most of the valuable productions in the arts and sciences, in history, biography, poetry, and belles-lettres generally. To this collection, sixteen hundred readers have access. A resolution was lately adopted in this society, instructing the library committee to inquire into the expediency of discontinuing, hereafter, the issuing of plays, novels, and romances, and report what proportion of such books compose the present library. However well-intentioned the authors of this proceeding may have been, they must be considered as having been actuated by a short-sighted policy, uselessly rigorous, and calculated at once to shut up the avenue to one of the most delightful recreations of literature, and to cast upon the institution the odium of a puritanic, or rather bigotted, severity. We are pleased, therefore, to find, that the committee, appointed on the strength of this resolution, have reported against the proposed measure, as likely to defeat the philanthropic views of the projectors and founders of the library. Their reasoning on the subject is perspicuous and conclusive. "We should say we pitied—we do say we pity, the feelings of a man who can look back without pleasure to the time he first read Robinson Crusoe; and we think we can say, with confidence, that this book has made more readers than any history extant; and this book is a romance." Equally forcible are their remarks on the Vicar of Wakefield, on Scott and Cooper's novels, &c.

The number of scholars is one hundred and thirty males, and one hundred and two females. The receipts of the society, during the last year, have been three thousand six hundred dollars; the expenditures, three thousand three hundred and eighty-five; leaving a balance of two hundred and sixty-five dollars.

New-York City Dispensary.—We shall, if possible, copy a part of the annual report of this unostentatious and pre-eminently useful institution, in our next number. Drawn up in the most unpretending and simple style, it displays an amount of benefit conferred on the community of New-York, which is no less astonishing in the aggregate, than it is honourable to those who have been engaged in effecting the result. Nearly ten thousand sick relieved gratuitously in twelve months! What a saving must not hence accrue to the city funds, upon which this twentieth part of the whole population of the city might else have drawn for support and relief! And yet it is mortifying to acknowledge, that scarcely the usual doleful pittance of subscription-money has been meted out to this institution! While the Greek, and the negro, and the South-sea islander, and every object of commiseration abroad, that has its comparatively inferior claims eloquently blazoned forth, receive their thousands, this humble, but most effective instrument of beneficence at home, is neglected, overlooked—nay, not even known!

The Morning Herald.—A new morning paper has lately been issued in this city, very neatly executed, and conducted with equal taste and ability, by Messrs. Carter and Conant, late the editors of the Statesman and the National Advocate, which papers have been discontinued. The patronage of both has been transferred, in the most flattering and gratifying manner, to the new journal; and we are confident that its success will bear decided testimony to the favourable sense entertained of the talents and learning of its respectable editors. When we compare the number of newspapers printed in this city, with that of cities in Europe of far greater population and extent, we have great cause to exult in the superior means enjoyed by us of diffusing useful knowledge and information amongst the mass of the people. With respect to the Morning Herald, we feel warranted in making the assertion, that the name of Mr. Carter is a sufficient security in favour of its ever maintaining the cause of virtue, of science, and of our country.

Gas Lights.—Complaints are daily making that the company which furnishes these means of illuminating our public streets, and private stores and apartments, are not doing justice to their customers. Can this be intentional? Certain it is that the lights burn dimly—and certain it is, that, if they continue to do so much longer, oil, purified somehow or another, will again be had recourse to. We know one method of doing this, and, on compulsion, but not otherwise, shall communicate it pro bono publico. A word to the wise.

Sir Walter Scott.—It will be perceived that we have commenced the publication of another tale, written by this distinguished author. It is no small proof of the high estimation in which every production of his pen is held, that five hundred pounds sterling should have been paid for his contributions to the Keepsake alone. The story which appeared in the last number of the Mirror, has been generally admired, and we augur a no less favourable reception for "My Aunt Margaret's Mirror." It will be concluded in our next.

Imprisonment for Debt.—This important subject, we perceive, has been brought up by Mr. Livingston, in the senate.

Report of Deaths.—The city inspector reports of one hundred and two persons during the week ending on Saturday last.

THE BLUE BONNETS OVER THE BORDER.

March! march! Et-trick and Te-vi-ot-dale! Why, my lads, din-na ye march for-ward in or-der! March! march! Eak-dale and Lid-des-dale!

All the blue bonnets are o-ver the bor-der. Ma-ny a banner spread, flut-ters a-bove your head, Ma-ny a crest that is fa-mous in sto-ry.

Mount and make rea-dy then, sons of the moun-tain glen, Fight for your king and the old Scot-tish bor-der.

DA CAPO.

Come from the hills, where your hirsels are grazing;
Come from the glen of the buck and the roe;
Come to the crag where the beacon is blazing;

Come with the buckler, the lance, and the bow.
Trumpets are sounding, war steeds are bounding;
Stand to your arms, and march in good order;

England shall many a day, tell of the bloody fray,
When the blue bonnets came over the border.
March! march! Ettrick and Teviotdale! &c.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.
TO AN AUTUMN LEAF.

Fallen and sere,
What dost thou here,
Pale leaf?
Speak'st thou of summer gone,
Of fading flowers that mourn
Their season brief?

But yesterday,
Thou didst make gay
Yon tree;
And, 'neath thy robe of green,
The swallow might be seen
To twitter free.

Now art thou found
On the cold ground:
The wind
That bears thy form away,
Tearing from branch and spray
Friends left behind.

And like to thee,
Seemeth to me
Man's state.
With health and hope awhile,
He dares to laugh and smile,
And scoff at fate.
But sorrow's blast
Cometh at last,
And then
The hopes he loved and cherished,
Have faded all and perished,
Nor bloom again. C. A. S.

THE SNUFFBOX.

A lady young, and gay, and fair,
And joyous as a bird in May,
Sat nigh a youth who much did look,
Sigh sometimes, and but little say.
He looked first this, then looked that way,
And upward looked. The lady free
Smiled as she said, "Kind sir, I pray,
"What colour may your musings be?"
He answered with embarrassed brow,
"Oh, they are pure, for I did think
"On her I love, and she is fair
"As lily on a rivulet's brink,
"Where lambs stray, and forget to drink,
"With looking on the flower." Aside
She turned, and seemed nigh hand to sink,
Thenspoke, and spoke with meikle pride.

"I leave thee to thy thoughts, to shapes
"Form'd, like thy words, of empty air."
Her curls, her head, disdainful tossed,
Like rays of sunshine here and there;
Then gathering thus her golden hair,
She would have gone, when he said "Stay,
"See my love's form, is she not fair
"And lovely as a morn of May?"

She took the jewelled box; she looked Upon the mirrored lid; she grew
Like crystal stained with rosy wine,
Or like the sunbeam seen through dew.
She saw herself, and sidelong drew
Nigh him, and with a soft low voice,
Said, "If the mirror tells me true,
"I know her, and approve thy choice."

Such is the story told by one
Excelling in the natural way
Of saying simple things, whom none
In elegance surpassed. The gay,
The grave, the young, and hoary gray,
Love nature in her meek undress.
No more, for words will poorly say
What art's embodied thoughts express.

THE EAR-RINGS.

Oh, my ear-rings, my ear-rings;
'Twas thus a maiden sung,
A fair and lovely maiden,
With a gentle northern tongue;
Oh, my ear-rings, my ear-rings,
I've dropt them in the well,
And what to say to my true love,
I cannot, cannot tell!

The titting damsels, as I go,
They say both free and loud,
Young William gave these ear-rings,
And miss may well be proud—
He gave to her these ear-rings,
Her sallow neck to touch
A little with their lustre,
And her beauty needs it much.
My love gave me these costly rings,
My plighted vow to keep,
And there they glitter in the well,
I wot three fathoms deep;
He gave to me these splendid gems,
To sparkle on my neck,
And there they lie—my heart is stone,
Else it would surely break.
I wore them at the market,
In the dance they threw a spell

On all the lads who saw them,
And my looks became them well.
My love gave me these precious rings,
And gave me, little loth,
At parting, such a heart-warm kiss,
'Twas richly worth them both.
A kiss, alas! is but a touch,
The rings no more will shine
Around me in their glory,
And my love will ne'er be mine.
Mute sat the pensive maiden,
When there came a man and drew
Her, shining in her beauty,
Like a star amid the dew.
A painter good, a critic shrewd,
A poet bold was he;
Who has not heard, who has not read,
Of Martin Arthur Shee?

THE RETURN.

The joys of "home" have oft been told,
And sung in many a gifted strain;
Yet can the theme e'er grow so old,
As not inspire again?
Again—oh, yes! and oft again
The harp shall tune so fond a lay;
It is—like love—too sweet a strain
To ever die away!

Leave it a while, a little while,
And from your kindred dwell apart;
From social bliss, affection's smile,
How lonely feels the heart!
If in a stranger land ye be,
And roaming 'neath a brighter sky,
What dwells so dear in memory,
What wakes so fond a sigh,
As absent "home" restored to thee?
Each simple object seems more dear;
The heart then tastes felicity
In all we see and hear!
To meet again the smile of love,
And friendship's gentle hand to press;
The fond salute where'er we move,
While all things seem to bless!

It is a theme might well prolong
The poet's best and choicest lay;
But mine can only breathe the song
Of joy, to hail the day.
I meet again "my own fireside!"
In bliss, or wo, or health, or pain,
With thee I'll evermore abide,
Nor lose thy sweets again.

THE KISS.

One kiss, dear maid! I said and sighed—
Your scorn the little boon denied:
Ah, why refuse the blameless bliss?
Can danger lurk within a kiss?
Yon viewless wanderer of the vale,
The spirit of the western gale,
At morning's break, at evening's close,
Inhales the sweetness of the rose,
And hovers o'er the uninjured bloom,
Sighing back the soft perfume.
Vigour to the zephyr's wing,
Her nectar-breathing kisses fling:
And he the glitter of the dew
Scatters on the rose's hue.
Bashful, lo! she bends her head,
And darts a blush of deeper red!
Too well those lovely lips disclose
The triumphs of the opening rose;
Oh, fair! oh, graceful! bid them prove
As passive to the breath of love.
In tender accents, faint and low,
Well-pleased, I hear the whispered "No!"
The whispered "No!" how little meant!
Sweet falsehood that endears consent!
For on those lovely lips the while
Dawns the soft relenting smile,
And tempts with feigned dissuasion coy,
The gentle violence of joy.

SOMETHING CHILDISH.

If I had but two little wings,
And were a little feathery bird,
To you I'd fly, my dear!
But thoughts like these are idle things,
And I stay here.
But in my sleep to you I'll fly:
I'm always with you in my sleep!
The world is all one's own;
But then, one wakes, and where am I?
All, all alone.
Sleep stays not, though a monarch bids!
So I love to wake ere break of day;
For, though my sleep be gone,
Yet, while 'tis dark, one shuts one's lids,
And still dreams on.

POPULAR TALES.

MY AUNT MARGARET'S MIRROR.

BY THE AUTHOR OF WAVERLEY.

(Concluded.)

"DEAR Lady Bothwell," he said, taking her reluctant hand, "we are both wrong—you are too deeply serious; I, perhaps, too little so. The dispute I had with Major Falconer was of no earthly consequence. Had any thing occurred betwixt us that ought to have been settled par voie du fait, as we say in France, neither of us are persons that are likely to postpone such a meeting. Permit me to say, that, were it generally known that you or my Lady Forester are apprehensive of such a catastrophe, it might be the very means of bringing about what would not otherwise be likely to happen. I know your good sense, Lady Bothwell, and that you will understand me when I say, that really my affairs require my absence for some months—this Jemima cannot understand; it is a perpetual recurrence of questions, why can you not do this, or that, or the third thing; and when you have proved to her that her expedients are totally ineffectual, you have just to begin the whole round again. Now, do you tell her, dear Lady Bothwell, that you are satisfied. She is, you must confess, one of those persons with whom authority goes farther than reasoning. Do but repose a little confidence in me, and you shall see how amply I will repay it."

Lady Bothwell shook her head, as one but half satisfied. "How difficult it is to extend confidence, when the basis on which it ought to rest has been so much shaken! But I will do my best to make Jemima easy; and farther, I can only say, that for keeping your present purpose I hold you responsible both to God and man."

"Do not fear that I will deceive you," said Sir Philip; "the safest conveyance to me will be through the general post-office, Helvoetsluys, where I will take care to leave orders for forwarding my letters. As for Falconer, our only encounter will be over a bottle of Burgundy; so make yourself perfectly easy on his score."

Lady Bothwell could not make herself easy; yet she was sensible that her sister hurt her own cause by taking on, as the maid-servants call it, too vehemently; and by showing before every stranger, by manner, and sometimes by words also, a dissatisfaction with her husband's journey, that was sure to come to his ears, and equally certain to displease him. But there was no help for this domestic dissension, which ended only with the day of separation.

I am sorry I cannot tell, with precision, the year in which Sir Philip Forester went over to Flanders; but it was one of those in which the campaign opened with extraordinary fury; and many bloody, though indecisive skirmishes were fought between the French on the one side, and the allies on the other. In all our modern improvements, there are none, perhaps, greater than in the accuracy and speed with which intelligence is transmitted from any scene of action to those in this country whom it may concern. During Marlborough's campaigns, the sufferings of the many who had relations in, or along with the army, were greatly augmented by the suspense in which they were detained for weeks, after they had heard of bloody battles, in which, in all probability, those for whom their bosoms throbbed with anxiety had been personally engaged. Amongst those who were most agonized by this state of uncertainty was the—I had almost said deserted—wife of the gay Sir Philip Forester. A single letter had informed her of his arrival on the continent—no others were received. One notice occurred in the newspapers, in which volunteer Sir Philip Forester was mentioned as having been intrusted with a dangerous reconnaissance, which he had executed with the greatest courage, dexterity and intelligence, and received the thanks of the commanding officer. The sense of his having acquired distinction brought a momentary glow into the lady's pale cheek; but it was instantly lost in ashen whiteness, at the recollection of his danger. After this they had no news whatever, neither from Sir Philip, nor even from their brother Falconer. The case of Lady Forester was not indeed different from that of hundreds in the same situation; but a feeble mind is necessarily an irritable one, and the suspense which some bear with constitutional indifference or philosophical resignation, and some with a disposition to believe and hope the best, was intolerable to Lady Forester, at once solitary and sensitive, low-spirited, and devoid of strength of mind, whether natural or acquired.

CHAPTER II.

As she received no further news of Sir Philip, whether directly or indirectly, his unfortunate lady began now to feel a sort of consolation, even in those careless habits which had so often given her pain. "He is so thoughtless," she repeated a hundred times a day to her sister, "he never writes when things are going on smoothly; it is his way: had any thing happened, he would have informed us."

Lady Bothwell listened to her sister without attempting to console her. Probably she might be of opinion, that even the worst intelligence which could be received from Flanders might not be without some touch of consolation; and that the dowager Lady Forester, if so she was doomed to be called, might have a source of happiness unknown to the wife of the gayest and finest gentleman in Scotland. This conviction became stronger as they learned, from inquiries made at head-quarters, that Sir Philip was no longer with the army; though, whether he had been taken or slain in some of those skirmishes which were perpetually occurring, and in which he loved to distinguish himself, or whether he had, for some unknown reason or capricious change of mind, voluntarily left the service, none of his countrymen in the camp of the allies could form even a conjecture. Meantime his creditors at home became clamorous, entered into possession of his property, and threatened his person, should he be rash enough to return to Scotland. These additional disadvantages aggravated Lady Bothwell's displeasure against the fugitive husband; while her sister saw nothing in any of them, save what tended to increase her grief for the absence of him whom her imagination now represented—as it had before marriage—gallant, gay, and affectionate. About this period there appeared in Edinburgh a man of singular appearance and pretensions. He was commonly called the Paduan Doctor, from having received his education at that famous university. He was supposed to possess some rare receipts in medicine, with which, it was affirmed, he had wrought remarkable cures. But though, on the one hand, the physicians of Edinburgh termed him an empiric, there were many persons, and among them some of the clergy, who, while they admitted the truth of the cures and the force of his remedies, alleged that Doctor Baptista Damiotti made use of charms and unlawful arts in order to obtain success in his practice. The resorting to him was even solemnly preached against, as a seeking of health from idols, and a trusting to the help which was to come from Egypt. But the protection which the Paduan doctor received from some friends of interest and consequence, enabled him to set these imputations at defiance, and to assume, even in the city of Edinburgh, famed as it was for abhorrence of witches and necromancers, the dangerous character of an expounder of futurity. It was at length rumoured, that, for a certain gratification, which of course was not an inconsiderable one, Doctor Baptista Damiotti could tell the fate of the absent, and even show his visitors the personal form of their absent friends, and the action in which they were engaged at the moment. This rumour came to the ears of Lady Forester, who had reached that pitch of mental agony in which the sufferer will do any thing, or endure any thing, that suspense may be converted into certainty.

Gentle and timid in most cases, her state of mind made her equally obstinate and reckless, and it was with no small surprise and alarm that her sister, Lady Bothwell, heard her express a resolution to visit this man of art, and learn from him the fate of her husband. Lady Bothwell remonstrated on the improbability that such pretensions as those of this foreigner could be founded in any thing but imposture.

"I care not," said the deserted wife, "what degree of ridicule I may incur: if there be any one chance out of a hundred that I may obtain some certainty of my husband's fate, I would not miss that chance for whatever else the world can offer me."

Lady Bothwell next urged the unlawfulness of resorting to such sources of forbidden knowledge.

"Sister," replied the sufferer, "he who is dying of thirst cannot refrain from drinking even poisoned water. She who suffers under suspense, must seek information, even were the powers which offer it unhallowed and infernal. I go to learn my fate alone; and this very evening will I know it: the sun that rises to-morrow shall find me, if not more happy, at least more resigned."

"Sister," said Lady Bothwell, "if you are determined upon this wild step, you shall not go alone. If this man be an impostor, you may be too much agitated by your feelings to detect his villany. If, which I cannot believe, there be any truth in what he pretends, you shall not be exposed alone to a communication of so extraordinary a nature. I will go with you, if indeed you determine to go. But yet reconsider your project, and renounce inquiries which cannot be prosecuted without guilt, and ~~peril~~ without danger."

Lady Forester threw herself into and, clasping her to her bosom, thanked her a hundred times for the offer of her company; while she declined, with a melancholy gesture, the friendly advice with which it was accompanied.

When the hour of twilight arrived, which was the period when the Paduan doctor was understood to receive the visits of those who came to consult with him—the two ladies left their apartments in the Canonate of Edinburgh, having their dress arranged like that of women of an inferior description, and their plaids disposed around their faces as they were worn by the same class; for, in those days of aristocracy, the quality of the wearer was generally indicated by the manner in which her plaid was disposed, as well as by the fineness of its texture. It was Lady Bothwell who had suggested this species of disguise, partly to avoid observation as they should go to the conjurer's house, and partly in order to make trial of his penetration by appearing before him in a feigned character. Lady Forester's servant, of tried fidelity, had been employed by her to propitiate the doctor by a suitable fee, and a story intimating that a soldier's wife desired to know the fate of her husband; a subject upon which, in all probability, the sage was very frequently consulted.

To the last moment, when the palace clock struck eight, Lady Bothwell earnestly watched her sister, in hopes that she might retreat from her rash undertaking; but as mildness, and even timidity, is capable at times of vehement and fixed purposes, she found Lady Forester resolutely unmoved and determined when the moment of departure arrived. Ill satisfied with the expedition, but determined not to leave her sister at such a crisis, Lady Bothwell accompanied Lady Forester through more than one obscure street and lane, the servant walking before, and acting as their guide. At length he suddenly turned into a narrow court, and knocked at an arched door, which seemed to belong to a building of some antiquity. It opened, though no one appeared to act as porter; and the servant stepping aside from the entrance, motioned the ladies to enter. They had no sooner done so than it shut, and excluded their guide. The two ladies found themselves in a small vestibule, illuminated by a dim lamp, and having, when the door was closed, no communication with the external light or air. The door of an inner apartment, partly open, was at the further side of the vestibule.

"We must not hesitate now, Jemima," said Lady Bothwell, and walked forward into the inner-room, where, surrounded by books, maps, philosophical utensils, and other implements of peculiar shape and appearance, they found the man of art.

There was nothing very peculiar in the Italian's appearance. He had the dark complexion and marked features of his country, seemed about fifty years old, and was handsomely but plainly dressed in a full suit of black clothes, which was then the universal costume of the medical profession. Large wax-lights, in silver sconces, illuminated the apartment, which was reasonably furnished. He rose as the ladies entered; and, notwithstanding the inferiority of their dress, received them with the marked respect due to their quality, and which foreigners are usually punctilious in rendering to those to whom such honours are due.

Lady Bothwell endeavoured to maintain her proposed incognito, and, as the doctor ushered them to the upper end of the room, made a motion declining his courtesy, as unfitted for their condition. "We are poor people, sir," she said; "only my sister's distress has brought us to consult your worship whether—"

He smiled as he interrupted her—"I am aware, madam, of your sister's distress, and its cause; I am aware, also, that I am honoured with a visit from two ladies of the highest consideration—Lady Bothwell and Lady Forester. If I could not distinguish them from the class of society which their present dress would indicate, there would be small possibility of my being able to gratify them by giving the information which they came to seek."

"I can easily understand," said Lady Bothwell—

"Pardon my boldness to interrupt you, mi-lady," cried the Italian; "your ladyship was about to say, that you could easily understand that I had got possession of your names by means of your domestic. But, in thinking so, you do injustice to the fidelity of your servant, and, I may add, to the skill of one who is also not less your humble servant—Baptista Damiotti."

"I have no intention to do either, sir," said Lady Bothwell, maintaining a tone of composure, though somewhat surprised, "but the situation is something new to me. If you know who we are, you also know, sir, what brought us here."

"Curiosity to know the fate of a Scottish gentleman of rank, now, or lately, upon the continent," answered the seer; "his name is il Cavaliero Philippo Forester; a gentleman who has the honour to be husband to this lady, and, with your ladyship's permission for using plain language, the misfortune not to value as it deserves that inestimable advantage."

Lady Forester sighed deeply, and Lady Bothwell replied—

"Since you know our object without our telling it, the only question that remains is, whether you have the power to relieve my sister's anxiety."

"I have, madam," answered the Paduan scholar; "but there is still a previous inquiry. Have you the courage to behold with your own eyes what the Cavaliero Philippo Forester is now doing? or will you take it on my report?"

"That question my sister must answer for herself," said Lady Bothwell.

"With my own eyes will I endure to see whatever you have power to show me," said Lady Forester, with the same determined spirit which had stimulated her since her resolution was taken upon this subject.

"There may be danger in it."

"If gold can compensate the risk," said Lady Forester, taking out her purse.

"I do not such things for the purpose of gain," answered the foreigner. "I dare not turn my art to such a purpose. If I take the gold of the wealthy, it is but to bestow it on the poor; nor do I ever accept more than the sum I have already received from your servant. Put up your purse, madam; an adept needs not your gold."

Lady Bothwell, considering this rejection of her sister's offer as a mere trick of an empiric, to induce her to press a larger sum upon him, and willing that the scene should be commenced and ended, offered some gold in turn, observing that it was only to enlarge the sphere of his charity.

"Let Lady Bothwell enlarge the sphere of her own charity," said the Paduan, "not merely in giving of alms, in which I know she is not deficient, but in judging the character of others; and let her oblige Baptista Damiotti by believing him honest till she shall discover him to be a knave. Do not be surprised, madam, if I speak in answer to your thoughts rather than your expressions; and tell me once more, whether you have courage to look on what I am prepared to show."

"I own, sir," said Lady Bothwell, "that your words strike me with some sense of fear; but whatever my sister desires to witness, I will not shrink from witnessing along with her."

"Nay, the danger only consists in the risk of your resolution failing you. The sight can only last for the space of seven minutes; and should you interrupt the vision by speaking a single word, not only would the charm be broken, but some danger might result to the spectators. But if you can remain steadily silent for the seven minutes, your curiosity will be gratified without the slightest risk; and for this I will engage my honour."

Internally, Lady Bothwell thought the security was but an indifferent one; but she suppressed the suspicion, as if she had believed that the adept, whose dark features wore a half-formed smile, could in reality read even her most secret reflections. A solemn pause then ensued, until Lady Forester gathered courage enough to reply to the physician, as he termed himself, that she would abide with firmness and silence the sight which he had promised to exhibit to them. Upon this, he made them a low obeisance, and saying he went to prepare matters to meet their wish, left the apartment. The two sisters, hand-in-hand, as if seeking by that close union to divert any danger which might threaten them, sat down on two seats in immediate contact with each other; Jemima seeking support in the manly and habitual courage of Lady Bothwell; and she, on the other hand, more agitated than she had expected, endeavouring to fortify herself by the desperate resolution which circumstances had forced her sister to assume. The one perhaps said to herself, that her sister never feared any thing; and the other might reflect, that what so feeble a minded woman as Jemima did not fear, could not properly be a subject of apprehension to a person of firmness and resolution like her own.

In a few moments the thoughts of both were diverted from their own situation, by a strain of music so singularly sweet and solemn, that, while it seemed calculated to avert or dispel any feeling unconnected with its harmony, increased, at the same time, the solemn excitement which the preceding interview was calculated to produce. The music was that of some instrument with which they were unacquainted; but circumstances afterward led my ancestress to believe that it was that of the harmonica, which she heard at a much later period in life.

When these heaven-born sounds had ceased, a door opened in the upper end of the apartment, and they saw Damiotti, standing at the head of two or three steps, sign to them to advance. His dress was so different from that which he had worn a few minutes before, that they could hardly recognise him; and the deadly paleness of his countenance, and a certain stern rigidity of muscles, like that of one whose mind is made up to some strange and daring action, had totally changed the somewhat sarcastic expression with which he had previously regarded them both, and particularly Lady Bothwell. He was barefooted, excepting a species of sandals in the antique fashion; his legs were naked beneath the knee; above them he wore hose, and a doublet of dark crimson silk close to his body; and over that a flowing loose robe, something resembling a surplice, of snow-white linen: his throat and neck were uncovered, and his long, straight, black hair was carefully combed down at full length.

As the ladies approached at his bidding, he showed no gesture of that ceremonious courtesy of which he had been formerly lavish. On the contrary, he made the signal of advance with an air of command; and when, arm-in-arm, and with insecure steps, the sisters approached the spot where he stood, it was with a warning frown that he pressed his finger to his lips, as if reiterating his condition of absolute silence, while, stalking before them, he led the way into the next apartment.

This was a large room, hung with black, as if for a funeral. At the upper end was a table, or rather a species of altar, covered with the same lugubrious colour, on which lay divers objects resembling the usual implements of sorcery. These objects were not indeed visible as they advanced into the apartment; for the light which displayed them, being only that of two expiring lamps, was extremely faint. The master—to use the Italian phrase for persons of this description—approached the upper end of the room, with a genuflection like that of a catholic to the crucifix, and at the same time crossed himself. The ladies followed in silence, and arm-in-arm. Two or three low broad steps led to a platform in front of the altar, or what resembled such. Here the sage took his stand, and placed the ladies beside him, once more earnestly repeating by signs his injunctions of silence. The Italian then, extending his bare arm from under his linen vestment, pointed with his forefinger to five large flambeaux, or torches, placed on each side of the altar. They took fire successively at the approach of his hand, or rather of his finger, and spread a strong light through the room. By this the visitors could discern that, on the seeming altar, were disposed two naked swords laid crosswise; a large open book, which they conceived to be a copy of the Holy Scriptures, but in a language to them unknown; and beside this mysterious volume was placed a human skull. But what struck the sisters most, was a very tall and broad mirror, which occupied all the space behind the altar, and, illumined by the lighted torches, reflected the mysterious articles which were laid upon it.

The master then placed himself between the two ladies, and, pointing to the mirror, took each by the hand, but without speaking a syllable. They gazed intently on the polished and sable space to which he had directed their attention. Suddenly the surface assumed a new and singular appearance. It no longer simply reflected the objects placed before it, but, as if it had self-contained scenery of its own, objects began to appear within it, at first in a disorderly, indistinct, and miscellaneous manner, like form arranging itself out of chaos; at length, in distinct and defined shape and symmetry. It was thus that, after some shifting of light and darkness over the face of the wonderful glass, a long perspective of arches and columns began to arrange itself on its sides, and a vaulted roof on the upper part of it; till, after many oscillations, the whole vision gained a fixed and stationary appearance, representing the interior of a foreign church. The pillars were stately, and hung with scutcheons; the arches were lofty and magnificent; the floor was lettered with funeral inscriptions. But there were no separate shrines, no images, no display of chalice or crucifix on the altar. It was, therefore, a protestant church upon the continent. A clergyman, dressed in the Geneva gown and band, stood by the communion-table, and, with the Bible opened before him, and his clerk awaiting in the back ground, seemed prepared to perform some service of the church to which he belonged.

At length there entered the middle aisle of the building a numerous party, which appeared to be a bridal one, as a lady and gentleman walked first, hand-in-hand, followed by a large concourse of persons of both sexes, gayly, nay, richly attired. The bride, whose features they could distinctly see, seemed not more than sixteen years old, and extremely beautiful. The bridegroom, for some seconds, moved rather with his shoulder toward them, and his face averted; but his elegance of form and step struck the sisters at once with the same apprehension. As he turned his face suddenly, it was frightfully realized, and they saw, in the gay bridegroom before them, Sir Philip Forester. His wife uttered an imperfect exclamation, at the sound of which the whole scene stirred and seemed to separate.

"I could compare it to nothing," said Lady Bothwell while recounting the wonderful tale, "but to the dispersion of the reflection offered by a deep and calm pool, when a stone is suddenly cast into it, and the shadows become dissipated and broken." The master pressed both the ladies' hands severely, as if to remind them of their promise, and of the danger which they incurred. The exclamation died away on Lady Forester's tongue, without attaining perfect utterance, and the scene in the glass, after the fluctuation of a minute, again resumed to the eye its former appearance of a real scene existing within the mirror, as if represented in a picture, save that the figures were moveable instead of being stationary.

The representation of Sir Philip Forester, now distinctly visible in form and feature, was seen to lead on toward the clergyman that beautiful girl, who advanced at once with diffidence and with a species of affectionate pride. In the meantime, and just as the clergyman had arranged the bridal company before him, and seemed about to commence the service, another group of persons, of whom two or three were officers, entered the church. They moved, at first, forward, as though they came to witness the bridal ceremony, but suddenly one of the officers, whose back was toward the spectators, detached himself from his companions, and rushed hastily towards the marriage party; when the whole of them turned toward him, as if attracted by some exclamation which had accompanied his advance. Suddenly the intruder drew his sword; the bridegroom unsheathed his own, and made toward him; swords were also drawn by other individuals, both of the marriage party and of those who had last entered. They fell into a sort of confusion, the clergyman and some elder and graver persons labouring apparently to keep the peace, while the hotter spirits, on both sides, brandished their weapons. But now the period of the brief space, during which the soothsayer, as he pretended, was permitted to exhibit his art, was arrived. The fumes again mixed together, and dissolved gradually from observation; the vaults and columns of the church rolled asunder, and disappeared; and the front of the mirror reflected nothing save the blazing torches and the melancholy apparatus placed on the altar or table before it.

The doctor led the ladies, who greatly required his support, into the apartment from whence they came; where wine, essences, and other means of restoring suspended animation, had been provided during his absence. He motioned them to chairs, which they occupied in silence; Lady Forester, in particular, wringing her hands and casting her eyes up to heaven, but without speaking a word, as if the spell had been still before her eyes.

"And what we have seen is even now acting?" said Lady Bothwell, collecting herself with difficulty.

"That," answered Baptista Damiotti, "I cannot justly, or with certainty, say. But it is either now acting or has been acted, during a short space before this. It is the last remarkable transaction in which the Cavalier Forester has been engaged."

Lady Bothwell then expressed anxiety concerning her sister, whose altered countenance and apparent unconsciousness of what passed around her, excited her apprehensions how it might be possible to convey her home.

"I have prepared for that," answered the adept; "I have directed the servant to bring your equipage as near to this place as the narrowness of the street will permit. Fear not for your sister; but give her, when you return home, this composing draught, and she will be better to-morrow morning. Few," he added, in a melancholy tone, "leave this house as well in health as they entered it. Such being the consequence of seeking knowledge by mysterious means, I leave you to judge the condition of those who have the power of gratifying such irregular curiosity. Farewell, and forget not the potion."

"I will give her nothing that comes from you," said Lady Bothwell; "I have seen enough of your art already. Perhaps you would poison us both, to conceal your own necromancy. But we are persons who want neither the means of making our wrongs known, nor the assistance of friends to right them."

"You have had no wrongs from me, madam," said the adept. "You sought one who is little grateful for such honour. He seeks no one, and only gives responses to those who invite and call upon him. After all, you have but learned a little sooner the evil which you must still be doomed to endure. I hear your servant's step at the door, and will detain your ladyship and Lady Forester no longer. The next packet from the continent will explain what you have already partly witnessed. Let it not, if I may advise, pass too suddenly into your sister's hands."

So saying, he bid Lady Bothwell good night. She went, lighted by the adept, to the vestibule, where he hastily threw a black cloak over his singular dress, and opening the door, entrusted his visitors to the care of the servant. It was with difficulty that Lady Bothwell sustained her sister to the carriage, though it was only twenty steps distant. When they arrived at home, Lady Forester required medical assistance. The physician of the family attended, and shook his head on feeling her pulse.

"Here has been," he said, "a violent and sudden shock on the nerves. I must know how it has happened."

Lady Bothwell admitted they had visited the conjurer, and that Lady Forester had received some bad news respecting her husband, Sir Philip.

"That rascally quack would make my fortune, were he to stay in Edinburgh," said the graduate; "this is the seventh nervous case I have heard of his making for me, and all by effect of terror." He next examined the composing draught which Lady Bothwell had unconsciously brought in her hand, tasted it, and pronounced it very german to the matter, and what would save an application to the apothecary. He then paused, and looking at Lady Bothwell very significantly, at length added, "I suppose I must not ask your ladyship any thing about this Italian warlock's proceedings?"

"Indeed, doctor," answered Lady Bothwell, "I consider what passed as confidential; and though the man may be a rogue, yet, as we were fools enough to consult him, we should, I think, be honest enough to keep his counsel."

"May be a knave—come," said the doctor, "I am glad to hear your ladyship allows such a possibility in any thing that comes from Italy."

"What comes from Italy may be as good as what comes from Hanover, doctor. But you and I will remain good friends, and that it may be so, we will say nothing of whig and tory."

"Not I," said the doctor, receiving his fee; and, taking his hat, "a Carolus serves my purpose as well as a Willielmus. But I should like to know why old Lady Saint Ringan's, and all that set, go about wasting their decayed lungs in puffing this foreign fellow."

"Ay—you had best set him down a Jesuit, as Scrub says." On these terms they parted.

The poor patient—whose nerves, from an extraordinary state of tension, had at length become relaxed in as extraordinary a degree—continued to struggle with a sort of imbecility, the growth of superstitious terror, when the shocking tidings were brought from Holland, which fulfilled even her worst expectations.

They were sent by the celebrated earl of Stair, and contained the melancholy event of a duel betwixt Sir Philip Forester and his wife's half-brother, Captain Falconer, of the Scotch-Dutch, as they were then called, in which the latter had been killed. The cause of the quarrel rendered the incident still more shocking. It seemed that Sir Philip had left the army suddenly, in consequence of being unable to pay a very considerable sum, which he had lost to another volunteer at play. He had changed his residence and taken up his residence at Rotterdam, and had insinuated himself into the good ancient and rich burgomaster, and by his handsome person and graceful manners captivated the affections of his only child, a very young person, of great beauty, and the heiress of much wealth. Delighted with the specious attractions of his proposed son-in-law, the wealthy merchant—whose idea of the British character was too high to admit of his taking any precaution to acquire evidence of his condition and circumstances—gave his consent to the marriage. It was about to be celebrated in the principal church of the city, when it was interrupted by a singular occurrence.

Captain Falconer having been detached to Rotterdam to bring up a part of the brigade of Scottish auxiliaries, who were in quarters there, a person of consideration in the town, to whom he had been formerly known, proposed to him, for amusement, to go to the high church, to see a countryman of his own married to the daughter of a wealthy burgomaster. Captain Falconer went accordingly, accompanied by his Dutch acquaintance, with a party of his friends, and two or three officers of the Scotch brigade. His astonishment may be conceived, when he saw his own brother-in-law, a married man, on the point of leading to the altar the innocent and beautiful creature, upon whom he was about to practise a base and unmanly deceit. He proclaimed his villany on the spot, and the marriage was interrupted of course. But, against the opinion of more thinking men, who considered Sir Philip Forester as having thrown himself out of the rank of men of honour, Captain Falconer admitted him to the privileges of such, accepted a challenge from him, and in the rencontre received a mortal wound. Such are the ways of heaven, mysterious in our eyes. Lady Forester never recovered the shock of this dismal intelligence.

 "And did this tragedy," said I, "take place exactly at the time when the scene in the mirror was exhibited?"

"It is hard to be obliged to maim one's story," answered my aunt; "but, to speak the truth, it happened some days sooner than the apparition was exhibited."

"And so there remained a possibility," said I, "that by some secret and speedy communication the artist might have received early intelligence of that incident?"

"The incredulous pretended so," replied my aunt.

"What became of the adept?" demanded I.

"Why, a warrant came down shortly afterwards to arrest him for high-treason, as an agent of the Chevalier St. George; and Lady Bothwell, recollecting the hints which had escaped the doctor, an ardent friend of the Protestant succession, did then call to remembrance, that this man was chiefly prone among the ancient matrons of her own political persuasion. It certainly seemed probable that intelligence from the continent, which could easily have been transmitted by an active and powerful agent, might have enabled him to prepare such a scene of phantasmagoria as she had herself witnessed. Yet there were so many difficulties in assigning a natural explanation, that, to the day of her death, she remained in great doubt on the subject, and much disposed to cut the Gordian knot, by admitting the existence of supernatural agency."

"But, my dear aunt," said I, "what became of the man of skill?"

"Oh, he was too good a fortune-teller not to be able to foresee that his own destiny would be tragical, if he waited the arrival of the man with the silver greyhound upon his sleeve. He made, as we say, a moonlight flitting, and was nowhere to be seen, or heard of. Some noise there was about papers or letters found in the house, but it died away, and Doctor Baptista Damioiti was soon as little talked of as Galen or Hippocrates."

"And Sir Philip Forester," said I, "did he, too, vanish for ever from the public scene?"

"No," replied my kind informer. "He was heard of once more, and it was upon a remarkable occasion. It was said that we Scots, when there was such a nation in existence, have, among our full peck of virtues, one or two barleycorns of vice. In particular, it is alleged that we rarely forgive, and never forget, any injuries received; that we used to make an idol of our resentment, as poor Lady Constance did of her grief; and are addicted, as Burns says, to 'nursing our wrath to keep it warm.' Lady Bothwell was not without this feeling; and, I believe, nothing whatever, scarcely the restoration of the Stuart line, could have happened so delicious to her feelings as an opportunity of being revenged on Sir Philip Forester for the deep and double injury which had deprived her of a sister and of a brother. But nothing of him was heard or known till many a year had passed away."

At length—it was on a Fasten's E'en—Shrovetide—assembly, at which the whole fashion of Edinburgh attended, full and frequent, and when Lady Bothwell had a seat amongst the lady patronesses, that one of the attendants on the company whispered into her ear, that a gentleman wished to speak with her in private.

"In private? and in an assembly-room? He must be mad. Tell him to call upon me to-morrow-morning."

"I said so, my lady," answered the man, "but he desired me to give you this paper."

She undid the billet, which was curiously folded and sealed. It only bore the words, "On business of life and death," written in a hand which she had never seen before. Suddenly it occurred to her that it might concern the safety of some of her political friends; she, therefore, followed the messenger to a small apartment where the refreshments were prepared, and from which the general company was excluded. She found an old man, who, at her approach, rose up and bowed profoundly. His appearance indicated a broken constitution, and his dress, though sedulously rendered conforming to the etiquette of a ball-room, was worn and tarnished, and hung in folds about his emaciated person. Lady Bothwell was about to feel for her purse, expecting to get rid of the suppliant at the expense of a little money, but some fear of a mistake arrested her purpose. She, therefore, gave the man leisure to explain himself.

"I have the honour to speak with the Lady Bothwell."

"I am Lady Bothwell; allow me to say that this is no time or place for long explanations. What are your commands with me?"

"Your ladyship," said the old man, "had once a sister."

"True; whom I loved as my own soul."

"And a brother."

"The bravest, the kindest, the most affectionate," said Lady Bothwell.

"Both these beloved relatives you lost by the fault of an unfortunate man," continued the stranger.

"By the crime of an unnatural, bloody-minded murderer," said the lady.

"I am answered," replied the old man, bowing as if to withdraw.

"Stop, sir, I command you," said Lady Bothwell. "Who are you, that, at such a place and time, come to recal these horrible recollections? I insist upon knowing."

"I am one who means Lady Bothwell no injury; but, on the contrary, to offer her the means of doing a deed of christian charity which the world would wonder at, and which heaven would reward; but I find her in no temper for such a sacrifice as I was prepared to ask."

"Speak out, sir; what is your meaning?" said Lady Bothwell.

"The wretch that has wronged you so deeply," rejoined the stranger, "is now on his deathbed. His days have been days of misery, his nights have been sleepless hours of anguish—yet he cannot die without your forgiveness. His life has been an unremitting penance—yet he dares not part from his burthen while your curses load his soul."

"Tell him," said Lady Bothwell sternly, "to ask pardon of that Being whom he has so greatly offended; not of an erring mortal like himself. What could my forgiveness avail him?"

"Much," answered the old man. "It will be an earnest of that which he may then venture to ask from his Creator, lady, and from yours. Remember, Lady Bothwell, you too have a deathbed to look forward to; your soul may—all human souls must—feel the awe of facing the judgment-seat, with the wounds of an untented conscience, raw, and rankling—what thought would it be, then, that should whisper, 'I have given no mercy, how then shall I ask it?'"

"Man, whosoever thou mayst be," replied Lady Bothwell, "urge me not so cruelly. It would be but blasphemous hypocrisy to utter with my lips the words which every throb of my heart protests against. They would open the earth and give to light the wasted form of my sister—the bloody form of my murdered brother. Forgive him? Never, never!"

"Great God!" cried the old man, holding up his hands; "is it thus the worms which thou hast called out of dust obey the commands of their Maker? Farewell, proud and unforgiving woman. Exult that thou hast added to a death, in want and pain, the agonies of religious despair; but never again mock heaven by petitioning for the pardon which thou hast refused to grant."

He was turning from her.

"Stop," she exclaimed; "I will try; yes, I will try to pardon him."

"Gracious lady," said the old man, "you will relieve the over-burdened soul which dare not sever itself from its sinful companion of earth without being at peace with you. What do I know—your forgiveness may, perhaps, preserve for penitence the dregs of a wretched life."

"Ha!" said the lady, as a sudden light broke on her, "it is the villain himself." And grasping Sir Philip Forester—for it was he, and no other—by the collar, she raised a cry of "Murder, murder! seize the murderer!"

At an exclamation so singular, in such a place, the company thronged into the apartment; but Sir Philip Forester was no longer there. He had forcibly extricated himself from Lady Bothwell's hold, and had run out of the apartment which opened on the landing-place of the stair. There seemed no escape in that direction, for there were several persons coming up the steps, and others descending. But the unfortunate man was desperate. He threw himself over the balustrade, and alighted safely in the lobby, though a leap of fifteen feet at least, then dashed into the street, and was lost in darkness. Some of the Bothwell family made pursuit, and had they come up with the fugitive, they might have perhaps slain him; for in those days men's blood ran warm in their veins. But the police did not interfere; the matter most criminal having happened long since, and in a foreign land. Indeed, it was always thought that this extraordinary scene originated in a hypocritical experiment, by which Sir Philip desired to ascertain whether he might return to his native country in safety from the resentment of a family which he had injured so deeply. As the result fell out so contrary to his wishes, he is believed to have returned to the continent, and there died in exile. So closed the tale of the MYSTERIOUS MIRROR.

SKETCH OF CHARACTER.

FROM BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

THE AUTHOR.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE FIRST.

THERE is no wreck which is more a sight for pity than that human ruin—an unfortunate man; and no human ruin more pitiable than genius wrecked by the winds and waves of adversity. I have looked on the ivied remains of some ancient castle, once a strong-hold for war, and have lamented its pride made humble, its strength half prostrate, and toppling ere it totally fall, like an aged man's—its halls, where thronged the mailed men of chivalry, and the daughters of beauty, whose "eyes rained influence, and judged the prize;" now the dull home of the bat, and toad, and things obscene—where, for the roundelay of the minstrel,

"The moping owl doth to the moon complain
Of such as, wandering near her secret tower,
Molest her ancient, solitary reign."

And I have looked at that no less noble wreck, that floating castle of the sea, a dismantled vessel of war—lying, with bare ribs and broken timbers, on the ignoble bank of a narrow tributary river to its proud parent the sea, who bore it on her bosom as a mother her child—where it was now left by the tide like a leviathan of the waters, deserted on a shore too shallow for its mighty bulk to float over. I have thought of its century of pride, when it was a thing of motion, and almost of life—when its prow broke the waves before it, as a plough breaks up the earth with its share—and, in imagination, have heard the surly thunder of its guns, and seen the destruction of its thunder-bolts, crushing its enemies as with the hand of death. I have looked with serious thoughts at these mighty things no longer mighty; but none of them have inspired me with that awe which the sight of human intellect in its decay, or neglect, struck on the heart, and drew from the eyes. That a mind which might have enlightened its country—perhaps the world—should have been hidden under obscuring clouds, till that inward light, "self-fed, and self-consumed," grew dim, and "paled its ineffectual fire," throwing out only those faint, intermittent flashes which a dying taper flings momentarily from its socket—that a voice which might, but for these neglects, have been heard singing to our ravished ears from "the third heaven of invention," should be tremulous, choked, and broken, by vain efforts to reveal feelings which lie too deep for words, to communicate the sorrows of a desolated heart to an ear ever patient to hear the "simple annals of the poor;" that a heart which might have glowed with the very "life of life," and been filled with friendliness for all, with pity for the poor and the unhappy, love for the good and the beautiful, and human kindness for all who are human—and have lived like a fertile and sunny spot in that little world, the body of man—should, by neglect alone, become a dreary desert, an unvisited and unweeded garden, choked with the weeds and briars of self-abandonment and hopeless indolence—without a flower—or with but here and there one, where might have been nothing but one paradise of sweets—to bloom in a barren space, and throw out the perfume of the soul—are indeed causes for pity, that we should painfully see these things, and for regret, that we cannot hope to remedy them.

It is a fault which only "experience, that makes fools wise," and wise men wiser, can correct in a young and ardent mind, that, when it first awakes to a consciousness of talent, it is too rash and ungovernable to use its discovery to the best advantage. It no sooner discovers the spring of mind within, than it at once bares it to the broad eye of day; and you must stop, and, prostrating yourself like a thankful pilgrim at some sacred fountain, drink with reverence of its new waters, and bless it with a fervent benison, or you are no true worshipper of the muses. The young man of genius no sooner finds that he has feet for the difficult race of fame, than he commences running; and that so fast, that, before half the course is strained over, his powers, too fiercely tried, or too little encouraged to the trial, fail him as suddenly as he found them: he halts in his headlong speed, and the race is lost from his eagerness to win it. Then come present disappointment, backward-looking regret, hope that looks not forward, and pining despondency, regardless and reckless self-abandonment, and, finally, helpless despair.

The first fault of a young author's life is the key to the rest of it; and usually opens the wicket-door to a long and winding walk through that maze of error which too certainly leads, in the end, to the desolate bower of disappointment. Inexperience, in him, is so far a fault, that it is the parent of a large family of young errors. Ignorant of the world, he presumes to teach it, when he should sit as a scholar in its wisdom-giving school: but he is too erratic; he forsakes the lyceums of learning like a truant, and will have no place but the fields for his study—no book but the book of nature to pore upon. He is, perhaps, diligent, and acquires something for himself; and he teaches what he learns as fast as he learns it, instead of nourishing and storing it like "a seed which, after many days, should bring forth" the fruit of knowledge "a hundred fold;" reminding us of those shallow artificial basins we sometimes meet with in palace-gardens, which pour out as fast as they receive waters not their own, and are full to-day and empty to-morrow—instead of resembling a natural spring, and being an inexhaustible well-head of waters of a constant flow and fullness. Or if he is not so daringly ignorant as to aim at teaching mankind, but only at amusing them, and tunes a romantic harp to tales of love and chivalry, or touches the lyre to tragic story, or indulges only in the capricious flights of wild imagination—the world has too many stunning realities, too much of natural horror, and too much of unnatural hatred, of brother-nation against brother-nation, of child-land against father-land, to listen to the beautiful imaginations of the muse. The world, therefore, looks coldly on him, and he, in turn, looks coldly on the world; this is the first chill his ardent nature receives. He has expected great deference, honour, and public applause; and only two or three followers of his own hurl up their caps in the corner of the hall. He has thought that genius and success are one; he has genius still; but where is success? He at last learns that great talents may be obscured under unfavourable clouds; that even genius may be born too early or too late for the age. His shining talents are, therefore, to him, like gold to one who perishes of drought in a desert. The spirit which made him independent breaks; and now he looks round for that success at the hand of one, which he has failed in obtaining from the hands of many: he seeks a patron, finds one, and proudly bends his head, to be crowned, as he imagines, with the laurels of patronage, but he finds, in the end, that he has been crowned with thorns.

But I cannot better illustrate the progress of an unfortunate man of genius, and finish the picture I have half drawn, than by presenting the sketch of a young author's life, from his May of hope to his December of despair; and this I shall presently give in the words of the unfortunate hero himself.

It is the privilege of a few, that though they play no part on the great stage of life, yet they are sometimes admitted behind the scenes, and behold its deceptions, its puppets, its paint and patchwork. Having had this privilege, I have not failed to snatch the opportunity of seeing men as they are, and not as they seem to be. Indeed, he who wishes to see the world as it is, should not look at it through the eyes of others, but through that medium which nature and reason have given to all men, if they will distinguish for themselves, and not trust implicitly to guides who wilfully and perversely blind themselves to the beauty of the world, and to the single worth and entire value of its many-peopled and many-passioned cities and citizens.

I was sitting, as is my custom after dinner, in the Chapter coffee-house, and was employed, at that moment, in musing on the misfortunes incidental to genius—a subject to which I had been led, from falling in with the "Life of Dermody" during the morning—when, on looking across the room, I observed a semi-genteel figure sliding towards the box in which I was sitting, who, after inquiring for letters, and finding there were none, shrugged up his shoulders with evident disappointment; and then, bowing to me with something like condescension, seated himself on the opposite side of my table. His manner and features struck me at the first glance, as those which I had somewhere known in years gone by, but which time had half obliterated. His head being uncovered, his forehead showed high and expansive; it was bald, and furrowed with strong lines of care and deeply-engraved sorrows. His face had the look of much thought, mixed with a mild melancholy; his eyes were half-sparkling, half-dimmed, as they had wept out their brightness in tears; and his whole appearance that of a young man made early old by disappointment and despondency. Not to keep my attentive readers on the step of my story, when they should stand in the hall—after some progressive conversation on the subjects of the day, which led, in the end, to many remarks, from both sides, on things not made for the day, but "for all time"—the immortal men and books of the "o'er-passed age"—a few short sentences of explanation discovered to me, under the disguise of a literary name, and the mutilating alterations of time and misfortune, my old warm-headed and warm-hearted school-fellow, Jack Everard!

It is not the worst moment of our lives when two school-boy friends—grown older by the loss of the gentle and happy years of life, and colder by the loss of hair-brained haste and intemperate ardency—meet again, after long years of separation, no longer boys, but men: it is then that we most feel that we have been young, "but now are old;" though we have, perhaps, husbanded enough warmth of heart in this wintry world to be glad and young again at our meeting, if we feel sad and old when it is over. In a moment we had both started up, and catching each other's hands, need I say that tears started in both our eyes? A motley host of mine came rushing down my cheeks, some of them running for joy, others for pity of my friend's condition; others for old schoolboy-recollections, which now started up like dreamers that had been long asleep; and others for friendly and mingled feelings that cannot be classed or separated one from another: whilst his ran over for the change he felt he had undergone, from hopeful youth to hopeless manhood, as well as for the recollection of the friendship he had forgotten, but which he saw was as young as ever.

Everard was as much astonished to see me as I him. Time had altered both of us, but how had the world altered him! He was the hope and pride of our school—the delight of all when present, and the sole topic of praise when absent; open-hearted to a fault—open-handed to poverty—kind to the unkind—pious to those who deserved pity—loving all men as they were his brothers, and beloved by all as they were brothers to him. I knew not, at the moment of our meeting, whether he was altered in all of these things; but when I looked at him, I could see that time and change had robbed him of some of them. I was anxious to know his history; and again grasping his hand, with our old schoolboy-warmth,

"Frank," said he, "you are the same hearted fellow as ever; but I have neither heart nor spirits now to tell you the perils of the road through which I have passed. I would rather forget them, and think them well endured, that I have overtaken an old fellow-traveller, who has luckily escaped them, and has gone on with a light heart, which makes the heels light to outrun many accidents that dog the heavy-hearted and heavy-heeled pilgrims; I am as glad to meet thee as I should be to meet my happy boyhood again, if I could again be a happy boy, and forget that I have been an unhappy man."

"Everard," I rejoined, "when I look at you, I fear that you have indeed known many vicissitudes since last we met?"

I saw at a glance that I had unconsciously touched the tenderest string of the human heart—that which vibrates to its own sorrows. His countenance changed, and his eyes dropped with downcast earnestness on the vessel he held in his hand. It was plain that I had given a turn to his thoughts, which pained him; and I felt somewhat of regret, as I beheld the waters of a wounded heart running over at his eyes, which he endeavoured, but in vain, to conceal. His hand trembled as he grasped the cup; he lifted it to his quivering lips, but drank not, and returned it to the table; again he raised it, but his hand still trembled, and he laid it down. I sat in silence. Words cannot console the heart in moments of agony like these: you might as well hope to silence the stir of troubled waters by plunging pebbles into them: the heart must administer its own cure, or die of its own disease. At length, after a painful abstraction of some minutes, casting his eyes on me, and then glancing them another way, as if conscious that he had let me too far into his feelings, I ventured again to address him.

"A man need not blush for any tears but those wrung from hearts he has wounded."

"Perhaps not," was his reply, as he wiped away those he would no longer strive to conceal.

"Nature, our bountiful mother, did not drop into our hearts those precious waters, drained from her own breast—to be kept there like a little spring of freshness, to assuage the fever and thirst of the brain—that we should deny its waters of relief to ourselves or to others, and shut it from them like a sealed well. Though I should think the man weak who went whimpering about like a schoolboy, I should count that man wicked who had tears for no sorrow. He who can weep his own griefs, can—or I know not the human heart—feel for those of others.”

“Not always,” he replied; “you forget the selfish.”

“Let us hope that these are few; and let them keep their tears as misers do their gold, to deny them, in the end, to themselves, and to stagnate in their heart, till what was designed by nature to refresh them, shall prove the source of poison and pestilence! But come—I’ll hear thy story, Jack; or I shall imagine it worse than it is; and you shall behold me weeping woes which are but the tricks of a strong or a weak imagination. Here is the Burgundy, mine honest Jack of the olden days of youth; drink till thy glass look pale at the pedestal; and tell us thy story as it were not thine; and yet, let it be thine, or no man’s. Drink, and let us forget the use of eyekerchiefs, and leave them to the waiter to wipe glasses instead of eyes.”

Here he threw out one of his old laughing looks of pleasantry, which were wont to set the “playground in a roar.” His reply will be found in the next number.

VARIETIES.

ACOUSTICS.—A bell rung under water returns a tone as distinct as if rung in the air.

Stop one ear with the finger, and press the other to one end of a long stick, or piece of deal wood, and if a watch be held at the other end of the wood, the ticking will be heard, be the wood or stick ever so long.

Tie a poker on to the middle of a strip of flannel, two or three feet long, and press with the thumbs or fingers the ends of the flannel into your ears, while you swing the poker against an iron fender, and you will hear a sound like that of a very heavy church bell. These experiments prove that water, wood, and flannel, are good conductors of sound; for the sound from the bell, the watch, and the fender, pass through the water, and along the deal and flannel to the ear. It must be observed, that a body, while in the act of sounding, is in a state of vibration, which it communicates to the surrounding air; the undulations of the air affect the ear, and excite in us the sense of sound. Sounds, of all kinds, it is ascertained, travel at the rate of thirteen miles in a minute; the softest whisper travels as fast as the most tremendous thunder. The knowledge of this fact has been applied to the measurement of distances.

Suppose a ship in distress fire a gun, the light of which is seen on shore, or by another vessel, twenty seconds before the report is heard, it is known to be at the distance of twenty times eleven hundred and forty-two feet, or little more than four miles and a half.

Again, if I see a vivid flash of lightning, and in two seconds hear a tremendous clap of thunder, I know that the thunder cloud is not more than seven hundred and sixty yards from the place where I am, and should instantly retire from an exposed situation.

The pulse of a healthy person beats about seventy-six times in a minute; if, therefore, between a flash of lightning and the thunder, I can feel one, two, three, four, &c. beats of my pulse, I know that the cloud is nine hundred, one thousand eight hundred, two thousand seven hundred, &c. feet from me.

Sound, like light, after it has been reflected from several places, may be collected into one point as a focus, where it will be more audible than in any other part. On this principle, whispering galleries are constructed.

Speaking trumpets, and those intended to assist the hearing of deaf persons, depend on the reflection of sound from the sides of the trumpet, and also upon its being confined and prevented from spreading in every direction. A speaking trumpet, to have its full effect, must be directed in a line towards the hearer. The report of a gun is much louder, when towards a person, than one placed in a contrary direction.

An echo is the reflection of sound striking against a surface adapted to the purpose, as the side of a hill, house, wall, &c.

LOUISIANA.—A tar, who had been boasting of the numerous foreign places he had seen, was asked if ever he had seen Louisiana. “No,” says Jack; “what country does she live in?”

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

ANSWER TO KELVIN GROVE.

Oh! I’ll hie to Kelvin grove,
Bonnie laddie, oh!
Through its fairy walks I’ll rove,
Bonnie laddie, oh!
When the blooming mountain-rose
Around its fragrance throws—
Where the honey-suckle grows,
Bonnie laddie, oh!

And when the hour shall come,
Bonnie laddie, oh!
That tears thee from thy home,
Bonnie laddie, oh!
From thy happy native vale,
On the stormy seas to sail—
Blessed be thy parting gale!—
Bonnie laddie, oh!

And if, on foreign shore,
Bonnie laddie, oh!
Thou fall’st midst din of war,
Bonnie laddie, oh!
Let mem’ry’s cheering power,
Like a fondly-cherished flower,
Bring peace in that lone hour,
Bonnie laddie, oh!

CURIOUS PETITION.—The following is a true copy of an original petition, supposed to have been written sixty years since, by a Mr. James Mason:

“To the honourable the commissioners of excise—The humble petition of Barney O’Blaney, Patrick O’Fagan, Carney O’Conner, and Teage O’Regan, to be appointed inspectors, and surveyors, and overlookers, vulgarly called excisemen, for the county of Cork, its own self, in the kingdom of Ireland.

“And whereas we, the aforesaid petitioners, will, both by night and by day, and all night and all day, and we will come and go, and walk and ride, and take and bring, and send and fetch, and carry, and we will see all, and more than all, and every thing, and nothing at all, of all such goods and commodities as may be, and can be, and cannot be, liable to pay duty; and we, the aforesaid petitioners, will, at times, and at no times at all, and at time past, be present, and be absent, and be backward, and be forward, and behind, and before, and every where, and no where, and here and there, and no where at all; and we, the aforesaid petitioners, will come, and inform, and give information and notice, duly, truly, and honestly, and wisely, according to the matter as we know, and by the knowledge of ourselves, and for every one of us, and no one at all; and we will not cheat the king any more than what is now lawfully practised.

“And whereas we, the aforesaid petitioners, as we are gentlemen of reputation, and we are protestants, and we love the king, and we will value him, and we will fight for him, and run for him, and from him, and after him, and behind him, and before him, and one side of him, and the other side of him, to save him, or any of his acquaintances or relations, as fast, and much faster, than lies in our power, and dead and alive, as long as we live, and longer too. Witness our several and separate hands in conjunction, one after another, all together, one and all three of us, both together. Barney O’Blaney, Patrick O’Fagan, Carney O’Conner, Teage O’Regan, of Charley Mont.”

BURNS.—There are but few of the “ills which flesh is heir to,” which are more common than burns and scalds; nor is there any one for the cure of which there has been a greater variety of prescriptions. Almost every good woman has her favourite application—it is the best thing in the world. Nor is the case much different with physicians and surgeons. Every one presumes he knows perfectly well what is the best method of treating a burn, though scarcely two treat them alike. And though death is not most commonly the consequence of burns and scalds, yet even that is not a rare occurrence. And where the case is by no means dangerous, it is commonly attended with much misery. All this shows very plainly, that, with all our knowledge on this subject, we have need to know something more. And the subject of these remarks is to introduce to the notice of our readers an application which, till lately, was new to us, and is so, we presume, to many. It is no other than common wheat flour. No other application is to be made in any ordinary case. As soon as possible after the accident, the part is to be covered with flour, shaken upon it with a flour-drudger, or sifted upon it through a common sieve. It is said that it gives speedy relief. The operation of dusting over the part is to be repeated from time to time, as the smarting returns. The credit of proposing this remedy to the public, is due to Dr. Michael Ward, of Manchester, England. If it should be found equal to his recommendation, it will prevent much misery, and even death; besides having the recommendation of being always at hand, readily applied by any person, cheap enough, and perfectly cleanly.

THE CUNNING COBBLER.—Some time ago, the husband of an old lady, living in Buckinghamshire, died without making his will, for the want of which necessary precaution his estate would have passed away from his widow, had she not resorted to the following expedient to avert the loss of the property. She concealed the death of her husband, and prevailed on an old cobbler, her neighbour, who was, in person, somewhat like the deceased, to go to bed at her house, and personate him, in which character it was agreed that he should dictate a will, leaving the widow the estate in question. An attorney was sent for to draw up the writings. The widow, who, on his arrival, appeared in great affliction at her good man’s danger, began to ask questions of her pretended husband, calculated to elicit the answers she expected and desired. The cobbler, groaning aloud, and looking as much like a person going to give up the ghost as possible, feebly answered, “I intend to leave you half of my estates, and I think the poor old shoemaker, who lives opposite, is deserving the other half, for he has always been a good neighbour.” The widow was thunder-struck at receiving a reply so different from that which she expected, but dared not negative the cobbler’s will, for fear of losing the whole of the property; while the old rogue in bed—who was himself the poor old shoemaker living opposite—laughed in his sleeve, and divided with her the fruits of a project which the widow had intended for her sole benefit.

EVENNESS OF TEMPER.—Madame Necker relates the following anecdote of M. Aburet, a philosopher of Geneva. It was said of him, that he had never been out of temper. Some persons, by means of his female servant, were determined to put him to this proof. The woman in question stated, that she had been his servant for thirty years; and she protested that, during that time, she had never seen him in a passion. They promised her a sum of money, if she would endeavour to make him angry. She consented; and knowing that he was particularly fond of having his bed well made, she, on the day appointed, neglected to make it. M. Aburet observed it, and, the next morning, made the observation to her. She answered, that she had forgotten it; she said nothing more, but, on the same evening, she again neglected to make the bed. The same observation was made on the morrow, by the philosopher; and she again made some excuse, in a cooler manner than before. On the third day, he said to her, “You have not yet made my bed; you have, apparently, come to some resolution on the subject, as you, probably, found that it fatigued you. But, after all, it is of no consequence, as I begin to accustom myself to it as it is. She threw herself at his feet, and avowed all to him.

SPOON FOR ADMINISTERING MEDICINE.—A very neat and ingenious spoon for administering medicine to children, without their tasting it, and for other medical purposes, has been invented by Gibson, of Bishopsgate. The society of arts have awarded their Isis medal for this useful and necessary instrument, and it is now universally used, as it deserves to be, in the hospitals, and by the faculty in private practice.

METAPHYSICS.—A Scotch blacksmith being asked the meaning of metaphysics, explained it as follows:—“When a party that listens disna ken what the party who speaks means, and the party who speaks disna ken what he means himself—that is metaphysics.”

A WILLOW WHISTLE.—Did you ever play on willow whistles? This question recalls to my mind the happy days of my childhood; and my eye-lids feel damp, as I reflect that they are gone, never to return. The first impressions which I can recollect were those of green fields, and sunny banks, and humming bees, and butterflies, and singing birds, and battle-door and shuttle-cock. Oh! enviable ignorance! What could possibly be meant by the expression, “knowledge of the world?” a sentence which I have heard on all sides of me; and then people looked grave, and shook their heads. To me it was all incomprehensible, but certainly it must have been something that was not very good. But what mattered it to me what it was? I had nothing to do with it. I only knew that the sun shone, and the birds sung, and the brook sung, and the cricket sung, and all was cheerful innocence, whether I and my playmates toppled amidst the fragrant new mown hay of summer, or feasted under the loaded trees of autumn. And all was cheerful innocence, too, in winter, when we thumped our noses in blind-man's buff, or burnt our fingers and throats with eating blazing raisins in the ancient and honourable game of snap-dragon. And when the moon majestically arose,

Like one who had been led astray
Through the heaven's wide pathless way;
And oft, as if her head she bow'd,
Stooping 'neath a fleecy cloud."

The following simple, joyous carol, proceeding from my playmate serenaders, thrilled music through my heart:

"Oh! Anny Fanny, come away,
The moon now shines as bright as day;
Come with a whoop, come with a call,
Come with a good will, or not come at all."

Joyous were our sports, as those of fairies glancing through the moonbeams; sound was our sleep, and joyous our awakening; for the

"Robin red-breast came in spite of sorrow,
And at my chamber bade good-morrow;
Through the woodbine and the vine,
And the twisted eglantine."

I had then no compositions to write, no algebra to perplex my brains. No—I luxuriantly smelt the sweet violet and modest hawthorn. I listened to the lark soaring beyond the fleecy cloud—watched the sporting of the lambs, and sported with them—and was happy on that day, and thought that every day throughout my whole existence would be the same.

"Happy as a queen," is an expression of high import. It is conceived to express the acme of human bliss, and to contain a truism which admits of no dispute.

It may be so. But I believe that I was much happier than any queen ever was. Queens may have crowns, jewels, and all the paraphernalia of royal state: well, and so had I. I made myself a coronet of rushes, with which I surmounted my head. Pendants for my ears were formed of rich cowslips and daisies. My necklace and bracelets were composed of the deep blue violet, yellow butter-cups, and sprightly hawthorn. But, above all, I made myself a willow whistle! There was a delight which no princess ever felt! And there I used to sit upon a violet-bank, beside a murmuring brook, and looted upon my willow whistle the live-long day. But soon, alas! school-days commenced, and the garden of Eden faded gradually away. I had now many a task to perform; I heard much said about duty; and "knowledge of the world" was always ringing in my ears and teasing me. I now, to my sorrow, begin to find out what it all means—but,

"Where ignorance is bliss,
'Tis folly to be wise."

And should fortune shower upon me abundance of riches and honours, I shall ever look back to that innocently gay dawning of life, when, crowned with my coronet of rushes, I sat upon that sweet-smelling violet bank, looting on my willow whistle the live-long day.

Literary Remains of Henry Neale.—Henry Neale, the son of an engraver in the Strand, was born in the year 1798. He was placed at an academy in Kentish Town, where he neglected his classical studies, but became master of the French, German and Italian languages. He was fond of poetry, and cultivated the belles lettres with great zeal and perseverance. On leaving school, he attached himself to the profession of the law, was admitted to practice, and entered as a solicitor. When only eighteen years old, he published his first work, which consisted of a volume of poems, and of which a second edition, with some additions, was issued in 1820. In 1823 he completed another volume of poems, and these he dedicated to Joanna Baillie. During this period, he laboured in the literary vineyard with considerable success, furnishing frequent contributions to the Monthly Magazine, and other journals. In 1827, he delivered his lectures on English poetry. In the same year, he wrote his Romance of History, and finished it in six months. It passed forthwith to a second edition. He also edited a few numbers of Shakespeare's plays; but, shortly afterward, discontinued them. On the seventh of February, 1828, he was found dead in his chamber, having destroyed himself in a fit of insanity. Since his demise, a duodecimo volume, containing five hundred and fifty pages, has appeared under the name which heads this article. Its contents are the lectures referred to above, some original tales, and poems. Of these the following is a favourable specimen:

SUCH THINGS WERE.

"I cannot but remember such things were,
And were most precious to me."

Such things were! such things were!
False but precious, brief but fair.
The eagle with the bat may wed,
The hare may like the tortoise tread,
The finny tribe may cleave the air,
Ere I forget that such things were.

Can I forget my native glen,
Far from the sordid haunts of men?
The willow tree before the door,
The flower-crown'd porch, the humble floor?
Pomp came not nigh; but peace dwelt there.
Can I forget that such things were?

Can I forget that fair wan face,
Smiling with such a mournful grace?
That hand whose thrilling touch met mine?
Those eyes that did too brightly shine?
And that low grave, so sad and fair—
Can I forget that such things were?

I would not change these tears, these sighs,
For all earth's proudest luxuries;
I would not with my sorrow part
For a more light but colder heart,
Nor barter for pomp's costliest fare,
The memory that such things were.

The Messrs. Harpers have this work in press, and will give it to the public in the course of a few days.

Fourth Avenue.—We perceive that the common council are about to adopt measures preparatory to the opening of the Fourth Avenue. As the plan is one that greatly concerns the interests and character of the whole city, deriving increased importance from some striking peculiarities connected with it, it is humbly conceived that a few remarks, in addition to those heretofore made, will not be deemed unnecessary. Every disinterested person whom we have heard speak on the subject—and many of them are gentlemen of the first respectability for property and standing—has invariably expressed the highest commendation of the project of connecting Broadway with the Fourth Avenue. Any one who will examine the map of the city, and the ground which forms the connecting link in the contemplated improvement, must be forcibly struck with the immensely important consequences which hang upon it. We beg it may not be overlooked—and this is one of those consequences—that the wretched construction of many parts of the city shows the impossibility of ever opening any other uniform channel of communication between the Battery and Haerlem river, that would unite convenience with elegance. Let us for a moment contemplate this grand avenue of not less than eight miles in length, running in almost a straight line, in a very central, and by far the most desirable position, and over much of the best ground on the island, and we would appeal to the good sense and candour of every man in the community to say, if it would not open a door to such a combination of riches, embellishments, and grandeur, as might hereafter challenge a comparison with, even if it did not far surpass, any other in the world. It ought not to be forgotten, that, when this subject is brought up for discussion in the common council, they are about to enter on the task of legislating, not for the present generation merely, not for the accommodation of a few men who may be governed by mercenary motives, and who disregard every public improvement that comes in collision with their private interests, but it is for posterity, for generations to come, for a population which is to cover the island, and which will probably number a million. This is the light in which, in our judgment, the public guardians are called on to view the subject; and a very little reflection, we should suppose, would be sufficient to convince any man that it is the correct one. The character and pride of the city; its future welfare, magnificence, and glory; the reputation of those to whom is intrusted the management of its affairs, and the fame that is inseparable from a policy founded in wisdom and foresight, all unite to enforce the propriety of the course here recommended. This, too, is the "golden moment of opportunity," which, if suffered to pass unheeded, the advantages can never be recovered. The property can now be obtained for comparatively a small sum; whereas, if put off to a future day, and the present disgusting deformity confirmed, the obstacles to be overcome would be so multiplied, and the expense attending their removal so serious in amount, as utterly to forbid all hope of its accomplishment.

We are not unaware that the policy we are defending would beget a conflict between the public good—which, by-the-by, ought always to be a paramount consideration—and the private concerns of individuals. This, however, is a difficulty by no means immovable. If the rights of citizens are infringed by it, the course to be pursued is a very plain one. The ordinary principles of justice require that such citizens should be honestly and fairly reimbursed for any loss or injury they may sustain. When this is done, they have no right to complain; and if they do, their complaints are not entitled to respect or consideration.

Our article shall be closed by respectfully suggesting to the common council, that we think they should not be unmindful of the many glaring and odious defects in the old settled parts of the city, notwithstanding the numerous valuable improvements recently made, and the consequent grievous burdens which have been brought upon the present generation by means of the cupidity, ignorance and folly of those who are no longer remembered. We trust the independence and rectitude which we believe to be prominent features in the character of our present corporation, will be sufficient to check the foul spirit of avarice, should it dare to show itself before them; and that they will not yield their assent to any proposition, however plausible, that does not rest on the solid foundations of public honour and public good.

Rosalie.—Rosalie's letter has been received, and it will give us great pleasure to comply with her request, made in terms so polite and impressive. Independently of the sweet recompense which her imagined smiles of approbation will bestow on us, we shall feel proud to minister to the recollections of the happy past, on which our unknown, but intelligent correspondent, so feelingly and eloquently descants, and to which we all must recur in our better hours, snatched from worldly pursuits and selfish cares. We entirely sympathize with the pure and unsophisticated taste of Rosalie, and delightedly dwell on "those sweet airs, composed in lang syne, previous to the introduction and use of so many crotchets and quavers."

New-York City Dispensary.—Want of room compels us to omit the extracts we had intended to make from the report of this institution. In our next, we shall present them; and, in the mean time, we beg leave to direct, once more, the attention of the humane and benevolent reader to its powerful and long-neglected claims on the public bounty. "He that lendeth to the poor, the Lord shall repay."

Bachelors' Fancy Ball.—The decorations of the ball-room in the city-hotel were, on the present occasion, unsurpassed in elegance and splendour. The arrangements, the ornaments, inscriptions, &c. were designed and executed by the Messrs. Phye, upholsterers in Maiden-lane, with the aid of Mr. Snooks, the carpenter. The ball went off in the most brilliant style, and "the execution done" on the single gentlemen was never before equalled.

My Aunt Margaret's Mirror.—No longer to break upon the interest which this story has excited in the minds of many of our readers, we have concluded to devote an unusual portion of this week's impression to its conclusion. This will, we trust, be a sufficient apology for the absence of the usual variety.

Asara.—Macdonald Clarke has published a poem under this title. The Courier says it is worth reading. It can be had at Carvill's.

KATE KEARNEY.

HUMOROUSLY.

Oh! did you not hear of Kate Kearney? She lives on the banks of Kil-lar-ney: From the glance of her eye, shun danger and fly;

For fa-tal's the glance of Kate Kear-ney. For her eye is so mo-dest-ly beam-ing, You'd ne'er think of mis-chief she's dreaming;

Yet, oh! I can tell how fa-tal's the spell, That lurks in the eye of Kate Kear-ney. SYM.

Oh! should you e'er meet this Kate Kearney,
Who lives on the banks of Killarny;
Beware of her smile, for many a wile

Lies hid in the smile of Kate Kearney.
Though she looks so bewitchingly simple,
Yet there's mischief in every dimple;

And who dares inhale her sigh's spicy gale,
Must die by the breath of Kate Kearney.
Though she looks so bewitchingly simple, &c.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

STANZAS.

The bird that through the summer sky
Now takes his careless flight,
Is like to what my spirit was,
Ere thou hadst met my sight:
With brightness on his glittering wing,
And gladness in his eye,
He fearlessly pursues his way,
And carols through the sky.

But when the fowler's cruel sport
Has marred his pleasant song,
And, wounded sore, upon the earth
His limbs are stretched along,
He then shall look, as now I look,
Upon the distant sky,
And sadly think on moments past,
As I do—with a sigh.

And thine it is that I, bereft
Of all that makes life dear,
Must bear the deeply-rankling shaft,
And shed the secret tear.
Thy words have been a blighting spell,
Thy smile a curse to me;
And welcome now is any fate,
So 'tis not shared with thee. C. A. S.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

ON HEARING A LADY SING.

No more—no more that plaintive strain;
'Twas sung to me in earlier days,
By one who knew nor care nor pain,
Ere sorrow yet had marr'd my lays.
Its tones, like wizard voices, call
A form, a face that long has fled,
And sadly do its accents fall,
As breathings from the buried dead.

But let thy lyre—thy gentle lyre—
Be tuned to themes of joy and glee;
They may awake the wonted fire
That slumbereth deeply now in me:
They may the sad remembrance quell
Of days that were too happy far,
When pleasure deigned awhile to dwell
Where nought but gloom and sadness are.

But no. I pray thee cease thy song;
The notes of mirth, or strains of wo,
I would not, if I might, prolong;
Both—both alike—too painful grow.

For ill befits the anguished heart
The carol warbled blithe and gay;
And sadder notes but cause to start
The tears I would not shed to-day:

ELYSIUM.

BY THE LATE EDWARD C. PINNEY.

She dwelleth in elysium; there,
Like echo, floating in the air;
Feeding on light as feed the flowers,
She fleets away uncounted hours,
Where halcyon peace, among the blest,
Sits brooding o'er her tranquil nest.

She needs no impulse; one she is
Whom thought supplies with ample bliss:
The fancies fashioned in her mind
By heaven, are after its own kind;
Like sky-reflections in a lake,
Whose calm no winds occur to break.

Her memory is purified,
And she seems never to have sighed:
She hath forgot the way to weep,
Her being is a joyous sleep;
The mere imagining of pain
Hath passed, and cannot come again.

Except of pleasure most intense
And constant, she hath lost all sense;
Her life is day without a night,
An endless, innocent delight;
No chance her happiness now mars,
Howe'er fate twine her wreaths of stars.

And palpable and pure the part
Which pleasure playeth with her heart;
For every joy that seeks the maid,
Foregoes its common painful shade;
Like shapes that issue from the grove
Arcadian, dedicate to Jove.

A SERENADE.

BY THE SAME.

Look out upon the stars, my love,
And shame them with thine eyes,
On which, than on the lights above,
There hang more destinies.

Night's beauty is the harmony
Of blending shades and light;
Then, lady, up—look out, and be
A sister to the night!

Sleep not!—thine image wakes for aye,
Within my watching breast:
Sleep not!—from her soft sleep should fly,
Who robs all hearts of rest.

Nay, lady, from thy slumbers break,
And make this darkness gay
With looks, whose brightness well might make
Of darker nights a day.

SONG.

Air—"I've been roaming."

Stately towers! blissful hours
I have passed beneath your shade,
When the flowers, in your bowers,
Bloom'd as though they ne'er could fade.

Mould'ring ruin! time is strewing
Mosses o'er thy gray-bleached head,
While the pattering leaves are scatt'ring
Autumn's trophies o'er the dead.

Falling towers! vanished hours
Left ye old and found me young;
O'er your bowers fate now lowers,
Silence dwells your halls among.

Lofty towers! kingly powers
Met your buttressed walls within;
Through your portals, proudest mortals
Strode to join the battle's din.

Crumbled arches! ruin marches
O'er your pride of carved stone;
Your foundation, desolation
Chooses for her silent throne.

Fallen towers! peaceful hours
Still I spend your courts among;
Rank weed-flowers choke your bowers;
But each fragment has a tongue!

YOUTH.

Oh! youth, thou art a dream of bliss,
Too bright, too pure, to last;
A trance, our gathering years dismiss;
A vision, fading fast!

Yet still to thee will memory cling,
In sad and after years;
A thought of thee will often fling
Its splendour o'er our tears.

Hope, like a seraph clothed in light,
Then revels unconfined;
And glories break upon the sight,
And raptures fill the mind.

And love, the choicest gift we own,
Comes smiling from above:
'Tis given to youthful hearts alone
To feel the force of love.

Then, youth! thou art a dream of bliss,
Too bright, too pure, to last;
A trance, our gathering years dismiss;
A vision, fading fast!

WOMAN AND FAME.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

Thou hast a charmed cup, oh Fame!
A draught that mantles high,
And seems to lift this earthly frame
Above immortality.

Away! to me—a woman—bring
Sweet waters from affection's spring.
Thou hast green laurel leaves that twine
Into so proud a wreath;
For that resplendent gift of thine,
Heroes have smiled in death.

Give me, from some kind hand, a flower.
The record of one happy hour.

Thou hast a voice whose thrilling tone
Can bid each life-pulse beat,
As when a trumpet's note hath blown,
Calling the brave to meet:

But mine, let mine—a woman's breast—
By words of home-born love be blessed.

A hollow sound is in thy song,
A mockery in thine eye,
To the sick heart that doth but long
For aid, for sympathy;
For kindly looks to cheer it on;
For tender accents that are gone.

Fame, Fame! thou canst not be the stay
Unto the drooping reed,
The cool fresh fountain, in the day
Of the soul's feverish need:
Where must the lone one turn or flee?
Not unto thee, oh!—not to thee.

BENNO AND CLOTILDE.

"DEAR mother," said the beautiful Clotilde, "will you give me an hour's leave of absence? I wish to collect, in the neighbouring wood, some wild flowers, which are now in full season."

"With all my heart," replied Lady Bentheim; "but let me entreat you not to wander far, and to return home before the sun sets."

Clotilde promised to do so, put on her straw bonnet, and, with a neat little basket on her arm, she skipped so lightly over the meadow, that her small foot scarcely left an impression any where.

Lady B. stood at the window, and followed Clotilde with her eyes, and continued musing in the same position long after her daughter was out of sight. She was at length aroused from her reverie by the entrance of a servant, who announced the squire.

"This gentleman, although he had not resided long in that neighbourhood, was much attached to this family. Lady B. bade him welcome, and, after he was seated, ordered some fruit and wine for his refreshment. Their conversation almost imperceptibly turned to some of the important events of Lady B.'s life.

"I had passed the three happiest years of my existence," said Lady Bentheim, "by the side of the husband of my choice and of my heart; when, about fifteen years ago, he was torn from me at the call of his country. He fell on the field of battle, far beyond those blue mountains; and with him fell the husband of my only sister, who happened to be on a visit with me at the time the news was brought; and as they both died at the same hour, and on the same field, so both of us were apprised of our loss at the same moment. My sister's health and nerves were not strong enough to bear up against her misfortunes; her health daily declined, and she expired shortly after, broken-hearted. On her death-bed she bequeathed her only son to my care, and I promised her to become to him a second mother. My affection for the boy could not have been stronger had he been my own child, and I often asked myself whether I was more attached to him than to Clotilde, without being able to decide the question. He lived with me until he was eight years of age, and improved visibly, both in body and mind. He repaid my attachment by filial affection; and the greater part of my time was employed in superintending and instructing the two children. The boy's name was Benno. One fine summer's evening I had taken a walk, and finding a cool shady place on the banks of the river, I seated myself, and took up a book to read while the children were playing about. I was, however, suddenly alarmed by the cries of my daughter Clotilde, who came running toward me in great anxiety of mind. When I looked up I noticed a skiff, which, rowed by two men, was crossing the river with great rapidity. A tall athletic person sat in the skiff, holding it steady with his arms. When Clotilde had reached the skiff, a little, she told me, that a well-dressed man had engaged in conversation with her, and proposed to shew him a handsome picture of her mother, which was not easily to be extinguished. On reaching the village, R. had his quarters assigned him with a miller, who appeared in easy circumstances. The house was neatly furnished, and the inhabitants were kind and obliging. Clotilde could not have fallen into better hands. One of the miller's daughters was about her size, and from her a neat change of apparel was obtained. In the meantime, Lieutenant R. wrote a few lines to Lady B. and despatched the letter by one of his men.

Clotilde retired very early to rest, attended by the landlady and her daughter. In the night she became seriously indisposed. This circumstance was communicated to R. who begged leave to enter the room, in order to be at hand, should his assistance be required. Toward morning R. was sitting near the window, half dozing, when he heard Clotilde exclaim, in a feverish delirium, "Benno, dear Benno, shall we never meet again?" These words stung him to the heart; but he instantly left the room, under the impression that Benno was his rival.

When the squire and his party entered the wood, they were met by some young girls from the village, returning homeward. There were ten or twelve, whom Clotilde had singled out, on account of their superior intellect. She had formed a class of them, and instructed them in many sciences which are not commonly taught in country schools. She had also, from time to time, distributed little prizes among them. On hearing that Clotilde was missing, they immediately joined in the search, and, accidentally, followed the course of the brook. They found Clotilde's straw bonnet on the margin of the stream, dripping wet, and consequently concluded that she was drowned. With the bonnet in their hand, they returned to tell their sad story. They were, however, fortunately met by the clergyman of the village, who prevented their making too hasty a disclosure to Lady B. He persuaded the villagers to drag the brook with a net, in hopes of finding the body, while he went to the chateau to prepare Lady B. for the affecting news. He found Lady B. in great agony of mind. Neither the squire nor any of her servants had returned, no one caring to be the bearer of the affecting tidings they had gathered. Scarcely had the clergyman been seated, when the squire entered in great haste with the intelligence that Clotilde was safe. He was followed by a hussar, who, agreeably to orders, delivered into Lady B.'s hands a letter, and before she had time to make any acknowledgment, had returned to his horse and galloped off.

Attracted by the light of the flambeaus, the hussar had rode up to the squire and his party to inquire the road to the chateau Bentheim, and on the way informed them that his officer had saved the life of the young lady. Thus the pleasing news had spread all over the village, even before Lady B. could hear of it. After reading the letter, Lady B. was silent for a few minutes, and then gave vent to her emotions; after which she became apparently quite composed, and gave orders to get her travelling carriage in immediate readiness. The general representation that it rained and stormed remained unheeded; but she was prevailed upon to let the squire accompany her. It was morning when they arrived at the mill. Lady B. found her daughter in a comfortable apartment, which was not easily to be extinguished. On reaching the village, R. had his quarters assigned him with a miller, who appeared in easy circumstances. The general representation that it rained and stormed remained unheeded; but she was prevailed upon to let the squire accompany her.

It was morning when they arrived at the mill. Lady B. found her daughter in a comfortable apartment, and already dressed. Clotilde introduced her mother to her kind hostess and daughter, and to Lieutenant R. who addressed her with those easy yet unassuming manners which are always the marks of a well bred gentleman; then turning to Clotilde, he said,

"In your sleep you unconsciously betrayed your secret. You dreamed of Benno. He is your lover. I will restore him to you."

Clotilde smiled and answered,

"Well, if people will talk in their sleep, they must take the consequences in their waking moments. I did dream of Benno. He is my brother, or rather my cousin; but since my fifth year I have not seen him."

R. left the room precipitately, and shortly afterward returned with Benno, who, instantly recognising the features of his adopted mother, flew into her arms. The eyes of Lady B. were riveted for some minutes on Benno, who was now full grown, rather slender, but elegantly proportioned; and his original features, though enlarged, had not altered materially. His manners were graceful, and the company regarded him with pleasing admiration; but his attention seemed solely to be employed by Clotilde. Although R. endeavoured to suppress all feelings of jealousy, he did not quite succeed. When comparing himself with his friend, he thought him every way his superior, except in the sincerity of his attachment for Clotilde, nor did he believe that her choice could be for a moment doubtful.

Breakfast was announced. Lady B. requested all who were present to be her guests. R. declined the invitation, alleging that his duty called him away; but, when Benno assured the company that duty was not pressing, Clotilde took his arm, and told him she was anxious to learn by what chance Benno and himself had become acquainted. R. conducted the lady to her seat, and took his own.

For the first time in her life, Clotilde experienced much uneasiness; the meeting with her adopted brother, her narrow escape on the preceding day, and her mother's apparent happiness, filled her heart with cheerful gratitude. When, in the warmth of his recollection, Benno seized her hand, a slight blush suffused her cheek, and she scarcely ventured to lift her eyes, lest they should encounter those of R. Benno was in transport, and the most pleasing fancies presented his future path strewn with ever-blooming flowers. Amid the general hilarity which prevailed, R. was gloomy and sad, and no one, except Clotilde, could guess at the cause. The electric spark of love had been kindled at one and the same moment in both their bosoms, and, although not the slightest explanation had taken place, yet, by a kind of sympathy, each seemed to understand what was passing in the other's breast. When breakfast was finished, Benno was requested to relate the events of his life.

"My father," said he, "was a man on whose education neither pains nor expense had been spared. He was graceful and elegant in his person, and possessed all those accomplishments which are the ornaments of life. He entered the army at an early age, and, during a campaign in Italy, became acquainted with a young widow of rank, fortune, and education. His bravery and kindness soon made a deep impression upon her heart, and she loved him with a passion as fervent as it was irresistible; but as he did not share her feelings, her attachment remained for a long time a secret to him. The campaign being ended, the regiment to which my father belonged was ordered home. Antonia—that was the lady's name—knew no bounds to her grief, and my father suddenly became acquainted with her sentiments. Without kindling his love, they inspired him with feelings which evaporated with the illusion that gave them birth; for, after a short separation, he married my mother, in his native country, for whom his impassioned affection only ended with his life. Antonia, who was rich and handsome, had many suitable offers of marriage; but she declined them all. She was informed by her agents of my father's union, which excited her jealousy and revenge; and at his death she determined to possess herself of his only son. My mother died shortly after my father. Under an assumed name, Antonia resided for months within the neighbourhood of my adopted mother's dwelling, which she beset with spies for the purpose of carrying me off, should an opportunity offer.

"When I was captured, I was taken to Antonia's carriage, which was waiting in the woods. Antonia received me with transport, and we drove off with speed. For several days and nights we continued our route without stopping longer than was necessary to change the horses and procure refreshment. I became sick and fatigued; but Antonia did everything in her power to assist me. 'Since your father and mother are dead,' said she, 'I have the nearest claim upon you. I will hereafter be your parent, and, at my death, I will bequeath you an independent fortune.' We arrived at last among the fragrant fields of Italy. All my wants and wishes were readily gratified; and, as the impressions of childhood are not very lasting, I soon became reconciled to my fate; although, when I heard my native language, it recalled to my imagination the scenes of my infancy, my adopted mother, and Clotilde, and painted them all in such pleasing colours, that I became at times quite melancholy. On those occasions, Antonia allowed me to write, and promised to forward my letters, which, however, she did not do. For a long period she amused me with verbal accounts; and at last insisted that my relatives had banished me entirely from their memory. As they did not answer my letters, I dropped the useless correspondence. I had masters in every useful science. One day Antonia came to me in my private room, apparently much afflicted. She held a letter in her hand, which she told me she had that moment received from Germany. It contained the sad tidings that Clotilde and Lady Bentheim were no more. This was a sad blow to all my fond visions of future happiness, for I had never abandoned the hope of once more seeing you all again. The snow-covered hills of my own country appeared to my imagination far more interesting than the perpetual verdure of Italy, and, dreaming or waking, I was continually arranging plans to effect my return.

"Some years had now elapsed, and I arrived at the age of manhood. Fired with young ambition, I chose a military life. A German regiment was quartered in the neighbourhood, and, having become master of their language, I offered my services to the commandant, who procured me a commission. I entered the service, and was shortly afterward marched off with the corps. Antonia was deeply afflicted. Her health had been on the decline for several years; she was possessed with the thought that we should never meet again, and consequently, with tears in her eyes, bid me farewell for ever. I departed with a heavy heart; but the hope of again beholding my native land gradually wore away my grief, and the bustle and activity of my life gave me little time for reflection.

"I wrote frequently to Antonia, who regularly replied to my letters, until her declining health precluded the possibility of her doing so. About a year after our separation, I received a packet from her executors, informing me that Antonia was in her grave. All her landed estates she had bequeathed to her own relatives, and to me all her moveable property. The campaign was ended, and our regiment returned home. Lieutenant R. was one of my fellow-officers; a similarity of sentiment soon attached us to each other. The many vicissitudes of my life, and the death of Antonia, left a vacancy in my heart, which I thought could never again be filled, and I gradually fell into a state of mind bordering on despair; if I have recovered from it, I owe it to the philosophic reasoning, and to the cheerful equanimity of my friend, to whom I am still further indebted for the discovery of my lost mother and Clotilde."

Benno had scarcely concluded his narrative, when Lady B.'s carriage drove up to the door. R. was thoughtful and sad, for the moment of separation had arrived. He took the hand of Clotilde, and, while leading her to the carriage, said,

"We part then, lady, and perhaps for ever."

"I trust not," replied Clotilde with a winning glance of the eye, which spoke volumes to the heart of her admirer. R. once more seized her hand, and, passionately kissing it, drew a ring from her finger. The company being seated, the carriage drove off.

On their arrival home, Clotilde was immediately surrounded by the happy villagers, who pressed forward to express their respect and attachment.

After dinner, a walk was proposed, and Clotilde accepted the arm of Benno with evident embarrassment. Every step they took recalled to his memory the most pleasing recollections of former times. He now stood upon the very spot where, in early youth, he had been seized by the hirelings of Antonia.

"I remember," said Benno, "the agony which you expressed at our separation. Does the same kind interest in my happiness still warm your bosom, dear Clotilde?"

"It does."

"And may I indulge the delicious thoughts that you will return the affection which has been buried in this bosom for years?"

"Benno, I owe you a frank explanation. Since yesterday, I could not give you an undivided heart. Accustomed from my infancy to regard you as a brother, I can feel no other sentiment for you now."

"And is it so! My friend then has supplanted me?"

"He does not know my feelings. Will Benno abuse my confidence?"

"Never; though my fondest hopes are destroyed, I will oppose no obstacle to your felicity; but we must separate this day, and for ever!"

When Lady B. and her daughter had departed from the mill, R. ordered his horse to be brought, and, without any attendance, he rode to the spot where he had first beheld the object of all his thoughts. He fastened the noble animal to a tree, and then threw himself upon the grass. Here he remained for some hours in deep and unquiet meditation. Clotilde's ring, attached to a silk ribbon, hung from his neck, and every now and then he would gaze upon it, and repeat the name of its lovely owner. The sun was setting. A noise was heard among the shrubbery. Benno stood before him. His appearance at that moment caused R. unusual emotion, which, however, subsided the instant his friend informed him that he came to accompany him to his quarters.

The two young soldiers are mounted, and prancing gayly on the road together. Benno observes the ring in the possession of R. On a sudden he becomes reserved and thoughtful. They arrive at a hotel, and supper is prepared. Neither feel inclined to taste it. Benno first breaks the silence.

"My friend—for such I must still believe you—I have something on my mind, which gives me much uneasiness. I have noticed a ring suspended from your neck, which, if I mistake not, was once the property of my foster-sister. How came it in your possession?"

"I drew it unintentionally from the fair hand of her whose life I saved. I mean to restore it to her, and then bid her and hope an eternal adieu."

Benno's features brightened at this unexpected disclosure. He arose, and seized the hand of R. with fervour.

"I thank you, my friend, for your frankness. You have restored my sinking faith in the existence of truth and sincerity. No longer look upon me as a rival, but as the brother of Clotilde, and one who holds no other share in her affections. She will repay the debt of gratitude she owes you with her heart and hand."

R. was in a transport of delight ; for Benno told him all. The night stole away amidst cheerful congratulations and brilliant anticipations of the future.

The next-morning the two friends departed for the chateau. They reached it, unobserved. Benno, who knew the interior construction of the building, proceeded directly to the private apartment of Lady B. He opened his business, and pleaded the cause of R. with all the eloquence of friendship. He was successful.

R. took another direction. He followed the harmonious sounds of a guitar, and the silver tones of the most entrancing voice he had ever heard. He traversed a suite of rooms, and passed rapidly to the saloon; on entering which he found Clotilde alone. He advanced slowly toward her, and by way of explaining the object of his visit, he held up the ring. As Clotilde arose to meet him, a deep blush covered her beautiful face. R. had now an opportunity of declaring his sentiments, and he did not let it pass unimproved. Her consent was gained, and the wedding day appointed.

His happiness was here interrupted by the information that Benno had gone from the chateau. He left the home of his mistress in great distress of mind. It was his duty to think of her no more with the feelings he was wont to indulge. She was lost to him for ever.

Clotilde had been married several years, when one day she was agreeably surprised by the unexpected arrival of Benno, who introduced, as his wife, a woman of surpassing loveliness in mind and person. It need scarcely be added, that the purest friendship and harmony existed ever afterward between the two families.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

COURTSHIP OF A LITERARY LADY.

It was in the year 1808 that the celebrated Madame de Stael saw, for the first time, M. Rocca, to whom she was subsequently married. M. Hottinger, a rich banker at Geneva, gave a splendid ball, to celebrate the marriage of a friend. M. Rocca, who had gone to Geneva—his native place—to see his family, went to the ball in a hussar's uniform. "I was dancing with him," says the authoress of the Memoirs of Josephine, "when Madame de Stael entered, followed, as usual, by a numerous train. She was richly, but not advantageously dressed.

"Is that the woman so much talked of?" said M. Rocca to me; "she is very ugly, and I detest her anxiety for effect."

"She is so accustomed to homage," said I, "that it does not prevent her from remaining kind and condescending."

"Oh! all that you can tell me," said he, "about her good qualities will not persuade me that she is fit in suffering herself to be attended by a whole household. Certainly I will never figure in the troop of her."

Madame was struck with M. Hocquart, which was rather improved than disapproved. He was very young, and already decorated with the legion of honour. The young man's courage naturally attracted the attention of Madame, who passionately loved him. A few days later, however, finding that he was not as devoted as he pretended, she rejected him. He then became a person of no consequence.

precisely the reason why she afterwards took so much trouble about a man who became dear enough to her to induce her to change a name which she had rendered so illustrious. At length he returned to Geneva, covered with wounds. His sufferings added to the interest which he excited; and he was happy enough to induce this extraordinary woman to accept the proofs which he gave of the passion he had conceived for her, and finally to marry him. He could not patiently survive the loss of her, but died a few months afterwards. His father was far from possessing similar sensibility. Having lost his wife, he, according to the custom at Geneva, attended the funeral to the cemetery, which is out of the town. Somebody meeting him on his return from this painful ceremony, assumed a sorrowful countenance, and, in the tenderest manner possible, asked him how he did.

"Oh!" answered the unfeeling man, "I am very well at present; this little walk has set me up; there is nothing like country air."

FROM THE TRIALS OF LIFE, BY THE AUTHOR OF DE-LISLE.

A WIFE IN DANGER.

A husband, finding that his wife received splendid presents from an admirer, thought it would be unwise not to show her what dangerous ground she stood upon. She had been driving out one morning with a lady, and went to the dining-room immediately on her return home, intending to show her purchases to her husband. No husband, however, did she find—but what, for the moment, delighted her more—the table covered with jewels! The transported Alicia eagerly advanced.

"How beautiful!" she exclaimed aloud, as she tried the brilliants upon her arm and fingers, and alternately put down one ornament to admire another. "I did not see, even at court, such a diamond necklace as this!" she continued. "I wonder where they came from."

Suddenly she spied a beautiful box to hold bonbons, set in diamonds, and of a particularly beautiful shape. These bonbonnières were much the fashion at that time, and the duchess of D. had displayed one at the opera-house, which had been the envy and admiration of all present. To have a more elegant and precious box than her grace of D.; to set the fashion of that shape; to show her fair taper fingers to advantage, as she presented it to her neighbours—how many sources of delight to a fashionable belle! Instantly the ornaments were replaced and forgotten: nothing but this delightful box deserved a thought. She was so much engrossed by her admiration, that she saw not her husband until he stood before her.

"Oh, Mr. Clairville," she cried, with childish joy, "see how magnificent, how lovely, all these things are! Do but look at this bijou of a box! Oh! I would not part with it for worlds! And this, too, is the opera night, and I shall show it there! Is it not charming?"

"Which, my love?" replied Mr. Clairville, with a smile; "the diamonds or the opera?"

"Oh, both, to be sure!" hastily answered his wife. "But you do not seem to admire them."

"Indeed I do; but you know I think nothing charming but you."

"And was it to make me more so," said Alicia, laughing, "that you sent for all these gay things?"

"I am not rich enough to display the contents of all the jewellers' shops to you, and bid them court your acceptance," said Mr. Clairville. "These came from one who has more of the power, though not more of the will, to please. The P—— sent them to you, and I spread them on the table to enjoy your first surprise."

"How very good! how very magnificent!" replied the simple Alicia. "And may I choose what I like?"

"Without doubt," said her husband. "They are all yours, if you like. But you forget the price."

"You do not pay for a gift," said Alicia, the calmness of her mother's manner subduing her satisfaction.

"How pale you are, my beloved! how you tremble!" said her husband, tenderly supporting her. "You cannot fear an evil you need not bring upon yourself—an evil which, I know, you will not bring upon yourself or me. I did not shock you in this sudden way because I doubted you, but because I thought it the simplest way of disclosing to you the P——'s views. Now, will you return the diamonds?"

"Oh, no!" exclaimed Alicia; "do you return them. It would make me ill to look at them again."

"You would regret parting with them?" he asked her with an indulgent smile.

"Do you think so meanly of me?" said his wife, some of those half-smothered feelings nature had given her flashing from her dark bright eyes. "I would not touch again those baneful gifts, for the wealth of fairy tales."

"Indignation is a new improvement to beauty," said Mr. Clairville; "but my Alicia is becoming under every emotion;"

FAMILY GOVERNMENT.

In spite of modern whims of equality, the government of a family must be absolute; mild, not tyrannical. The laws of nature and the voice of reason have declared the dependence of the child on the parent. The weakness of youth must be repressed by the hand of experience. Parents' tenderness is too apt to degenerate into parental weakness. "If you please, child," and "Will you, dear?" are soon answered with "No; I won't." The reins of the government should be always gently drawn; not twitched, like a curb bridle, at one time, and dangled loose at another. Uniformity in parents produces uniformity in children. To whip one minute, and to caress, or let the culprit go unpunished, for the same crime, at another, cannot fail to injure the force of parental authority. Consider before you threaten; and then be as good as your word. "I will whip you, if you don't mind me," says the parent in a passion. "I am not afraid of it," says the child. The parent flies towards it in a paroxysm of rage; the child prefers flight to broken bones. "You may go now, but you shall have your punishment with interest the next time you do so." "I don't believe that," thinks the child. It is experience that gives the parent the lie. "But," say you, "whips and rods were the scourges of the dark ages; the present age is more enlightened: in it law is reason, and authority is mildness." Beware of that reason which makes your child dogmatical, and that mildness which makes him obstinate.

There is such a thing as the rod of reproof; and it is certain that, in numberless cases, arguments produce a better effect than corporeal punishment. Let children be properly admonished, in case of disobedience: if ineffectual, try the harsher method. Never begin to correct till your anger has subsided; if you do, your authority over the offender is at an end. Let your commands be reasonable. Never deliver them in a passion, as though they were already disobeyed; nor with a timid, distrustful tone, as if you suspected your own authority. Remember that scolding is directly the reverse of weighty reasoning. It is the dying groans of good government. Never let it be heard under your roof, unless you intend your house should be a nursery of faction, which may, at some future time, rear its hydra head, not only against you, but in opposition to the parents and guardians of our country. Patriotism, as well as charity, begins at home. Let the voice of concord be heard in your family; it will charm your domestics to a love of order.

A CONCLUSIVE ARGUMENT.

A member of a mechanics' institution, in the town of Stirling, being a staunch believer in the orthodox doctrine of Pope Urban VIII. "that the earth is at rest," proved the doctrine to be true in the following manner: "If the earth were whirling in the air, as you affirm, what with the high mountains—what with the low vallies—what with the tall trees—what with the lofty steeples, there would be such a whirling noise as to render our ears totally useless. Now, we know that no such noise exists; therefore the earth is not in motion. This idea," said our philosopher triumphantly, "was first suggested to me by the humming of my grandmother's spinning-wheel."

The city inspector reports the death of ninety persons during the week ending on Saturday last.

SKETCH OF CHARACTER.

FROM BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

THE AUTHOR.

IN TWO PARTS.—PART THE SECOND.

"WELL, Frank, since thou wilt have my story, make thy handkerchief thy nightcap, fold thine arms, and give thyself up to Morpheus and me. Thou knowest, then, mine old friend and schoolfellow, that I left — school on a truant expedition: I was fevered with the thirst for fame and fiddiestick; and having escaped from brow-beating and back-beating ushers, and birches hanging, like the sword of Damocles, by a single hair, over my fated head and its antipodes; in the very corduroy trowsers of my boyhood, 'striped like a zebra, spotted like a pard,' with pen-wipings and pen-splashes, I travelled to town, and commenced man of letters. Thou knowest, Frank, that I was profound in the Golden Primer, and deep in Dilworth; and with all these attainments at my fingers' ends, I offered myself to the first booksellers off the stones, at Mile-end, that I came to. I thought, in my simplicity, that every man who sold books, of course had also his establishment of authors. I know not for which employment in literature I was then most fitted, but I should now think the dusty, for I could have dusted many a book which I could not then have read. I had run the gauntlet of every bookshop, when at last I arrived, with due steps, at that mart of wit and words, Paternoster-row, where I continued my un-literary applications for literary employment, looking at every door, to be employed either on epic or epigram—but with the old success. One eyed my jerkin, not quite so long as a man's, and not short enough for a boy's, and, I believe, took me for a genteel valet in search of business for his master; another recommended me to collate the various editions of Cock Robin; one looked on me as an idiot-boy; another told me to go to school again, like a good boy, and he would write to my master to forgive my truancy. You will easily conceive that this 'damped my intended wing:' at length, however, having inquired in due succession at every house down the Row, I came to the first chapter in my history, the Chapter coffee-house; where, being pretty well wearied with a twenty-mile run-away from the country, and a long suburban and town perambulation, I stepped in, and, after looking about me at the gentlemen in black, and thinking every one of them looked like an usher, and trembling accordingly, I sat down in the waiter's box, among the clean knives and dirty dusters, finding it to be the only place unoccupied; from which sanctuary I was soon routed with all possible disrespect, and my business inquired. Presuming, however, on the plenitude of my purse, which yet contained some five or six shillings, with an assumed boldness very unusual to me, I ordered something substantial for supper, and a warm bed, as I was hungry and weary—both of which I had in due order; and in the morning, having slept a good sleep, and making a hearty breakfast of chocolate and five muffins, I learned, to my astonishment, that I had risen from my bed half-a-crown in debt, over and above the crown in my purse.

"You may conceive that this shook my confidence in its very shoes! you might have cooled an oven with me; I was all over in a cold sweat of terror at this unfortunate second error of a long series of after-errors. The waiter bullied, and then whispered the bar, which I thought was, of course, to fetch a constable. I saw the Dogberry or debt-offenders, and felt, even then, the iron hand of the law laying hold of me; but in the midst of my perturbations, a lucky thought suggested itself: I had a small gold watch in my pocket. Thou rememberest it, Frank, or shouldst remember it, for often did it save thy back from rod and rule, when thou wert too much taken with the antic sport to hear the whispering monitor, time, and the hour for returning to school; and it saved my body, at this juncture, from the iron house and hand of confinement. I drew it forth; it was a family one—the gift of my old maiden cousin, Dinah Single, spinster, and so forth. I looked at it with a blush for the family honours, when I remembered that I was going to pawn it for a beggarly account of chocolate and muffins; but regret was in vain: so, with one sigh for my family honours, and another for myself, I gave it over in trust to the waiter, whose eyes glistened when he saw the impounded prize. He begged, in a whisper, that I would make no apology for the trifle I owed him—I could call any time—and if I did not, so much the better, I dare say, thought he. Civility, thought I, as I prepared to depart, is the characteristic of honest Thomas, the waiter, whose hand, in the excess of my gratitude at having escaped the horrors of a jail, I had grasped with a boy's warmth, and shook very sincerely. He bullied, to be sure, at first, thought I, but that was because he took me for some juvenile Jonathan Wild, or precocious Count Fathom; but what else but civility in excess could induce a gentleman in a black coat, white waistcoat, nankeen small clothes, and blue silk stockings, to undertake the care of my family honour and watch, valued at twenty guineas, for a beggarly arrears of some two shillings and sixpence? Oh happy puppyage! suspectless simplicity! wise ignorance! would I not give my family honour and another gold watch to be again as worldly-ignorant! So, brushing down my jerkin as I went out, and opening the door before me, honest Thomas bowed me very politely out; and out I went, with Horace in one pocket, and nothing in the other—with many hopes in my head, but fears in my heart; and began de novo at the bookseller's, next door, continuing my inquiries to the end, changing sides, and in and out, and up again, a sort of literary dance—but with the same result as the day before.

"It grew near the dining-hour of noon with undepraved appetites: the cry of nature seemed more and more audible—I heard her voice rumbling awfully—where was I to dine! Oh, at the Chapter: he could not refuse; the watch was worth ten guineas to a Jew—I could not calculate how much it was worth to a Christian; so, to resolve my doubts, I boldly stepped into the Chapter, ordered a steak, and looked for that politest and most friendly of men, honest Thomas. The steak was brought, and between the hungry mouthfuls I looked for my considerate friend; but another waiter waited on me now—and now another, and another still succeeded. I was half inclined to cry, with Macbeth, I would 'see no more,' till I had seen the one I wanted to see; but I looked for him in vain. I felt sure of knowing him by the roguish, good-humoured twinkle of his eyes, and the limp of his left leg. I looked at all the legs in the room; but the legs I sought had walked away, or else one leg had been miraculously cured of limping since I had been there in the morning. I grew more and more uneasy; and every mouthful seemed as it would choke me. At last, to ease my doubts, I inquired where Thomas the waiter was? 'Oh! Thomas did you inquire for, sir? He has been discharged for disrespect to the bar.' My heart jumped to my mouth, and the unedited mouthful I had transpierced with my fork, fell, meat and fork, into my plate. You might have bound me hand and foot with thread of gossamer: the truth struck me at once, that honest Thomas, and his roguish, twinkling eyes, had danced off to the tune of 'my gold watch.' What was I to do? Tears of terror, shame, and anger, rolled down my seventeen years' green cheeks. To be brief, as I had dined with trust, it was plain enough that I should sup with sorrow. My young fears and feelings so overpowered me at this dilemma, that I blubbered outright; and in a moment the bar-maid, waiters, and the whole company present, which consisted mostly of gentlemen of the clerical cloth, were gathered round me. I sang my story with a pretty running accompaniment of sobs, sighs, and tears, that would have made a pleasant parody on Steibelt's Storm; and it was immediately seen, that the motive for Thomas's sauciness was, that he might be discharged with some colour for carrying off my watch. However, the company sympathized so far in my distress that they collected as much silver as might be translated into a guinea: and my family honour, with many awkward attempts at resisting so much kindness, pocketed the shillings of the kind creatures: my dinner, too, was forgiven me by the benevolence of the bar; and thus, what with the goodness of the pulpit and the bar, I was rich in pocket, though reduced in fob.

"This incident, perhaps, did me more good than harm; for it drew the attention of several of the company to what could be my business in town: they suspected me to be a truant, and tried to extract the secret; but I was true to myself. I confessed that, young as I was, I had come to town on literary enterprise. They smiled at me, but did not dissuade me from my madness: would that they had! it would have cured me, and sent me back to school again. A timely laugh from men who had so lately shown such kindness for me, could not have been mistaken by me; it could only have meant that discouraging censure which would have cured a rash enthusiastic boy of his rage for adventure—and I might have been saved. But they only smiled; and my resolution was not to be shaken by a smile. My story got wind; and as my Horace lay on the table before me, one of the company took it up, and finding that I had some education, he offered to introduce me to a bookseller, who was about to publish a new translation of Horace, in which I might assist, as it was to be 'done into English by several hands.' I jumped at the proposal, and having thanked my new friend, grew impatient to leave him, that I might have the opportunity of commencing before morning. I took a turn round St. Paul's, and at the same time turned the first ode in my head. It was 'done into English;' and on the following morning, I was introduced to Mr. Vamp, the bookseller, who consulted my friend, his literary clerk, on my maiden manuscript, and I was retained to turn Horace at five guineas a sheet. I could have hugged my new friend with joy; but I proposed supper that night, at the Chapter, as probably much more to his liking. He consented; and I took my departure, full of a thousand hopes, to the corner box on the right in the Row, and there translated and bit my nails, and bit my nails and translated, till eight. At nine we supped; at ten I was a good fellow; at eleven I was rather worse—from wine, which was a new thing to my head, and began to turn any thing but Horace's odes; or if it had a lyrical turn, it was more Anacreontic than Horatian. But the bar took compassion on my youth, conceiving that I was too tender to be a hardened offender; and I was taken away to bed in the custody of a rushlight, and slept myself sober for the first time in my life.

"In the morning I found I had to turn Horace all day, to pay the expenses of the night before, or else Horace must turn out of the Chapter. To be brief, this Horatian mode of life lasted two months, during which I netted thirty pounds literary profits, and was growing happy, proud, and forgetful of the future; but it came at last, and stood present, and I was as poor as ever. 'My name,' thought I, 'is up for poetry; I have done Horace Flaccus to the satisfaction of the town—I will now try to do Horace Versatile as much justice.' In a month I had a volume of sonnet, song, ode, elegy, and fragment, ready for the press; and Mr. Vamp undertook to publish it. I had a hundred subscribers at half-a-guinea each; I spent them all in two months, and inquired after the profits of my book, which had been praised by the reviews, and 'walked the town awhile,' as Milton says of his Tetrachordon, 'numbering good intellects;' it did not sell—though it was hinted to me that he had a second edition, printed privately, which had sold almost as well as the first. But you know, Frank, I was never suspicious—conceiving that a dishonest man is his own jailer. I gave up the profits, and turned my attention to the tragic muse; in two months I had written a tragedy, in another it was received, in another brought out, and in one night hissed from the stage. Lord Fillagree had had his comedy hissed the week before by the democracy; his aristocratic blood was fired, and he procured two hundred braves to hiss my plebeian piece, which they did most satisfactorily for his lordship; and I slunk to my attic with half-a-crown in that pocket which had been all day gaping for a hundred pounds. To disguise his cruelty, he sent me a letter of condolence, and ten pounds, which I returned by the hands of my laundress, with a strict injunction, that she should deliver it into his lordship's hands, that he might behold how a poor plebeian despised patrician pride and meanness.

"But young and ardent natures are not to be thus damped. I determined again to write, and present it to the other house; but fearing to venture on tragedy, 'seeing what I had seen,' I made my bow to smiling comedy, wooed her like a lover, and won her presence. Where I dined I do not now recollect; but I supped, generally, at home, lest too much of my time should be taken from my comic loves. Ah! who but unfortunate authors can tell the miseries which unfortunate authors endure! The pinchings of the inward man from hunger; the nippings of the outward man from cold and scanty covering! Yes, my friend, I wrote comedy in a back garret in St. Clement's, warming my winter-frozen fingers in hot water, with which I was occasionally supplied, through the humane attentions of a lady who took in washing in the front attic—'merely,' as she said, 'as an amateur in laundry, and to keep her hands in' hot water, I suppose, like myself. Her pride kept her chim above water—till at last she upset her tub, and set up her carriage; for she became wife to the lord knows who, for I forget his lordship's name, while mine was pillowed on the tenth wave of adversity, only to be soused over head and ears in it in a short time.

"I finished my comedy amidst the groans of my own heart, for poverty flew sharp-toothed upon me, and bit me to the bone. It was accepted, and read in the green-room; the manager, who wrote himself, suggesting many alterations, with which I was forced to comply, or else cut down my comedy to the every half-hour performances of a Bartholomew-fair puppetshow: for Mr. Manager modestly detested any thing that was not better than himself; and when it was only equal, he cut it down far below him. I altered it agreeably to his suggestions, and took out the comic from my comedy, leaving only enough of the original safely to secure the original title, 'Debts and Duns,' both of which I saw would follow its first night.

"The fatal day arrived; but there was nothing extraordinary observed in the heavens; the sun got up, as usual, in November, about twelve, and I, about the same time, shot through the stage-door, 'swift as the sparkle of a glancing star.' My comedy was put off on account of the serious indisposition of a gentleman of the company, who had to deliver the prologue—no one but himself could, it seems, recite a petitionary prologue, and he could do nothing else. I was vexed, but could not bounce; I was too humbled by hunger, which is a great corrector and queller of the evil man. I uneasily affected an easy indifference, and walking my melancholy person out of the green-room, exclaiming as I went out, fuming like a catholic censor, 'Debts and Duns!' A walk through the park, however, cooled me so effectually that my teeth chattered, though they said nothing. Here I picked my teeth for a luncheon; but in the midst of my dinnerless distress, who should come up but Lord Fillagree's French valet, with a command from his lordship to read my comedy, next morning at breakfast, to his lordship. Necessity and time had smoothed down the austerity with which I had resented his lordship's former conduct, and I waited on him as I was commanded. We breakfasted together quite en famille; and with the last cup I commenced my reading, giving it as much dramatic humour as the sensitive state of my nerves would allow. I was, however, not a little astonished to observe, that where the comic situations were, as I thought, irresistible, his lordship maintained the most impossible gravity; and indeed he never once laughed or smiled through the entire comedy, though its humour was, with all Mr. Manager's alterations, still irresistible, to my thinking, and its wit as brilliant as the diamond on his finger. His valet, however, laughed prodigiously, but still politely, and as it were, 'with a difference;' sometimes, indeed, he laughed where the business was serious—at others, where the humour was apparent, he preserved his lordship's gravity. When I had concluded, his lordship stretched himself, and asked his valet how long I had been reading. He replied with a shrug, 'Three hour, my lor!' 'Three hours!' exclaimed his lordship, no doubt surprised at the power of wit, which could make time run away so inaudibly, thought I, hugging myself on my success; but I too soon discovered, when his lordship began to yawn, and not to praise, that his surprise was at the length of his patience. He was leaving the room, when I respectfully requested his lordship's opinion. 'Oh; my opinion,' said he, endeavouring to recollect himself—'Oh! it is a very pretty sermon!' mistaking me for Dr. Orthodox, whom he had lately appointed his third chaplain; and left the room. I ventured to hint to his valet, with the utmost deference, that his lordship was not clear in his opinion. 'Oh! pardon me, sare,' interrupted his valet indignantly—'my lor' is never wrong.' 'But it was a comedy, not a sermon,' I still suggested. 'De difference is not much; but if it had been a comedy, you would have heard his lordship's laugh, which is de politest in Europe out of France: I perfect him in it after his travel, and monsieur my lor' is not de dullest pupil. It is vera true, sare, you did not hear my lor' laugh, because I always laugh for my lor' in the morning, when mademoiselle, my sister, who favour his lordship, will quarrel with him last night; or when he has play, and lose with monsieur de count, my cousin; but I believe, sare, I did you de honneur to laugh away in de right place? If not, it was for I cannot understand your comedie Anglaise, which is, Monsieur—I forget your name—not Moliere and the comedie Francaise, and never will. And now, sare, I have de honneur to wish you de beautiful morning.' And saying this, he bowed me, with many genuflections, to the door; and I expected to hear the rascal bawl out that Mr. Horace Versatile's walking-stick stopped the way.

"This was encouragement, you will say; but I was not surprised, for I ought to have known Lord Fillagree's frivolous character better. The mystery was soon cleared up; for I learned, the next day, that his lordship was himself writing a second comedy; and there is nothing at which a man is so grave, except at his own funeral, as at the reading of a rival's production.

"The night at last arrived, full with my fate. The green baize drew up for the cocked-batted prologue, with his slouching, shuffling gait, and waiter's legs: one gentleman in the boxes clapped the first thought, which was not mine, but Ben Jonson's; and five or six hard-handed fellows, honest creditors of mine, who hoped that its success would be their success, led the applause. The prologue went off, as it came on, most lamely; the curtain drew up, and the comedy commenced, if comedy it might be called, in which what was comic had been lowered into seriousness, and what was serious had been heightened into something not quite comic, and yet not serious. Need I say, the audience yawned through it like an Amsterdam audience at an Italian opera? however, it did not entirely fail, for the partial hissing ceased when the snoring became general. It was enacted the next night to a full orchestra, and an empty pit and boxes, and then quietly dropped into the tomb of all the Capulets. I was crushed by this failure, and swore I would print it as it was originally written; but how? Mr. Vamp refused it, the Row rejected it, and so I threw it behind the fire, as a burnt-offering to disappointment.

"To be brief, I gave up the stage as it was then conducted, as a vehicle in which a high-mettled racer for fame would not consent to run, and a moderate mettled one must be cut and slashed to death. I turned my frowning face, therefore, from the comic to the epic muse. 'Lord Love-praise,' recollected I, 'has patronised eight bad epics; I will seek his patronage, and be the ninth dull muse he has been Mæcenas to.' You see, Frank, that my spirit of independence was already bent, if not broken: it was apparent to myself then, and it must be so to you now, that I cared not for his patronage, though I asked it, and that I should never have been grateful for it if I had won it; so soon does disappointment, falling on an ardent mind, cover, if not crush, all those finer feelings of our nature, honest pride and sudden-sensed shame. I was willing to wear the badge of patronage, though I knew it to be dishonourable. Yes, I stooped my spirit, and was patronised. Patronage was stamped on my brow like the brand-mark on the forehead of a slave; for patronage is not patronage now—it is corruption or nothing! His lordship lent me the light of his countenance to my projected task, in such a manner that I saw it was not for the glory of literature that he gave it, but to add a feather to his own plume of pride, and he talked of as the patron of learning and letters. His way of rivetting the chain was hard, gross, public, and ostentatious; and if ever I blushed in my life, it was at that moment when some men would have thought themselves honoured. But I went to my task with a better hope to encourage me—that of immortality. I proceeded slowly, but, as I thought, successfully, in my 'great emprise,' suffering, however, want and misery by the way, which none would credit but those who have been equally devoted, and equally unsuccessful. His lordship's patronage was but a name; it flattered me with hopes which became, in the end, despair. I explained my poverty to his ear, and he listened to the broken balderdash of his French valet. I laid it before his eyes, and he sent me his new mistress's ill-spelt love-letters to him, and his well-spelt nonsense to her, to turn into verse; then my pride started in disgust and honest anger on its feet, threw off the trammels of his patronage, and I stood again upright—a miserable man, but free.

"Think not, however, that I endured these 'stings and arrows' without being hurt in mind, body, and spirit. I found myself, at the end of my sixth year of battling against misfortune, a crippled and a changed man. My temper, which was mild and passionless, had taken an imperceptible turn; I was now gloomy, silent, and somewhat morose, with only occasional gleams of that smiling goodnature which made my boyhood pleasant to myself and others: my melancholy took me from the busy world too often; 'the fields were now my study, and nature' my sole companion. It is not good, however, for man to be alone; he should have even a partner in his sorrows. This thought gnawed into my heart like a subtle worm. The melancholy which drove me from society, now turned round and hurried me back into it; but I was unfit for its intercourse, for I had grown too sensitive to be happy with most things. Unfortunate men have either no feelings, or the most acute and tender—a word, or a look, which I did not understand, silenced my forced wit, and racked me with miseries. My heart became a prey to the cankering tooth of chagrin, and the sateless worm of melancholy gnawed into its very core.

"I flew again, like a free bird, or rather like 'the stricken deer,' to my old green world, the fields, where I wooed the muse, and sometimes won her. But still I was unhappy, unfortunate, and alone, 'The birds sing,' said I, 'but they have their merry companions, and each one of them one, above them all, whom nature teaches them to think dearer than the rest. But have I? The answer struck upon my heart as his own voice must have sounded to the lone dweller of Fernandez' isle. I felt that some other voice than mine should then have spoken, but have answered 'yes,' instead of 'no.'

"I then discovered, but too late, perhaps, that my errors were the weeds of a wild imagination. I rushed, therefore, from the idle bower of the muse, and came at last on the busy quay of commerce. I had lost the strength, the breath, and the heart of my youth, in chasing a bubble; it broke, and I was disappointed. To be brief, I procured a minor situation in a merchant's service, where, though I have nothing to hope for, and nothing to be satisfied with, I am once more in the world, though not with a young or a whole heart for it. No—I will no more trust myself on the Goodwin-sands of chance, where a vessel of my freightage is more likely to sink than sail. I have put my pen in a proper inkstand; have left my epic in its cradle, to be dandled when its father's arms are stronger to nurse it; have thrown off the crown of patronage as a golden thrall that bowed down my head to the dust; and though the wounds I have suffered are so far healed that only the scars remain, yet I feel like a mariner who has saved himself, but lost all he had adventured, from a shipwrecking sea, though I now lie harboured in a stormless haven. I shall never get the din of its waves, or the terror of the tempest from my memory, though I have learned to look with dull-eyed patience at the past and present, and, if I may, to hope in the future to refine the happiness which I have lost, and one which I shall lose only with life itself."

Here his familiar history ended; but I must finish it for the satisfaction of my readers. These sober resolutions of my unfortunate friend did not last; the muse is like a mistress whom we have dearly loved—we may swear to forget her, but it is a disappointed lover's oath, and forgotten with some new remembrance of her. The love of fame, however it may be crossed, and the hope of it prevented, in some breasts, cannot die but with him who bears the consuming flame. He, soon after this, left the shores of commerce for the fields of poesy—took up his epic lyre, swept it with a desperate, yet despairing hand—sought once more to win the ear of the reluctant multitude, who heard his song as 'the idle winds,' which they regarded not—fell again into wretchedness and want—sickened, and died of a broken heart.

The following lines from the Keepsake, are from the pen of the venerable historian, Roscoe, and copied from the scrap-book of a young American traveller:

THE STRANGER.

From distant climes the stranger came,
With friendly view and social aim,
The various tribes of earth to scan,
As friend to friend, as man to man.
No glittering stones the stranger brought;
No arts professed, no wealth he sought;
His every wish one view confined,
The interchange of mind with mind.
What he the richest prize would deem,
Was friendship, kindness, and esteem;
What he could in return impart—
The same warm feelings of the heart.
Not his with selfish views alone
To trace his course from zone to zone;
His hope—to stretch affection's chain
From land to land—from main to main.
The various powers and virtues tell,
In human heads and hearts that dwell,
In bonds of love the race to bind,
And make one people of mankind.

THE ESSAYIST.

POETRY AND PHILOSOPHY.

It has been observed, that it seldom falls to the lot of one man to be both a philosopher and a poet. These two characters, in their full extent, may be said to divide betwixt them the whole empire of genius: for all the productions of the human mind fall naturally under two heads—works of imagination, and works of reason. There are, indeed, several kinds of composition, which, to be perfect, must partake of both. In our most celebrated historians, for instance, we meet with a just mixture of the penetration that distinguishes the philosopher, and the ardour of the poet: still their departments are very wide of each other; and a small degree of attention will be sufficient to show, why it is so extremely difficult to unite, in a high degree, the excellence of each. The end of the poet is to give delight to his reader, which he attempts by addressing his fancy and moving his sensibility; while the philosopher purposes merely to instruct, and therefore thinks it enough if he presents his thoughts in that order which will render them the most perspicuous, and seems best adapted to gain the attention. Their views demand, therefore, a very different procedure. All that passes under the eye of the poet, he surveys in one particular view; every form and image, under which he presents it to the fancy, are descriptive of its effects. He delights to paint every object in motion, that he may raise a similar agitation in the bosom of the reader. But the calm, deliberate thinker, on the contrary, makes it his endeavour to seek out the remoter causes and principles which gave birth to these appearances.

It is the highest exertion of a philosopher to strip off the false colours that serve to disguise, to remove every particular which fancy or folly has combined, and present to view the simple and naked truth. But the poet, who addresses the imagination and the heart, neglects no circumstance, however fanciful, which may serve to attach his descriptions more closely to the human mind. In describing the awful appearances of nature, he gladly avails himself of those magic terrors with which ignorance and superstition have surrounded them; for, though the light of reason dispels those shades, they answer the highest purpose of the poet, in awakening the passions. It is the delight of poetry to combine and associate; of philosophy, to separate and distinguish. One resembles a skilful anatomist, who lays open every thing that occurs, and examines the smallest particular of its make; the other is like a judicious painter, who conceals what would offend the eye, and embellishes every subject which he undertakes to represent. The same object, therefore, which has engaged the investigating powers of the philosopher, takes a very different appearance from the forming hand of the poet, who adds every grace, and artfully hides the nakedness of the inward structure under all the agreeable foldings of elegance and beauty. In philosophical discussions, the end of which is to explain, every part ought to be unfolded with the most lucid perspicuity; but works of the imagination never exert a more powerful influence than when the author has contrived to throw over them a shade of darkness and doubt. The reason of this is obvious: the evils which we imperfectly discern, seem to bid defiance to caution; they affect the mind with a fearful anxiety, and, as they present no limits, the imagination easily conceives them to be boundless. These species of composition differ still farther with respect to the situation of mind requisite to produce them. Poetry is the offspring of a mind heated to an uncommon degree; it is a kind of spirit blown off in the effervescence of agitated feelings; but the most steady composure is essential to philosophical inquiry. Novelty, surprise, and astonishment, kindle in the bosom the fire of poetry, whilst philosophy is reared up by cool and long-continued efforts. There is one circumstance relating to this kind of composition, too material to be omitted. In every nation it has been found that poetry is of much earlier date than any other production of the human mind; as, in the individual, the imagination and passions are more vigorous in youth, which, in mature age, subside, and give way to thought and reflection.

Something similar to this seems to characterize that genius which distinguishes the different periods of society. The most admired poems have been the offspring of uncultivated ages. Pure poetry consists of the descriptions of nature, and the display of the passions; to each of which, a rude state of society is better adapted than one more polished.

They who live in that early period in which art has not alleviated the calamities of life, are forced to feel their dependence upon nature. Her appearances are ever open to their view, and therefore strongly imprinted on their fancy. They shrink at the approach of a storm, and mark with anxious attention every variation of the sky. The change of seasons, cloud or sunshine, serenity or tempest, are to them real sources of sorrow or of joy; and we need not, therefore, wonder that they should describe, with energy, what they felt with so much force. But it is one chief advantage of civilization, that, as it enables us in some measure to control nature, we become less subject to its influence. It opens many new sources of enjoyment. In this situation the gay and the cheerful can always mingle in company, whilst the diffusion of knowledge opens to the studious a new world, over which the whirlwind and the blast can exert no influence. The face of nature gradually retires from view, and those who attempt to describe it, often content themselves with copying from books, whereby their descriptions want the freshness and glow of original observation, like the image of an object reflected through various mediums, each of which varies its form and lessens its splendour. The poetry of an uncivilized nation has, therefore, often excelled the productions of a more refined people, in elevation and pathos. Accustomed to survey nature only in her general form and grander movements, their descriptions cannot fail of carrying with them an air of greatness and sublimity. They paint scenes which every one has felt, and which, therefore, need only to be presented, to re-awaken a similar feeling. For a while, they delight us with the vastness of their conceptions; but the want of various embellishments, and the frequent recurrence of the same images, soon fatigue the attention, and their poetry may be compared with the world of waters, upon which we gaze for a time with amazement, and then turn away our eyes. It is the advantage of enlightened nations, that their superior knowledge enables them to supply greater variety, and to render poetry more copious. They allure us with an agreeable succession of images, and do not weary us with uniformity, or overpower us with the continuance of any one exertion; but, by perpetually shifting the scene, they keep us in a constant hurry of delight.

I cannot help observing, that poetical genius seems capable of much greater variety than talents for philosophising. The power of thinking and reasoning is a simple energy, which exerts itself in all men nearly in the same manner: indeed, the chief varieties that have been observed in it may be traced to two—a capacity of abstract and mathematical reasoning, and a talent for collecting fact and making observations; and these qualities of mind, blended in various proportions, will, for the most part, account for any peculiarities attending men's modes of thinking. But the ingredients that constitute a poet, are far more various and complicated. He is in a high degree under the influence of the imagination and passions, principles of mind very various and extensive. Whatever is complicated is capable of much greater variety, and will be far more diversified in its form than that which is more simple. In this case, every ingredient is a source of variety, and, by being mingled in the composition in a greater or less degree, may give an original cast to the whole.

To explain the particular causes which vary the direction of the fancy in different men, would perhaps be no easy task. We are led, it may be at first through accident, to the survey of one class of objects; this calls up a particular train of thinking, which we afterward freely indulge; it easily finds access to the mind upon all occasions; the slightest accident serves to suggest it. It is nursed by habit, and reared up with attention, till it gradually swells to a torrent, which bears away every obstacle, and awakens in the mind the consciousness of peculiar powers. Such sensations eagerly impel to a particular purpose, and are sufficient to give to the mind a distinct and determinate character.

Poetical genius is likewise much under the influence of the passions. The pleased and the splenetic, the serious and the gay, survey nature with very different eyes. That elevation of fancy which, with a melancholy turn, will produce scenes of gloomy grandeur and awful solemnity, will lead a person of a cheerful complexion to give delight, by presenting images of splendour and gayety. To these, and similar causes, may be traced that boundless variety which diversifies the works of imagination, and which is so great that I have thought the perusal of fine authors is like traversing the different regions of the earth. Some glow with a pleasant and refreshing warmth, whilst others kindle with a fierce and fiery heat: in one we meet with scenes of elegance and art, where all is regular, and a thousand beautiful objects spread their colours to the eye, and regale the senses; in another, we behold nature in an unadorned majestic simplicity, scouring the plain with a tempest, sitting upon a rock, or walking upon the wings of the wind. Here we meet with a Sterne, who fans us with the softest delicacies; and there we find a Rousseau, who hurries us along in whirlwind and tempest. Hence may be said to arise the delightful succession of emotions, felt in the bosom of sensibility. We feel the empire of genius, we imbibe the impression, and the mind resembles an enchanted mansion, which, at the touch of some superior hand, at one time brightens into beauty, and at another darkens into horror. Even where the talents of men approach most nearly, an attentive eye will ever remark some small shades of difference sufficient to distinguish them. Perhaps few authors have been distinguished by more similar features of character—if I may so speak—than Homer and Milton. That vastness of thought which fills the imagination, and that sensibility of spirit which renders every circumstance interesting, are the qualities of both: but Milton is the most sublime, and Homer the most picturesque. Homer lived in an early age, before knowledge was much advanced; he could derive little from any acquired abilities, and therefore may be styled the poet of nature. To this source, perhaps, we may trace the principal difference betwixt Homer and Milton. The Grecian poet was left to the movements of his own mind, and the full influence of that variety of passion which is common to all: his conceptions, therefore, are distinguished by simplicity and force. In Milton, who was skilled in almost every department of science, learning seems sometimes to have shaded the splendour of his genius.

No epic poet excites emotions so fervid as Homer, or possesses so much fire; but, in point of sublimity, he cannot be compared with Milton. I rather think that the Greek poet has been thought to excel in this quality more than he really does, for want of a proper conception of its effects. When the perusal of an author raises us above our usual tone of mind, we immediately ascribe those sensations to the sublime, without considering whether they light on the imagination or the feelings—whether they elevate the fancy, or only fire the passions.

The sublime has for its object the imagination only, and its influence is not so much to occasion any fervour of feeling, as the calmness of fixed astonishment. If we consider the sublime as thus distinguished from every other quality, Milton will appear to possess it in an unrivalled degree; and here indeed lies the secret of his power. Homer inspires us with an ardent sensibility; Milton with the stillness of surprise. One fills and delights the mind with the confluence of various emotions; the other amazes by the vastness of his ideas. The movements of Milton's mind are steady and progressive; he carries the fancy through successive stages of elevation, and gradually increases the heat by adding fuel to the fire.

The flights of Homer are more sudden and transitory; Milton, whose mind was enlightened by science, appears the most comprehensive; he shows more acuteness and more sublimity of thought. Homer, who lived more with men, and had perhaps a deeper tincture of the human passions, is far more vehement and picturesque than the English bard. To the view of Milton, the wide scenes of the universe seem to have been thrown open, which he regards with a cool and comprehensive survey, little agitated, and superior to those emotions which affect inferior mortals. Homer, when he soars the highest, goes not beyond the bounds of human nature; he still connects his descriptions with human passions; and, though his ideas have less sublimity, they have more fire. The appetite for greatness—that appetite which always grasps at more than it can reach, is never so fully satisfied as in the perusal of Paradise Lost. In following Milton, we grow familiar with new worlds; we traverse the immensities of space, wandering in amazement, and finding no bounds. Homer confines the mind to a narrower circle, but he brings that circle nearer to the eye, fills it with a quicker succession of objects, and makes it the scene of more interesting action.

Women are so careful and tender, such excellent nurses, and so anxious to amuse their patients, and so capable of doing it, that one of them is worth a host of male creatures.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Annual Report of the New-York City Dispensary.—According to promise, we present our readers with a few of the most striking passages in this interesting document, premising the single remark, that if any additional argument were wanting to enforce the appeal of the trustees, it is abundantly furnished by the dreadful sufferings incident to the present inclement season:

"It would be impossible to indulge the supposition, that in a city where wealth, and all those kindlier feelings which flow from religion and education, so richly abound, that the number of those who delight in doing good is so small, that an establishment, which has for its design the ready and gratuitous relief of the sick poor of this metropolis, should, after an existence of near forty years, be at last suffered to become extinct, from the want of those means which alone are sufficient for the accomplishment of its humane objects.

"Where so much is daily doing for other charities, it surely would be ungracious to suppose that no disposition existed to relieve the embarrassments of an institution, of whose beneficial results not even the most sceptical can, for a moment, entertain a doubt. Noble buildings have been erected, and innumerable associations formed, for the dissemination of the Holy Scriptures, the diffusion of religious instruction, and the general melioration of the moral condition of man, not only at home, but in remote, and almost unknown regions. But, in the results that have eventuated from these christian labours, should it be forgotten, that to afford relief to the afflicted of body, is a work by which they are to be recognised who truly walk in the path which HE has appointed, who has said, in the words we have adopted for our motto, 'I was sick, and ye visited me?' To those who venerate his precepts, need we say more? Is it not sufficient to make known our wants; to point to the objects who are to be benefited by our exertions; and above all, to recall to the recollection the promises of Divine blessing to those who, in their prosperity, forget not the poor, nor turn a deaf ear to the cries of the afflicted.

"Ours is a humble institution; in it there is no glare to attract public attention; connected with it, no societies or associations upon whom to call for weekly or monthly contributions—no popular influence to spread abroad its advantages. But there is that connected with it which addresses itself to the heart, and to all those feelings of humanity which lead man to the abodes of the wretched; to sympathize with their afflictions, and to afford that relief to the sufferer which poverty had almost caused him to despair of obtaining. To the benevolent, it is a sufficient recompense that it has been theirs to make the sick heart leap with joy, and to be the restorers of that happiness which had almost abandoned the bosoms of the abject and agonized parent, or the wretched and helpless child. In contributing, then, through the Dispensary, the means of affording this relief, may not those whose hearts delight in being moved to acts of humanity, find here an opportunity of dispensing those charities, and of reaping those rich rewards of feeling which thrill the bosoms of the benevolent, and bring upon them the smiles of holy and benignant spirits? There is another class, upon whom we would call for assistance. We would not only appeal to their sensibilities, but would also address their interest, and point out to them the benefit they receive by the existence of such institutions as the one that now asks of them a little of their abundance.

"The poor-rates form no inconsiderable portion of the expenses of the city; indeed, a large proportion of the personal tax with which each citizen is burdened, it is believed, goes to the support of the poor. Nearly ten thousand persons have been prescribed for, at, or from the Dispensary, during the last year. Had there not been this house of refuge for the sick poor, it may be safely said, that at least one half of this number would have been obliged to have resorted to the Alms-house for relief. And it is not only the sick who, in such cases, must become an expense to the city, but in very many instances, when those whose duty it is, are by sickness rendered unable to provide for their families, it occurs that these, too, must become inmates of the Alms-house. Placing, then, the subject of our solicitude in this light, may we not safely say, that a saving of at least twenty thousand dollars is annually made to the city by those domiciliary medical visits, and general attendance to the sick, which is the object of our institution?

and by thus lessening the public expenditure, is it necessary to say, that the 'New-York Dispensary,' independent of its philanthropic purposes, becomes also a public benefit, well entitled to the countenance and support of the economist?"

The following is the amount of the labours of the physicians attached to the institution:

"Cured, eight thousand five hundred and eighty-four; relieved and incurable, three hundred and fifty-one; disorderly, eighty; removed from the visiting districts, fourteen; removed to the hospital, twenty-one; removed to Bellevue, sixty-five; died, eighty-six; remaining under charge, one hundred and ninety-seven: total, exclusive of those vaccinated, nine thousand three hundred and ninety-eight. Increase, since last year, six hundred and twenty-nine."

After this statement, will it be believed that the treasurer of the institution is actually in advance ninety-two dollars and ninety-nine cents? and that the building in which patients are prescribed for, is a disgrace to the city by its very appearance in the Park?

Miss Sterling.—The lovers of music will be delighted to learn that one of the most successful performers of England, on the piano-forte, has taken up her residence in New-York, and intends shortly to instruct young ladies in the management of this delightful instrument. We allude to the lady whose name is prefixed to this article, who made so decided and favourable an impression, at her debut in Covent-Garden theatre, last year, in the fantasia from Moscheles, that the Times newspaper—the very highest critical authority in London—pronounced her performance to have been distinguished by "a brilliancy of execution, and elegance of expression, which had not been surpassed by any of the most eminent professors of that instrument." The same paper adds, "Her genius is of the most decided kind, and the reception which her talent procured her was extremely flattering. A person and manner highly prepossessing, added to the impression her performance produced." The Morning Post, of the same date, says that "it is impossible to speak of this lady in too high terms of commendation; the taste she displayed throughout, and the wonderful rapidity of her execution, we have never heard surpassed; and the astounding plaudits which followed the conclusion of her performance, sufficiently attested the sense of the audience." Lastly; the Morning Herald, after paying an elegant compliment to her execution, which it compared to improvising, so wild, and hardy, and light was her touch, adds: "Her extreme youth, and talent, and something of enthusiasm in her style—a precious advantage, by the way—obtained her the liveliest expressions of applause." We have quoted these authorities, because they convey, in the most appropriate terms, the exact impression which the talents and person of this amiable and interesting young lady have made upon ourselves, and, we may truly add, upon every one who has had the pleasure of witnessing her wonderful execution. It would be idle to descant on the advantages which New-York will derive from the possession of so eminent and skilful an artist, and an insult to the good taste of our numerous amateurs, to suspect that her exertions to diffuse a correct taste in music, and impart some portion, at least, of her own astonishing powers among the practisers of this delightful art, will go unrewarded, or remain unnoticed. We all recollect the change effected by Philipps and the Italian opera, in the cultivation of musical science amongst us, and we feel warranted in anticipating a far more practical and decided improvement from the personal instruction of Miss Sterling. In addition to her scientific and professional claims, the charms of her deportment, and her intelligent and cultivated mind, she comes recommended to general patronage by her intercourse with the first and most accomplished members of society. To the advantages of this last qualification, in the influence it may exert on the manners and behaviour of the younger individuals of her own sex who may be entrusted to her charge, it would be useless to direct the attention of parents, as they must be fully sensible of its immense importance in the practical education of their daughters.

The Theatres.—If we have been remiss in our theatrical notices of late—as has been hinted to us from various quarters—it has not proceeded from any disinclination to the subject; but simply because, for the last month or two, scarcely any thing—we except, of course, the performances of Miss Rock, a favourable notice of which was crowded out last week—deserving even a passing remark, has been presented to the public. The Bowery, during that period, has been closed. The galaxy of stars that were wont to twinkle so brightly and joyously in our dramatic hemisphere—Forest, Wallack, Clara Fisher, Feron, Austin, &c.—are scattered about in all quarters of the Union; and the New-York public, like an over-worked piece of land, has been allowed to lie fallow for a season; but, now that the husbandmen have again entered the field, we trust that a rich and bounteous harvest will reward their labours. We think that two, and perhaps three theatres, managed with a judicious liberality, can be supported in this city, and our rapid increase in wealth and population adds daily to the probability of such an opinion. Our citizens are rich and well-educated, and a rich and well-educated community will ever be found the best supporters of this most rational and intellectual species of amusement. Of performers we have, and will continue to have, a superabundance; for, independent of those of native growth, and the constant importations from Europe, there is at present, in these states, and can be concentrated and maintained in this city, more first-rate histrionic talent, in almost every department of the drama, than is to be met with in any other city of equal size on the face of the globe. With these advantages, what is to prevent a remunerating support being afforded to both Park and Bowery? and we trust that a spirit of generous emulation, rather than of jealous rivalry, will incite the two houses to place the most tempting, yet wholesome intellectual banquets before the public; while the La Fayette and Mount Pitt, with dogs, horses, and elephants for their principal performers, and a few men and women as auxiliaries, will act as drains to draw off all theatrical impurities.

It was stated, a month or so ago, that the Bowery managers had it in contemplation to enact a series of sterling English comedies, from the time of Wycherly, Vanburgh, and Congreve, down to the present period. This is an arduous and perilous undertaking, and we would have the managers consider it as such, and carefully and judiciously select their materials before they embark in such an enterprise; for it is only by the assistance of a regular company, comprising great and varied talent, that they can hope to succeed in such an attempt with honour and profit; but if they do succeed, it will not only reflect the highest credit on all concerned, but stamp a high character on this, or any other house, that may engage in such an undertaking—an undertaking which, if not patronised, would much affect the character of the city for liberality, taste, and intelligence. This, at the upper, with the variety of stars and the fine sterling company that are engaged at the lower house, would raise theatrical entertainments to a higher rank than they have heretofore attained in this city. Moreover, it is devoutly to be wished, that criticisms on the drama may reach a corresponding elevation, and that sound and healthy remarks may fill that place in the prominent journals which is now, for the most part, occupied by fulsome flattery and impudent puffs. This system neither deceives the public nor benefits the actors, for the public have the use of their eyes and other senses, and the actor of real merit is injured and disgusted by seeing the palm of excellence awarded to all alike. For ourselves, we would willingly assist, to the extent of our poor abilities, in effecting such a change, and will estimate, at its proper value, the irritability of those who may feel displeased at our free remarks. We will censure what we think wrong, even in the highest, and award praise, when it is due, to the lowest; and not make a show of independence, by letting the higher personages pass free, and valiantly belabouring some poor understrapper. If criticism is just, it ought to be bold and unshackled—if manifestly unjust, it will fall to the ground of itself. The Bowery opened on Saturday: great alterations have been made, and the house is now, both inside and outside, an ornament to the town.

Female Wages.—That indefatigable philanthropist, acute political economist, and good citizen, Mathew Carey, has been investigating the amount received by the industrious females who labour for the government and for tailors, and he has ascertained, to his own astonishment, and to the mortification of the public, that the utmost exertion of industry on their part, can barely secure for them a dollar, or a dollar and an eighth per week! To penetrate into their abodes of wretchedness, to witness the intense distress, the want and misery, produced by this scanty allowance, is enough to harrow up the soul, and make it turn with loathing from the picture. For this trifle, too, they are constantly employed from six in the morning till eleven at night!

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A SKETCH.

Her look was calm, but it was not
The calm of peace—it rather seemed Like resignation to her lot;
And yet a stranger would have deemed
That she was blest; for all around
Showed wealth, and power, and luxury;
And nothing told the secret wound
Of inward misery.
Her dwelling was a place of pride,
Which stood in lofty grandeur—wide
Its shadow fell o'er the rich green,
Which formed a carpet for the scene;
And flowers of every name were there,
The wild, the beautiful, the rare:
The climbing vine supporters found,
In bowers amidst the fairy ground;
The ancient elm-trees cast their shade
Along the pebbled walks, where played
The moonbeams through their spreading boughs—
A fitting place for lovers' vows;
The graceful larch and locust too,
Gave varied beauty to the view;
And near, where gushing waters streamed,
The cypress and the willow seemed,
Amidst the brilliance and the bloom,
The only things of grief and gloom.
And was it so? No, there was one,
The heiress of that rich domain;
Who, while she basked in fortune's sun,
Still felt that its cold light was vain.
She had been an enthusiast
In nature's beauties—o'er her heart
A spirit of romance had passed,
Which did to every scene impart

A charm unfelt by others—still,
She knew not that the gift, to feel
Such pure and exquisite delight,
Was a misfortune—that the blight
Of sorrow falls most fatally
Upon the mind thus doomed to be
The home of deep refinement; there
Comes disappointment and despair;
The subtle and envenomed dart,
The deadly mildew of the heart.
She knew not this, when her young eye
Saw so much beauty in the sky;
So much of untold loveliness,
In the green earth, in summer's dress;
Or such wild grandeur in the waves
Which sparkle o'er old ocean's caves.
Her spirit drank too freely then,
The draught of unimpassioned bliss;
As if such were a specimen
Of earth's best, truest happiness.
But life has better dreams than these,
And the heart warmer sympathies;
And o'er the careless hours of youth
There comes a vision, fair as truth,
Yet false as fair; for many prove
There is no constancy in love.
To man, it is a changeful mood,
A fitful feeling, soon forgot;
To woman, in her solitude,
It is the theme of every thought.
But few can feel its powerful thrill
Like her, the gifted one, who drew
Genius, and taste, and fancy, still
From that deep passion—yet none knew
The cause which gently stole the mirth
From her bright smile, and to her eye
Gave an expression not of earth—
A something, spiritual, high,

Which spoke of intellectual things,
Called forth by her imaginings.
But suddenly the dream was gone—
He left her, and she stood alone.
It seemed as if she heeded not
The cold neglect, and yet it wrung
The life-blood from her heart; but wrought
No outward change—her step still sprung
Light in the dance, and still her eye
With its mild, star-like beauty, beamed;
Her smile was given more pensively,
But yet on all around it gleamed:
And long, with dignity, she strove
To dwell on other themes; to love
The things she once had loved—'twas vain,
The faded vision came again.
And then her cheek grew pale—but none
Could tell why youth's fresh bloom had flown.
They said it was consumption—true,
It was, but that was all they knew.
Her parents watched the slow decline,
And vainly tried each healing art;
They bore her to a foreign clime,
And wept to see their hopes depart.
Awhile she struggled with her fate,
That they should not be desolate;
And for their sake, she sought to win
Back health, and be what she had been.
Again she looked upon the sky,
The earth, the sea; and wondered why
The foaming surge, the stars, the flowers,
Had lost their once-enchanting powers.
The spell was broken—where was he
With whom the scene was poetry?
Without him, all was valueless—
And thus, in her heart's loneliness,
She died—and soon her father's lands,
And wealth, passed into strangers' hands. ESTELLE.

THE REPOSITORY.

CHARACTER OF ROUSSEAU, AND A NOTICE OF HIS ELOISE AND CONFESSIONS.* BY AN ENGLISHMAN.

THERE never yet existed an author who so completely divided the suffrages of the literary world as Rousseau. By one party he has been cried up as an angel; by another, he has been written down as a demon. One class says he is above all praise; another, beneath all contempt. This reader finds in his ethics the very perfection of nature; that, the utmost plausibility of art. Meanwhile, all agree in this one point—namely, that, whether justly or unjustly, he has exercised a despotic influence over his age; taught the most indifferent to feel, the shallowest to think, the most abject to stickle for freedom of thought and action. Unlike Voltaire—who disseminated his most pestilent doctrines, and broke down the barriers of truth, reason, and moral and religious rectitude, by dint of searching irony—Rousseau enforces his opinions by the most winning and specious sensibility. He reaches the reason through the heart. We do not, in the following cursory sketch, intend to be the apologists of this extraordinary writer—to palliate his glaring obliquities of thought, his insidious sentiments, or distorted truisms: these sufficiently condemn themselves without our aid: all that we here profess to do, is to account for their origin, to trace their progress, and to show how, notwithstanding their apparent moral beauty, they led, as they must always lead, from sophistry to doubt, from doubt to despair, from despair to utter, irretrievable desolation.

From his earliest infancy, Rousseau, who inherited from nature the utmost fragility of constitution—which, by the way, is one of the strongest fosterers of intellect—was, by the force of circumstances, thrown upon himself for his amusements. At an early age, he was apprenticed to a clock-maker at Geneva, whom he describes in his Confessions, as a man just sufficiently intellectual for his occupation, but nothing more. With this person, of course, he could hold no communion—no interchange of thought or sentiment; his extreme delicacy of frame, nervous to a degree bordering at times upon madness, equally forbade his engaging in the usual sports of childhood, and he was consequently thrown upon books for his recreation; which books, had they been supplied to him by some sound, well-ordered, and enlightened individual, might, in due course of time, have given a philosopher instead of a sophist to the world. Unluckily, they were all, with one or two exceptions, of a chivalrous and romantic cast—there was little or no equipoise to counteract their effect; and it may readily be conceived what impression such works, fascinating at any period of life, must have made upon the unformed mind of a youth, who had never known the salutary restraints of scholastic discipline, had never been taught to bridle his passion, to tame his enthusiasm, or square his imagination agreeably to the dictates of a healthy judgment. Of course, the first effect produced by such books, was a disgust for his mechanical occupation. We do not remember the precise way in which this aversion showed itself, or whether Rousseau's father were living at the time; but we distinctly recollect, that the embryo sophist ran away from his employer, and pursued his course, unaccompanied, except by a bounding heart, and a slight—a very slight—stock of money, over the heaths and mountains of his native land. In one of these excursions, he chanced to light upon two young ladies, whom he assisted over a running stream, and at whose house he spent one or two delightful days. This incident, though trifling and scarcely worth mention in itself, is important as it regards Rousseau. His ever-creative mind, fascinated by the courtesy of these fair unknowns, at once robbed them in drapery selected from the wardrobe of a well-filled fancy; and, as the reality of their appearance wore off, it laid the foundation of that beautiful idealism, which Madame de Warrens strengthened, Madame de Houdetot confirmed, and which afterward shone forth to the admiration and regret of thousands, in the unequalled character of Eloise.

It was some time after this rencontre, that, fatigued with walking, hungry, penniless, and dispirited—the past wretched, the future a blank—the young Rousseau knocked for charity at the gate of a good-natured widow lady, named De Warrens, who at once, with all the generous inconsiderateness of a woman, listened to his petition, gave him good advice, supplied him with food and money, and sent him home. To this acquaintance—thus strangely commenced—must be traced much, indeed the greater part, of those singular obliquities in judgment and feeling which deformed the otherwise acute mind of Rousseau. Circumstances, or, as he himself would call it, destiny, threw him, some years afterward, when a youth of one or two-and-twenty, for the second time into the hands of this lady. By degrees he secured for himself an interest in her heart, which, however, in the headlong infatuation of the moment, he was content to share with another. From this hour, his mind received a warp; from this hour he learned to become sophistical, in order to justify his own conduct; and opinions, insincere at first, acquired, by long habit, and by being perpetually brooded over, an air of decided truth. The daily romance of his life—unoccupied, except in rambling about a sublime neighbourhood, where he familiarized himself with the loftiest forms of natural beauty, and fed and strengthened a strong but diseased mind—confirmed these opinions; until, at length, all that was sound and sterling in thought, gave place to art and sophistry. This meditative and impassioned mode of life, which, while it strengthens the sensibility, wholly unfits it for society, was pursued by Rousseau for many years. Occasionally, indeed, he visited Paris, where his exquisite relish for music, and the circumstance of his having composed a successful opera, procured him admittance to the highest circles; but his mind could not adapt itself to the etiquette of a court, his pride, too, forbade all approach to friendship, and he lived a hermit even within the atmosphere of Versailles. Before this, we should observe, he had, from some cause or other, separated himself from Madame de Warrens, and now lodged in the house of a Swiss family. Meanwhile, to satisfy his notions of independence, and secure what he called “freedom of thought and action,” he employed himself in copying music, by which drudgery he contrived to earn a decent subsistence, up to the moment when he was taken under the especial protection of the august family of Montmorenci. Shortly after his introduction to this family, at their express desire, conveyed to him in the most flattering terms, Rousseau quitted Paris, and went to reside with them at a small cottage, built for him near their own mansion; where, partly to beguile leisure, partly to put forth his peculiar notions on all subjects where the heart is concerned, he engaged in the composition of Eloise, which, when published one or two years afterward, turned the hearts and heads of France, and rendered its author an object of universal attraction.

It was about this period that the fatal warp in judgment, of which we have before spoken, put forth in Rousseau's mind all its most diseased and humiliating eccentricities. Nursed in solitude, he had formed notions of friendship which reality was sure to disappoint. He had expected to meet in life with the “faultless monsters” of fancy. Every fresh acquaintance was accordingly hailed at first with the utmost enthusiasm, which, however, soon subsided; disgust ensued, then suspicion, then alienation, and, finally, invincible aversion. It was in this way that his connexion with Diderot, D'Alembert, Voltaire, Saint Lambert, Grimm—to whose gossiping memoirs we owe so much delightful scandal—and a hundred others, began: in this way, too, it terminated. Even the noble family of the high constable—to whom Rousseau was indebted for almost every comfort his hypochondriacal temperament would permit him to enjoy—were not secure in his mind from reproach. This evinced itself in the most petty and humiliating manner. If they ever invited him to the chateau, it was, he said, to make a butt of him; if they respected his infirmities and his solitude, they treated him, he would add, with contempt: either way, they were sure to be wrong, and himself the injured party. Such feelings—which, though carried to the extreme in Rousseau, are by no means restricted to him—are the necessary results of an ill-balanced temperament. While youth lasts, they are, in some degree, kept under by the generous buoyancy, and freedom from distrust, of that age; but as years roll on, and the simplicity of life becomes discoloured with the taint of the world, the counteracting power is lost, and the mind compelled to drift headlong at the mercy of a wild, capricious, and jaundiced disposition. Rousseau's invariable defect was the substitution of feeling for principle. He had few speculative opinions independently of sentiment: this with him was every thing; it made him the leading writer of his age, and it made him a wretch. He seemed altogether to throw overboard the notion that man is as much the creature of reason as of sensibility; he objected to Hume that he was dispassionate, and to Voltaire that he was a wit—as if such peculiarities were not strictly within the province of nature, as much, and even more so, than his own forced and heated fancy. But he paid the penalty—and a dreadful penalty it was—of this infirm quality of mind. After hurrying from place to place—from Geneva to the Hermitage, from the Hermitage to the Boromean islands; after having been driven from one country with contempt, and received in another with enthusiasm; after wandering for years over Europe, and even venturing into the extreme recesses of Wales—this poor, wretched misanthrope—alone, forlorn, deserted in his age, owning kindred with none, rejecting pity with scorn, and repaying kindness with distrust; a pensioner, yet professing independence; a slave, yet a braggart of his freedom—returned once again to Paris, from which, after a brief, restless stay, he finally set out for one of the adjacent provinces, there to close his eyes and die.

The manner of his death has been variously related. Some say that he committed suicide; others, that he was attacked with a fit of epilepsy; others, that he fell a victim to that unconquerable dejection which, for years, had been preying on and withering the energies of his mind and body. In this state of doubt we shall, as a matter of course, incline to the charitable side, and take as our guide a slight memoir, penned a few days after his decease, and widely circulated throughout Paris. According to this narrative, Rousseau had been ailing for some weeks; but it was not until within a day or two of his death, that he anticipated the slightest danger. His love of nature—and this, be it said to his honour, was an enthusiastic passion that neither age nor infirmity could quench—remained with him to the last. He rambled daily to a summer-house situated at the bottom of his garden, and there, seated with some favourite book in his hand, would send his thoughts abroad into eternity, on whose threshold he was even then unconsciously standing. A few friends who lived near him, and who, by respecting his infirmities, had, somehow or other, contrived to preserve his good opinion, occasionally called in to see him; and to them only was his approaching change apparent: he himself was alternately sanguine and desponding to the last. On the morning of his dissolution, he had risen sooner than usual, and after passing the earlier parts of the day in pain, grew considerably better toward evening, and requested to be wheeled out in a low garden-chair toward his favourite summer-house. The day until twelve o'clock had been clouded, but it cleared up at noon, and the freshness of air, the hum of the insects, and the fragrant perfume of the flowers as they lifted up their heads after the rain, revived the languid spirits of the invalid. For a few minutes he remained absorbed in thought, in which state he was found by a neighbour who had accidentally called in to pay him a visit. "See," said Rousseau, as he approached, "how beautifully the sun is setting! I know not why it is, but a presentiment has just come over me, that I am not doomed to survive it. Yet I should scarcely like to go before it has set, for it will be a satisfaction to me—strange, perhaps, as it may seem to you—that we should both leave the world together." His friend—it is he himself that relates the story—was struck by the singular melancholy of this remark, more especially as the philosopher's countenance bore but too evident an impress of its probable truth. Accordingly, he strove with officious kindness to divert the stream of Rousseau's thoughts: he talked to him of indifferent matters, hoping thereby that he would regain his cheerfulness, but was concerned to find that every attempt was vain. Rousseau, at all times an egotist, was now solely occupied on the contemplation of himself and his approaching change. His thoughts were immovably fixed on death: he felt, he repeatedly exclaimed, that he was fast declining; and, every now and then, after closing his eyes for a minute or so, would languidly open them again, as if for the purpose of remarking what progress the sun had made toward the west. He remained in this state of stupor for a considerable time, when suddenly he shook it off, gazed about him with nearly all his wonted animation, and after bursting into a feeble rhapsody about his unwearied love for nature, turned full toward the sun, with the devotional aspect of a parsee. By this time the evening had far advanced, and his friend endeavoured to persuade him to return into the house. But no; his last moments, he was resolved, should be spent in the open air. And they were so. Scarcely had the sun set, when the eyes of Rousseau began also to close; his breath grew thicker, and was drawn at longer intervals; he strove to speak, but finding the effort vain, turned toward the friend at his elbow, and pointed with his hand in the direction of the red orb, which just at that moment dropped behind the horizon. This was his last feeble movement: an instant longer, and Rousseau had ceased to live.

We stop not to detail the particulars of the sensation that his death occasioned throughout France; but, contenting ourselves with this brief and meagre, but impartial memoir, come at once to the consideration of his character as an author. And here, if we could forget the insidious principles that every where pervade his works, and lurk like thorns beneath the flowers of his intellect, our task would be one of un-mixed praise. But we cannot do so; a regard to the derangements of life compels us to remember that the writings of Rousseau teem with the most pestilential doctrines, couched in language so beautiful, eloquent, that the fancy is flattered, while the judgment is wheeled on to its destruction. The Eloise—that unequalled model of style and grace—is full of certain captivating simplicity, that seems the inspiration of an unsophisticated nature. But it sets out in wrong principles; it requires the reader to grant that female modesty is consistent with immoral conduct, that vice is only vice when detected, and that the heart is the best and most correct moral guide through life. This last is an extravagant Utopian doctrine, at variance with principle, at variance with all that has made society what it is, and still contributes to preserve its decorum. Yet it is the key to unlock the mysteries of Eloise. The heroine is there represented as a young lady full of superlative sensibility, without judgment, without principle, though eternally boasting of both. Attached enthusiastically to Saint Preux, the friend and instructor of her youth, she is yet compelled, by the force of circumstances, to link herself and fortunes to an atheist. She has a large family; but, though guiltless of infidelity toward her husband, her mind has received a taint. Her very last letter—that affecting composition which it is scarcely possible to read without tears—though dated from a death-bed, breathes the spirit of incurable infatuation. To make matters worse, the object of this infatuation returns, after a long absence from abroad; and, notwithstanding that his presence must be a perpetual memento of the past, replete with danger, Madame de Wolmar—the married name of Eloise—receives him with unfeigned ecstasy, and not only insists on his taking up his abode exclusively with her, but—grateful, no doubt, for the valuable moral principles which he has instilled into her own mind—is indiscreet, not to say mad, enough to propose him as a tutor to her children. As if her own invitation were not sufficient, her husband is persuaded to add his entreaties, even though that husband has been previously made acquainted with the circumstance of Saint Preux's former intimacy with his wife. Now, all this, we roundly assert, is monstrous, and has no prototype in nature. When we say no prototype, we would be understood to mean, that it has never been, and never will be, found connected with the refined sensibility and exquisite sense of decorum with which Rousseau has invested these inconsistent creations of his fancy. A wife anxious for her children's morals, proud of her husband, and passionately devoted to the pure and simple enjoyments of home, would never peril her own reputation, or that of her family, by encouraging an attachment at variance with the most obvious duties. If, however, she did not encourage such attachment, she would not rest satisfied, as Eloise—and herein lies an additional violation of nature—is represented to have been, with mere theoretical guilt. In like manner, a husband described as being endowed with an almost romantic sense of honour, and even with a sceptical turn of mind that had its origin in principle, would never, consistently with these qualities, look with indifference on the hazardous condition of a wife who trod daily on a precipice enwreathed with flowers: he would either snatch her from the brink, or perish with her. But, supposing he relied on her self-possession for her safety, he would then show himself utterly unacquainted with the human heart; so that, in either sense, whether viewed as a man of the world, or a man of honour—and Rousseau invests him with both qualities in the extreme—Monsieur de Wolmar must be set down as a picturesque but ludicrous anomaly.

As the characters of Eloise are unnatural, so also are the sentiments—those, at least, which profess to adapt themselves to reality. They are couched, as we before observed, in sweet and honied language, yet inculcate the most pernicious morals. They bubble up with apparent artlessness from a good and benevolent heart, yet are tainted all over with miasma. Vice is taught to lisp the sentiments of a generous wisdom; the language of the Cecropian Pallas is mouthed by the Cyprian Venus; Eloise prates of honour, Saint Preux of reason, and both, of the charms of patriarchal innocence and simplicity. It was upon a principle pretty similar to this, and at least with equal sincerity, that the Gracchi complained of sedition. It has been the object with many undoubted moral authors, to paint the fascinations of vice in the most alluring colours, in order to contrast it afterward with the penalties it must pay perforce to virtue, and thus to work out a more obvious and impressive homily. This is not the case with Rousseau. Vice, throughout his Eloise, robed in the garb of modesty, is triumphant; she is even pitied, and monopolizes the tears due to her celestial adversary. Who, except by the determined efforts of a strong mind, can bear for an instant to condemn Madame de Wolmar—the beautiful—the sensitive—the confiding? Who can forget her high-wrought, impassioned youth, her exceeding love of nature, of art, of all, in short, that contributes to the grace, the ornament, and the simplicity of existence? Even up to the present moment, though years have elapsed, fashions have changed, and literature has diverged into new channels, she is ever visibly before us. The rocks of Meillerie breathe of her—Clarens is eloquent of her name—Vevay whispers it through all her woods—and the evening breeze, as it sighs over the blue waters of Geneva, repeats the last parting that rent the souls of herself and her unforgotten lover. She has a distinct—a separate—an undivided existence in our memories; for the Eloise, be it observed, is not a book to be laid aside with childhood; it grows with our growth, and strengthens with our strength; we abjure its principles, but, despite ourselves, we hug its sensibility to our hearts; and even when we repudiate it as the true liber amoris, it puts forth new claims to our admiration by its exuberant fulness of ideas, its ingenious sophistry, and faultless style. We own throughout its pages the presence of a powerful and analytical mind, that has studied—deeply studied—the origin and progress of even its slightest emotions, and noted them down, fresh as they rose, one after the other, from patient and acute investigation, with all the overwhelming earnestness of sincerity.

The "Confessions," like the "Eloise," abounds in impassioned sentiment, but possesses in parts a vein of indignant sarcasm, of which the other is devoid. It is the history—and a mournful one it is—of Rousseau's own mind; of his progress from childhood to age, from first enthusiasm to final despair. It is full of detailed accounts of Madame de Warrens, Therese, and his unrequited fondness for Madame de Houdetot. It is, in fact, the autobiography of an ardent, self-willed mind, at one time capable of the loftiest flights of virtue; at another, equal to the most contemptible misdeeds. What can be more inconsistent than the candour that could afford to acknowledge that, in order to avoid punishment, it falsely accused a poor, unfriended maiden of theft, and the meanness that could stoop to act so? But, from first to last, Rousseau was the child of caprice; his actions were all impulses—they could never be relied on.

With regard to the literary excellence of his Confessions, it is lavish and splendid in the extreme. Each chapter abounds—as suits occasion—in passages of unaffected simplicity, of glowing declamation, of energetic scorn, and sweet descriptive beauty. In proof of this, we may adduce Rousseau's account of his first introduction to Madame de Houdetot—of his solitary walk every morning, to steal one look at this idol of his enthusiasm—of his proud expectations—unwearied attachment, which neither absence on his own part, nor indifference on that of his mistress, could extinguish—and of his subsequently blighted hopes. Nor is that passage to be forgotten, wherein he describes his ecstatic feeling of enjoyment, while sailing about at evening in his boat, far away from the sight of the human countenance, and surrounded only by the grandest forms of nature—the towering mountain, the shrubless crag, the soft, luxuriant meadow, through whose daisied herbage wound a hundred silver rivulets, sparkling in the red sunset, and lapsing on their course in music and in happiness. Yet the whole passage—beautiful as it undoubtedly is, and conceived in the rapt fervour of poetic inspiration—is false to nature, and equivocal in sentiment. It is in direct contradiction to the experience of ages—surely entitled to some little deference even from so headlong a reformer as Rousseau—which has left it on the records of a thousand volumes, that the unreasonable indulgence of solitude is a factitious feeling, engendered by a diseased, and confirmed by an unsocial intellect. Amid passages, however, of such doubtful—to say the least of them—sensibility, it is delightful to catch now and then glimpses of another and a nobler nature. It is like the bursting in of a sudden sunshine upon November's gloom. Of such a redeeming character is Rousseau's account of the periwinkle, which, by accident, he picked up in one of his Alpine botanical excursions. His simple exclamation of delight at the recognition, "Ah, voilà la pervenche!" goes deeper to the heart than a thousand elaborate homilies. It was not the mere flower itself, but the associations thereby engendered, that filled his eyes with tears, as he pressed it with fervour to his lips. Eight-and-thirty years before, while rambling with Madame de Warrens through the same neighbourhood, he had gathered that very flower. Time had nearly effaced the circumstance from his mind—age had crept over him—the object of his unceasing attachment had been long since consigned to the earth; but here was a talisman to recall the past; this little simple mountain plant bore about with it a magic power that could roll back the wheels of time, and array a haggard soul in the same sweet freshness which it wore in the morning of existence. As regards the pervading spirit of the Confessions, it is a work which sets out in a pensive vein of reflection, and terminates in the darkest, the fiercest misanthropy. Yet, whether for good or evil—whether to sear with scorn, or melt with tenderness—the spirit of a mighty genius moves along each page, free, undisguised, and unchartered as the wind. Indeed, had Rousseau shown but half as much talent in palliating misery as he has shown in forestalling and aggravating it, he would have been the greatest man that ever existed. But, baneful as is the character of his productions, they inculcate—the Confessions more especially—an impressive, but unconscious moral. They convince the uninformed, wavering mind, that true happiness is only to be found where it holds in respect the social and the moral duties; that sensibility, without principle, is like the tower built by the fool upon the sands, which the very first wave swept into annihilation, and that every departure from virtue is a departure from enjoyment, even though accompanied by supreme abilities.

Having thus discussed impartially the character of Rousseau's chief works, it remains, as some slight apology for their obliquities, to say a few words respecting the age in which he flourished. He wrote at a period when the French mind, drugged with a long course of anodyne literature, made up from prescriptions unchanged through a tedious succession of ages, was eagerly prepared to receive any alternative that might exhilarate its intellectual constitution. Previous to his time, France was trammelled by Aristotelian regulations, which, whether for the drama, the closet, or the senate, prescribed one uniform style of composition—correct, but cold—polished, but insipid; founded essentially on the imitative, and depreciating—as was the case with the Augustan age in England, which derived its mental character from the French court—any departure from the old established classics of Greece and Rome as downright unadulterated heresy. Voltaire was the first to break through the ice of this formality; he threw a vivifying power into literature, which sparkled with a thousand coruscations, and drew forth the dormant energies of others. Rousseau was one of the master-spirits thus warmed into life: his predecessor, by his novel and brilliant paradoxes, had triumphantly led the way; France was henceforth prepared to be astonished—overwhelmed—electrified; and Rousseau answered every expectation. This, perhaps, is but a poor apology for vice, that it adapts itself to the taste of the day; nevertheless, every man is more or less fashioned by the age in which he lives—few having, like the divine, unsullied Milton, the fortitude to precede it; and if the gross immoralities of Beaumont and Fletcher, and still worse, of Congreve, Vanburgh, and Farquhar, are excused from consideration of the period in which they flourished, surely the same extenuating principle may with justice be applied to Rousseau. In addition to this, it must not be forgotten that his sentiments, however revolting they may appear, were, literally speaking, the received opinions of his country. They grew out of a courtly system of fashion which winked at dissipation, and visited only with condemnation an uncouth person, bad address, churlish temper, or clownish dialect. At such a demoralized period—the necessary precursor of revolution which should clear the polluted atmosphere—a man of first-rate ability, a pander to the elegant sensuality of the age—which, according to Burke, lost "half its danger in losing all its grossness"—and an unflinching philosopher of the new school, was not likely to pass unnoticed. Rousseau felt this, wrote accordingly, and rendered himself immortal, and a wretch. The secret of his success he has himself explained in a published conversation with Burke, wherein he observes, that, finding that the old vehicle of literature was crazy and worn out, he took upon himself the task of renewing the springs, repainting the panels, and gilding the whole machine afresh. In other words, he resolved to extend the pathetic, deepen the unsocial, and pervert what little was left of moral and religious sensibility among his countrymen. In this he too happily succeeded; but what were the penalties he paid for such success? The answer is tremendous? A shipwrecked character—a broken heart—a brilliant but unenviable immortality. One word more. Rousseau has been frequently styled the champion, the apostle of freedom. Mr.

Hazlitt, in particular, who, in his clouded moments, has much of his manner, has thus loved to designate him. This is certainly a saving clause, with nothing to disturb its effect but the circumstance of its utter falsity. The philosopher's independence, like his sentiment, was purely a factitious feeling. It was not the healthy, progressive growth of reason, but the forced production of sophistry. It could stoop to be the slave of the most effeminate, demoralizing vices, and was the result of irritability, selfishness, and egotism. Far different is the nature of the true apostle of liberty. The materials of his magnanimity originate with himself, they are beams reflected from the sunny purity of his own heart, and are mixed up with, and give a tone and colouring to, his most trifling actions. To be the true asserter of public freedom, the man himself must be free. No unworthy suspicions, no rash misanthropy, no prurient fancies, no truckling to sensuality, simply because it is clothed in the borrowed robes of sentiment, must be permitted to interfere with, or influence his opinions. His mind must tower above the ordinary level of mankind, as much in conduct as in intellect. It is not enough that he possess the ability to discuss; he must add the heart to feel and the disposition to practise the mighty principle in its minutest as well as in its most comprehensive sense; for by the union of worth and genius alone—either of which, when disjoined, is useless—is the world's conviction ensured. Milton, whose ethics were so sublime, whose daily habits were so stainless, spoke from the heart, when he declared himself the sworn foe to despotism; the Tell of private life gave abundant evidence of the public patriot; the moral influence of Washington as a dictator, was the necessary consequence of his worth as a man; but Rousseau, though he fled from clime to clime, the fancied martyr to his virtue and his independence, wrote only from the promptings of an excited, a distrustful, and a dissatisfied mind.

VARIETIES.

A NEW WAY TO KILL TIME.—The editors of a late Gloucester paper pledge themselves for the truth of the following circumstance: "Here, John," said a friend of ours to his servant, a few mornings since, "boil me an egg for breakfast, and," at the same time handing him his watch, "be sure you let it boil three minutes exactly." Away went John into the kitchen, and told Mary to boil, not the egg, gentle reader, but the watch! An operation which, with corresponding sagacity, she instantly prepared to set about. Mr. H. however, thinking they were a long time in obeying his orders, went out, and finding John upon the staircase, narrowly eyeing the clock, asked him what delayed him? "Oh, sir!" said John, "it is not quite done yet." "But what do you want with the clock, when I gave you my watch to boil the egg by?" "Egg, watch!" stammered out John, "why, dear sir, Mary's boiling your watch, and I was waiting here to tell her when the three minutes were up!" Our friend instantly went to Mary, and sure enough found his watch yielding its last tick, and bobbing in a saucepan of boiling water, over a kitchen fire.

A GENIUS.—A blockhead rubbed "his thoughtless skull" for a thought, in vain. Two wits observed him; "Come, Tom," said one, "a genius should never be at a stand." "No!" quoth the other, "why, even the sun was brought to a stand-still once." "Yes, but it did not cease to shine," replied the former.

QUITE ROMANTIC.—"Shepherd," said a sentimental young lady—who fancied herself a heroine in the golden groves of Arcadia—"Shepherd," said she, to a rustic who was tending some sheep, "why have you not got your pipe with you?" "Bekase, ma'am, I ha'n't got no backy."

A LEGACY GUAGE.—A rich old baronet constantly calculated the state of his health by the rise and fall of the mercenary attentions of pretended friends and relatives. Some little time before he died, his physicians would have persuaded him that he was better; it would not do; he had just discovered he had six fatal symptoms in his case—three presents and three visits in one day from his dear friend H.

SKETCHES.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A STORY.

CHARLES had only been married a week, and his wife adored him. Oh these young wives, when they yield up their pure, deep affections, and break through the restraints of bashful fear, how they do love! And these young husbands too, when, from the lonely, and sometimes miserable adventures of the unstable world, they have gathered in all the wealth of their scattered feelings, to concentrate it upon one object, what sacred joys swell in their bosoms—what brilliant images float in their imagination! They scarcely lived, except when together. They could not conceal the bliss which they drank in from each other's voices; nor control their eyes from reading in each other's glances the silent but sweet passages of love. If one left the room, though only for ten minutes, the other would be sure to follow; and if any prying stranger had been within gun-shot of their circle, he might have heard half-uttered terms of endearment, and fragments of feigned anger, from every part of the house.

Charles had been absent two days. Poor Julia had been wishing and wishing for him. His well-known step sounded in the entry; the door opened, and she met him with a heightened colour in her cheek, and her blue eyes flashing from beneath their long lashes with sparkles of unwonted pleasure. Shall I mention particulars? It is scarcely worth while. He who cannot imagine how a warm-hearted young wife, in the honey-moon, would meet her idol after an absence of two whole days, is no reader for me.

"Oh!" she exclaimed, after the first transport had a little subsided, "I am so glad you have returned, dear, dear Charles! I was afraid you might not come—that you were sick, or some accident had occurred. But here you are. And now, have you had a pleasant time? and how do they all do? and whom did you see? and?"

Charles stopped her rosy mouth with kisses.

"Yes, here I am, safe and sound, and full of news; but you huddle question upon question with such volubility that I shall never get a chance to answer them, and your pretty mouth here wide open to ask I don't know how many more."

"Well, then," answered she, flinging herself into an attitude of attention, and folding her arms like a judge upon a bench, "there—I am dumb, and ready to listen to the news—I won't speak another word till you have done."

And with considerable apparent difficulty she closed her lips.

"Now then," said Charles, "mark me."

"I will," said Julia.

"Well, then," continued her husband laughing, "in the first place, they are all well; in the next, I have had a very pleasant time; and, lastly, I have seen old Mr. Peterson, and Aunt Sarah, and Mr. and Mrs. Vanderdyke, and little Bob, Henry, and Maria."

"And this," inquired Julia, "is the news that you are to tell? and these are all you saw?"

"Oh, no!" replied Charles, mysteriously; "far from it, Julia. I have met one more—one most beautiful, bewitching being more—the very counterpart of Venus. Such complexion—such ringlets, long and glossy—and cheeks—roses and lilies are nothing to them! There is nothing in all nature sweeter than her lips, and her eyes are bright dangers no man should rashly encounter. They were soft, melting, liquid, heavenly, blue—full of the light of intellect, and tremulous every beam of them with a tenderness that makes the heart ache."

"You are only jesting with me," said Julia, endeavouring, but in vain, to check the change that came over her face, as the shadow of a cloud falls on a stream. "This is some stupid Dutch beauty, and you can scarcely describe her without laughing. Come now, tell the truth."

"You may believe it or not, just as you please," said Charles; "but I assure you the whole account is as true as the enjoyment of it was enrapturing, and the memory is delicious."

Julia was sensitive and artless. She loved her husband with that deep tenderness which knew all the thrills of love's hopes and fears. Her heart was like a goblet filled to the brim, whose contents tremble and overflow when shaken ever so lightly. There was, therefore, in these enthusiastic praises of another, something strange, and even cruel. Still she could not believe that he was serious; and forcing a smile, and struggling to keep down her rising emotion, she listened to him in silence as he rattled on.

"Our meeting was marked with uncommon interest. Old Mr. Peterson introduced me to her, after having previously hinted that, before I was married, she had regarded me with more than common complacency. Well, we met. I addressed her by name; she said nothing—but, oh! those eyes of hers were fixed on me with a gaze that reached into the innermost recesses of my heart, and seemed to touch all those chords of feeling which nature had strung for joy. Wherever I went, I found her eyes still turned towards me, and an arch smile just played around her saucy lip, and spoke all the fine fancies and half-hidden meanings that woman will often look, but not always trust to the clumsy vehicle of words. I could restrain no longer—but, forgetting all but those heavenly lips, I approached and—"

Poor Julia—she thought she heard the knell of her young dreams. The hue of her cheek, and the sparkle of her azure eye, were gone long before; and as he painted in such glowing colours the picture of his feelings, her lip quivered, and tears swelled up and dimmed the blue light of eyes as beautiful as day.

"I will never speak to you again, Charles," sobbed she, "if this is true."

"It is true," he exclaimed, "only not half like the reality. It was your own picture, my sweet girl, that I kissed again and again."

She looked at him a moment, and buried her wet eyes in his bosom. As she lifted her head, and, shaking back the clustering ringlets that fell around her brow, displayed her face smiling through tears, his arm softly found its way around her waist, and—but I am at the end of my sheet. F.

FEMALE CHARACTER.

MISS PORTER.

THIS lady exemplifies in herself those amiable and exalted attributes which give to woman's loveliness additional attractions. Her life has been one of retiring usefulness, and we are happy to add, of tranquil and happy enjoyment. It does not furnish her biographer with any great variety of materials; but when we know that, blessing and blest, she is surrounded by a dear circle of affectionate relatives, and that she commands the respect and regard of all those whose opinion and friendship are worth obtaining—the wise and the virtuous—we are prepared to enter upon the incidents of her literary, apart from domestic life, with sentiments of approbation which her numerous works will certainly tend to confirm.

Miss Anna Maria Porter is the youngest daughter of a gallant officer, who died fighting the battles of his country. Her mother still survives in the enjoyment of those reflected honours which she derives from the literary reputation of her children. Her eldest daughter, Miss Jane Porter, has had the honour, in her affecting romance of Thaddeus of Warsaw, to have suggested, we believe, the idea of the "Waverly Novels." Dr. Porter has written several medical works of deserved repute, and Sir Robert Ker Porter is not better known by the admirable creations of his pencil, than for the scientific and amusing account of his Travels through Persia. Surrounded by a family so eminently literary, it is by no means wonderful that the talents of the fair subject of this memoir early developed themselves. Her juvenile essays were full of that promise which was amply fulfilled in her more mature productions; she became a contributor to a popular periodical; and a pursuit which she had adopted merely for amusement, soon became the settled business of her life. Her amiable mother, the compass and elegance of whose mind may be inferred from the tone of society which she created around her, encouraged the efforts of her lively and charming daughter, and Miss Anna Maria Porter soon appeared in public, as the author of a romance entitled "The Hungarian Brothers." In this work we have a lively picture of the manners of Hungary and Germany during the latter part of the eighteenth century. The plot is singularly interesting, and the story uncommonly well sustained. In one particular it exhibits an impress of a mind more poetical and humane than an enlarged experience with the world would warrant. In love with virtue and all its attributes, she has drawn her characters such as they ought to be, rather than such as they might have been expected; but, we confess, this trait in the character of the Hungarian Brothers, induced us to read their story frequently.

Her next romance, Don Sebastian, was of a more ambitious character. The obscurity of her hero's story, the mystery which enveloped the termination of his career, and the bold and chivalrous character of the times in which he lived, afforded full scope for the exercise of those abilities with which the fair author was gifted. Her descriptions harmonize accurately with the outline which history furnishes; and her picture of domestic life, in the drawing of which she excels, adds considerably to the interest of a story, which, to be attractive, hardly required the embellishments of fancy.

The Recluse of Norway succeeded, and exhibits increased powers of observation and a more correct style. The characters are far more natural in this than in her preceding works; but though she has bestowed upon her heroes fewer virtues, enough remain to assure us that the authoress continued to contemplate the fairer side of human nature. The siege of Malta was a stirring incident, and Miss A. M. Porter founded "The Knights of St. John" upon it. Her selection evinced the accuracy of her judgment. The moral of the tale is entitled to every praise, and the execution of the whole is every way worthy of the pen which produced Don Sebastian. Her next work was "The Feast of St. Magdalen," a story abounding with beauties of a very high order: it is quite dramatic in its construction, and shows that, had Miss Porter turned her mind that way, she could not have failed to enrich the national drama. The scene is laid in Florence, at that period of its history which is filled with the disgrace and restoration of the Medici family. The characters are well drawn, and an Italian spirit breathes throughout the work; so much so, that "The Feast of St. Magdalen" has in it less of the tramontane stiffness than most of our English novels—a proof that the fair author has caught the tone of the times, and of the land she would describe.

The distinguishing characteristics of Miss Porter's novels are a pure and lofty morality, a truly feminine sensibility, great sweetness of description, an eloquent appreciation of natural beauties, and a graceful style of composition. If ever the mind of an author was expressed in her works, it is that of Miss Porter. Her pure and gentle temper beams through every page of her writings, and sheds a cheerful and beneficial light throughout the whole of them. Piety and good-will breathe in every sentiment, without the slightest appearance of affectation; and while every one must be amused by them, few can rise from the perusal of her volumes without melioration and refinement of feeling, the results of which will work out some portion of good in the world. It is for the happy effects, in this respect, that Miss Porter is entitled to her highest praise as an authoress. Such books as she writes are designed chiefly for the perusal of her own sex. To women, from the nature of their vocations, reading is more a necessary of life than it is to men; and they can read nothing, in spite of the cavils against novel-reading, more likely at once to refine and improve their minds, without the effort of study, than such as Miss Porter's. Those novels represent the most amiable parts of the female character in their most agreeable developments; and treating, as they do, of tales of pure affection and honourable deeds, they teach women, and young women particularly, how much influence they possess, and how usefully, and virtuously, and beautifully, they may employ it.

Besides the works already enumerated, Miss Porter has published others of a less ambitious and more domestic character. Her Roche Blanche possesses considerable interest, and Honor O'Hara is a sweetly told tale. In it we have another proof of the versatility of the author's talents; for she exhibits a familiarity with the scenes of Irish life, and with the peculiar and racy dialect of that country, hardly to be expected from one conversant with the higher walks of English society. Some of the characters speak the brogue with a felicity and unction not surpassed by the creations of Mr. Banim's discursive imagination.

Since the appearance of "Honor O'Hara," the subject of this memoir, in conjunction with her gifted sister, whose numerous works will continue to be popular while just sentiment and a correct style are duly estimated, has produced two series of amusing tales. The first is entitled "Tales Round a Winter's Hearth," and the second, "Coming out, or the Field of Forty Footsteps." These are a proud testimony, not only to the sisterly love of these lovely ladies, but to their high attainments; it is pleasant to see them thus labouring to forward the best interests of society by instructive fictions, and perpetuate their own names by the means of intellectual accomplishments. There is a maturity about these latter works, which bespeaks increased industry in the writers.

DRESS OF QUEEN ELIZABETH.

A German traveller, who visited England during the reign of Elizabeth, gives a minute description of her. "She had," he says, "in her ears, two very rich pearls, with drops; she wore false hair, and that red; upon her head she had a small crown, reported to have been made of some of the gold of the celebrated Lunebourg-table; her bust was uncovered, as all the English ladies have it, till they marry; and she had on a necklace of exceeding fine jewels; her hands were small, her fingers long, and her stature neither tall nor low; her air was stately, her manner of speaking mild and obliging. That day she was dressed in white silk, bordered with pearls of the size of beans, over it a mantle of black silk, shot with silver threads; her train was very long, the end of it borne by a marchioness; instead of a chain, she had an oblong collar of gold and jewels. As she went along, in all this state and magnificence, she spoke very graciously, first to one, then to another—whether foreign ministers or those who attended for different reasons—in English, French, and Italian; for, besides being well skilled in Greek and Latin, and the languages I have mentioned, she is mistress of Spanish, Scotch, and Dutch."

THE CASKET.

The following—says the Washington City Chronicle—from the London Athenæum, is one of the most beautiful things of the kind we recollect ever to have read. The periodical from which it is taken has been recently established in London, and promises to be one of the first magazines of the day. We have observed several admirably written articles in it, of a kind suited to the taste of the literary reader, and shall from time to time avail ourselves of its treasures, to make our readers better acquainted with its merits.

THE SHELL.

AN HISTORICAL APOLOGUE.

"THE world was made for man," said a youth.

"I will tell you an apologue," answered his teacher:

"1. In a beautiful bay of the celebrated island Atlantis, a large shell, of the most delicate white and the most rounded form, the relic from some previous world, lay on the smooth and elastic sand. It was left for a long period undisturbed and unaltered; sometimes kissed by the extreme bubbles of the billows, and often trembling so melodiously in the wind, as to have furnished to the early gods the first hint of a musical instrument, and to have been the prototype of the sounding conches which accompanied with their deep notes the feasts on Olympus, and the Indian triumphs of Bacchus.

"2. The moist dust gradually accumulated within it, and the germ of a sea-weed fell upon the soil, and grew until a fair and flourishing plant, with long dark leaves, overhung the white edge of the thin and moonlike vase. For many months, the ocean herb retained its quiet existence, imbibed the night-dew of the heavens, rejoiced in the fresh breezes from the sea, and lived in tranquil safety through every change of shower and sunshine. At length a storm arose which rolled the waters upon the shore. The shell was overwhelmed, the plant washed out of it, and the light vessel swept into a cleft of the rocks.

"3. After some days of calm and warmth, a bird dropped into it a seed, which sprouted, and became an orange-tree. Its leaves were so thick and green that they would have supplied a graceful chaplet to a wood-nymph, and she might have delighted to place in her bosom the pearly and fragrant blossoms which hung amid the tuft of verdure. The seasons with their varieties, and the starry influences of gentle nights, nurtured the shrub, and the pure flowers were changed into gorgeous fruits, which gleamed through the foliage like the glimpses of a gilded statue in some deserted temple, through the robes and coronals of creepers which have overgrown it. The orange-tree had gladdened many spring-times with its sweetness and its splendour, when it faded and died; and the birds of the air piped a lamentation over the shrub, amid the living beauty of which they had so often nestled.

"4. In after years, when nothing remained of the orange but a slight and dreamy odour around the shell, and the last light grains of the dust wherein it grew had been borne away by the eddying breezes, a butterfly, as red and glittering as the planet Mars, came on its crimson wings to the dim and spiral cell. It fluttered round the ivory entrance, poised itself upon it for a moment, and waved its silken sails. Then, after darting and circling, like a winged mote of the sunbeam, through the deep woods, and over the sea, it returned to perish. While it sank into its quiet and beautiful retreat, it yet seemed loth to leave a world which to it had been a fairy domain; but the necessity of its nature was upon it, and it closed the gay leaflets which had sustained its flight, and resigned itself to death.

"5. It was followed by a troop of bees, which took possession of the shell, and, after their daily excursions over meadow and bloomy bank, returned to its smooth and undulated chambers with the materials of their combs, and with large store of bright and luxurious honey. The tiny echoes of their abode resounded the constant hum of labour and happiness, and it was soon as brimming as a wine-cup at a nuptial feast, with the rich and perfumed treasures of the insects, arranged and sealed in the exact compartments which filled the interior of their silvery palace. But a bird attacked and destroyed their commonwealth, and again the shell was left empty.

"6. A humming-bird, all emerald, ruby, and sapphire, then discovered the lonely nook, and folded there its jewelled wings. It soon found a mate, and together they lived a flowery life. He who had seen either of them wandering at sunset through the glen, would have believed that the brilliant core of the western sky was fluttering away along the earth; or the little animal might have been thought the choicest signet of a prince, transformed of a sudden into a living thing, and endued with the power of flight. When they wheeled together towards their home at twilight, no pair of fire-flies, no twin-lights of the firmament could be brighter than were their diamond crests. The sweet essences of a thousand buds and flowers supplied their nourishment; and, while they sucked the delicious juices of ripe fruits, their wings were tintured by the lightest bloom of the plum and the grape. But the rain dropped thick and fast into the shell, and the gentle birds, which seemed made to whisper love-messages in the rose-bud ear of a lady, and to hide themselves in sport among her ringlets, departed from their nest, and sought in sparry grotto, or in southern bower, a more secure habitation for their lovely but frail existence.

"7. Lastly, at sunrise, seemed flitting from the morning star, an elfin spirit, which danced into the shell, and assumed it as his home. It thrilled with life and pulsation; and, while a spring gushed out of the rock, and bore it along toward the sea, he spread his thin wings to the breeze, and sailed in his lily-coloured argosy away over the blue and sunny deep. The white shell, and its new sovereign, moved forward with the graceful swiftness of a snowy swan, tilting over the light ripples of the water, and, when night came with its constellations, seemed to be itself a trembling star on the verge of the horizon. That spirit, too, shall inhabit the shell but for a time, and shall then depart, that he may develop, in some other more fitting position, the whole capacities of his nature. The shell will sink into the waves, and be joined to the treasures of the ocean caverns, in them also to aid the existence of other beings, and to fulfil a new cycle of its ministry.

"That shell is the world! that spirit, MAN. Yet not for man alone was it created, but for all the living things in the successive stages of existence, which can find in it a means of happiness, and an instrument of the laws which govern their being."

A REAL JOB.

In the early part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Dr. Cooper edited a republication of a learned work called Bybliotheca Elyola, with the addition of thirty-three thousand words, and many other improvements. He had already been eight years in collecting materials for his edition, when his wife, who was a silly and malignant woman, going one day into his library, burnt every note he had prepared, under the pretence of fearing that he would kill himself with study. The doctor shortly after came in, and seeing the destruction, inquired who was the author of it. His wife boldly avowed that it was the work of her mischievous hands. The patient man heaved a deep sigh, and said, "Oh, Dinah, Dinah, thou hast given me a world of trouble!" and then quietly sat down to another eight years of hard labour, to replace the notes which she had destroyed. For this, and other learned labours, he was afterwards made bishop of Lincoln.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

TO MY BROTHER.

Oh, smile. I cannot bear
To see thy heart in silent sorrow pining;
Nursing a secret and devouring care,
An uncomplaining anguish still enshrining.
Thine eye's dark tender beam
Still keeps its brightness; but there's something in it
That tells of grief; a sternness in its gleam
Impressive, though it last but for a minute.
Thy white and open brow
No frown contracts; but a dark shade is clouding
So oft, with deep and sudden gloom, its snow,
And all thy features in its darkness shrouding.
Thy full lip keeps its red,
And smiles, but not so frequently or lightly:
There lurks a curl within its crimson bed,
That says, how vain is all that shines so brightly!
Thy cheek's pale tender rose
Is paler still, yet there is calmness on it;
Yet faded thy once peerless beauty grows:
This change—this blight—what unseen cause has done it?
Oh, say what is thy care;
Unfold to me thy secret grief, my brother;
The grief I cannot cure, oh, let me share,
Nor longer in thy breast thine anguish smother.
Say not that thou art blest,
So plainly by my eyes thy grief is seen,
In all the changes of thy face confest,
And in thy hurried step and reckless mien.
But if thy sister ne'er
Must share the sorrows of thy lot, my brother;
Thou hast her every sigh, her every tear:
Her thoughts shall ne'er be given to another. THYRA.

THE ESSAYIST.

GRACE.

A CELEBRATED poet, speaking of the mother of mankind, says,

"Grace was in all her steps, heav'n in her eye,
"In ev'ry gesture dignity and love."

This is a pleasing couplet, but not so precise as we could wish it to have been, and that was our opinion before an Italian critic censured it as too general and indefinite. In other parts of the Paradise Lost, Eve is mentioned in terms equally indistinct. Milton was certainly capable of giving an interesting detail of the beauties and perfections of that primeval lady; but he was content with the substitution of a loose sketch for a complete portraiture.

As the bard did not define what he meant by grace, let us endeavour to explain it. But here a difficulty arises: grace, like wit, is quickly perceived, though it is not easily analysed or described. It appears to be founded on a sense of decorum and of fitness; it is neither affectation nor excess, neither a deficiency nor a redundancy of action; it is a moderation of manner and a calmness of gesture—a propriety of movement and an elegance of attitude. It may be said, indeed, that grace consists in that due medium which common sense might be expected to point out: for "extremes in nothing can be good."

When a want of grace arises from bashfulness, the individual is more to be pitied than censured. Bashful men are sometimes considered as mere fools; but this is a harsh stigma, which none but an impudent fool would apply to them; for their awkwardness is produced by temporary confusion, rather than by a dullness of comprehension. Their good sense is almost paralysed by an exposure to the eyes of numerous observers, so that they lose that composure, which the native dignity of every man, or woman, ought to preserve. This sheepishness—as it is contemptuously called—is generally shaken off by adults; but we know several instances in which it has adhered to very sensitive individuals for their lives. Such persons cannot be expected to be graceful in the social circle, because their repugnance to general notice obstructs the ease of their movements.

There are many men of undoubted sense who are equally awkward and ungraceful with the timid or the bashful. Dr. Johnson, for instance, exhibited the manners of a clown rather than those of a gentleman, not from embarrassment or confusion, but from considering an attention to the graces as an unnecessary accomplishment for a scholar or a philosopher. His friend Goldsmith likewise, although he could write with graceful ease, was awkward in his attitudes and unpublishable in his address. Charles Fox was an ungraceful speaker, and his rival Pitt—like Pope's friend, Dr. Arbuthnot—had a shambling gait, though, in the exercise of oratory, he used his hands and arms with grace and effect.

Grace is so far native to many, that it seems to come without being bidden—to show itself without an effort; while others retain their awkwardness to the last moment of life, not from being absolutely unable to shake it off, but because they are unwilling to take that trouble. So attractive is the former quality, that even beauty, without such an accompaniment, loses a considerable part of its influence. The ingenious framers of the heathen mythology evidently entertained that opinion, when they represented Venus as attended by the three graces. The late earl of Chesterfield went too far, when he said that Miverna ought also to have three, as wisdom or learning, without such companions, had few attractions. He did not consider that learning, from its weight and solidity, does not so much require adventitious ornaments as the mere charms of persons, however striking, may be supposed to do. Beauty is a light toy and a gewgaw, while mental qualities and intellectual improvement bear the marks of substantial dignity.

Good breeding and politeness may exist without grace; but it must be allowed that their effect is enhanced by its presence. Good breeding has been defined to be the result of much good sense, some good nature, and a little self-denial for the sake of others, with a view to obtain from them a similar indulgence. It is evident that this character may be maintained without the grace or elegance of external demeanour; yet no one will deny that a gracefulness of air and appearance will strengthen the impression of good breeding. Sir Francis Bacon says, that a pleasing countenance and a good figure are perpetual letters of recommendation; and the same remark is applicable to grace, though it may not be safe, in either case, to consider these appearances as the certain indications of a correct or well constituted mind.

The earl of Chesterfield says, that a man's fortune is frequently decided for ever by his first address. If it be pleasing, people are hurried involuntarily into a persuasion that he has merit, which perhaps he will not in the sequel be found to have; and, on the other hand, if it be ungraceful, they are immediately prejudiced against him, and unwilling to allow him the merit which he probably possesses. We are aware that no person of sound judgment will draw positive conclusions, either in one way or the other, from such indecisive symptoms; yet these early impressions leave, in the minds of many, an influence which cannot easily be shaken off. We have here confined our observations to the graces of personal demeanour and deportment; but there are graces in the fine arts and in literary composition, which are equally entitled to notice.

NATIONAL PRIDE.

National pride must not be confounded with patriotism; for the former is commonly founded on imaginary advantages, and consists in having a good opinion of ourselves, and contempt for others.

Thus, there are certain families at Rome, who believe that they are descended in a direct line from the Trojans, and are persuaded that they would render themselves unworthy of their illustrious race, if they attended any of the public fetes, except in a carriage; those who are not rich enough to keep one, half starve themselves to accomplish this end; and it has even happened, when it cannot be obtained, that parents have dressed out their daughter like a lady of high distinction, and the mother walked behind her as a waiting-maid, the father as a footman.

Let a Christian ask a Turkish sultan why he suddenly promotes one of his gardeners to be a governor of a province, or a general in his army; he will answer, "Knowest thou not, Christian dog, that to be fit for every thing, it is only requisite to be a Turk?"

It was once told to a man who sold oranges in Murcia, that a German prince was in love with his daughter. "Do you think, then," said he, "that I would ever bestow her on one who was not a Spaniard?"

Who is there who does not recollect having read, in a history of voyages and travels, an adventure that befell father Labat, on his reception at the court of Abyssinia? Scarcely had he begun his oration to the king, when twenty or thirty of the greatest men began to cudgel him well, in order to give him an idea of the strength and courage of their nation. It may be well imagined that the reverend father was not slow in declaring the Abyssinians the bravest people in the world, and they then studied who should behave to him with the greatest politeness.

It is highly interesting to observe what pride a mountaineer takes in his country. Mr. Coxe, travelling near Munster, was requested by a peasant to inform him what he thought of his country; and pointing to the mountains, exclaimed, "Behold our walls and bulwarks; even Constantinople is not so strongly fortified!" And I never reflect but with pleasure, on the satisfaction with which a farmer, residing in one of the cliffs near Ffestiniog, replied to my assertion that England was the finest and best country in the world; "Ah! but you have no mountains, sir; you've got no mountains!"

On the summit of the Pichincha, Don George Juan and Don Antonio de Ulloa placed themselves, for the purpose of making astronomical observations. The Pichincha is not so elevated as the Cotopaxi; but the view from it is, perhaps, more magnificent. After enjoying the prospect for some time, they saw lightning issue from the clouds beneath, and heard the thunder rolling, in wild volumes, at their feet. The sky above was of a clear azure. The spot where they stood was a vast accumulation of ice and snow. The cold was intense; and the mountain itself seemed to stand, as it were, insulated in the midst of a vast ocean. This scene, sublime as it was, derived additional sublimity from the sound of enormous fragments of rocks which, at intervals, fell into the gulfs beneath. The natives of these regions believe them to surpass every country under heaven. The Sicilian peasants, in the same manner, have such an affection for Etna, that they believe Sicily would not be habitable without it. "It keeps us warm in winter," say they, "and furnishes us with ice in summer."

ANECDOTES OF ARTISTS.

WARE.

A THIN sickly little boy was amusing himself, one morning, by drawing, with a piece of chalk, the street-front of Whitehall, upon the basement-stones of the building itself, carrying his delineations as high as his little arms could reach; and this he was accomplishing by occasionally running into the middle of the street to look up at the noble edifice, and then returning to the base of the building to proceed with his elevation. It happened that his operations caught the eye of a gentleman of considerable taste and fortune, as he was riding by. He checked the carriage, and, after a few minutes observation, called to the boy to come to him; who, upon being asked where he lived, immediately burst into tears, and begged of the gentleman not to tell his master, assuring him he would wipe it all off. "Don't be alarmed," answered the gentleman, at the same time throwing him a shilling, to convince him he intended him no harm. His benefactor then went instantly to his master, who gave the boy an excellent character, at the same time declaring him to be of little use to him, in consequence of his natural bodily weakness. He said that he was fully aware of his fondness for chalking, and showed his visiter what a state his walls were in, from the young artist having drawn the portico of St. Martin's church in various places upon them. The gentleman purchased the remainder of the boy's time, gave him an excellent education, then sent him to Italy, and, upon his return, employed him, and introduced him as an architect.

BANKS AND MULREADY.

"The former artist was visited," says Mr. Smith, "by a youth who wished, at the age of thirteen years, to gain admittance to draw in the Royal Academy. 'Well, my little man,' said Mr. Banks, 'what is your business with me?' 'I want, sir, that you should get me to draw at the Royal Academy.' 'That is not in my power. Things are not, in that respect, as they used to be. Nobody is admitted to draw there but by ballot; and I am only one of the persons upon whose pleasure it depends. But what have you got there? Let me look at your drawing.' Mr. Banks looked at it. 'Humph! Ay! Time enough yet, my little man! Do you go to school?' 'Yes, sir.' 'Well, go home, and mind your schooling; and try and make a better drawing of the Apollo; and in a month you may come again, and let me see it.'

"He now applied with threefold diligence; thought and thought again, sketched and obliterated; and, at last, as nearly as possible at the expiration of the month, repeated his visit. Mr. Banks was better pleased with his second specimen. He now took him into his study, bade him look about him, and asked him what he thought of one thing and another. He encouraged him, told him to go on with his drawing, and said he might come again in a week. Under the eye of Mr. Banks, the boy's proficiency was visible, and the artist began to conceive a kindness for him. Little did he think, when he was questioning this youth, that nature had enriched him with some of her choicest gifts, and that the Royal Academy would, in him, have to boast of one of its brightest members, in the name of Mulready."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

TROPICAL SUN-SETS.

A SETTING sun between the tropics is certainly one of the finest objects in nature. The splendour of the scene generally commences about twenty minutes before sun-set, when the feathery, fantastic, and singularly crystallized clouds in the higher regions of the atmosphere become fully illumined by the sun's rays; and the fine mackerel-shaped clouds, common in these regions, are seen hanging in the concave of heaven like fleeces of burnished gold. When the sun approaches the verge of the horizon, he is frequently seen encircled by a halo of splendour, which continues increasing till it covers a large space of the heavens: it then begins apparently to shoot out from the body of the sun, in refulgent pencils or radii, each as large as a rainbow, exhibiting, according to the rarity or density of the atmosphere, a display of brilliant or delicate tints, and of ever-changing lights and shades of the most amazing beauty and variety. About twenty minutes after sun-set, these splendid shooting rays disappear, and are succeeded by a fine rich glow in the heavens, in which you might easily fancy that you see land rising out of the ocean, stretching itself before you, and on every side, in the most enchanting perspective, and having the glowing lustre of a bar of iron when newly withdrawn from the forge.

AURORA BOREALIS, IN RUSSIA.

The northern hemisphere has its delights as well as the southern. One of these arises from the contemplation of the phenomenon called the Aurora Borealis, or northern lights. Such a phenomenon is of frequent occurrence at Petersburg. At the close of last autumn, the northern lights appeared, on one occasion, magnificently bright. The sky was illuminated from the horizon to the zenith, extending east and west to a considerable distance. Masses of fire, in the form of columns, and as brilliant as the brightest phosphorus, danced in the air, and streaks of a deeper light, of various sizes, rose from the horizon, and flashed between them. The brightness of the former seemed at times to grow faint and dim. At this juncture, the broad streaks would suddenly shoot with great velocity up to the zenith with an undulating motion and a pyramidal form. From the columns, flashes of light, like a succession of sparks from an electric jar, flew off and disappeared; while the streaks changed their form frequently and rapidly, and broke out in places where none were seen before, shooting along the heavens, and then disappearing in an instant. The sky in various places became tinged with a deep purple, the stars shone very brilliantly, the separate lights gradually merged into one another, when the auroral splendence of the horizon increased and became magnificent. This curious phenomenon lasted nearly four hours; and at one time a large triangle of the strongest light occupied the horizon, illuminating, in the most magnificent manner, nearly the entire vault of heaven. From six to seven falling stars were observed at the time, leaving in their train a very brilliant light.

A COUNTRY VILLA.

At about six leagues distance from Paris, at the corner of a cross-road, an elegant iron gate discovers a house of simple and tasteful appearance; it seemed to be inhabited, for a woman who perceived us invited us to walk in, as it might give us pleasure to look at the gardens.

Grass plots kept in that order which gave to them the softness and appearance of velvet, walks planted with trees, and tufted arbours, excited our attention and admiration. A peculiar taste reigned through the whole distribution of the garden; it was not one of those flower-gardens in which are found a river without water, a Chinese bridge without any use, and a belvedere without a prospect; nothing here offended against truth; and many an English nobleman could desire nothing better than this charming domain in the environs of Paris.

Who could be the owner, whose skill laid out the plan of these gardens? Was he some courtier, disgraced amidst the torturing fluctuations of politics, who now found leisure to devote himself to the pleasurable labours of rural life? Here we could trace a poet, a philosopher, a lover of nature—if a possession like this could be the lot of them, for they are in general proverbially poor. Whoever he might be, his imagination was rich and exalted, his taste exquisite, appreciating justly the beauties of nature.

As we were making these remarks to each other, we met at the corner of one of the walks, the female who had asked us in; she soon satisfied our curiosity; "You are at Brunoy," said she; "this property belonged to M. Talma, in whose service I have lived twelve years."

At this name we felt a sentiment of admiration kindle in our minds. Every object around us seemed animated, and we were desirous of going again through those shady walks where the genius of this great tragedian had, no doubt, received inspiration; after his memory had made the expressions of human passions his own, it was here he clothed them in that accent which proceeds from a soul impressed with the keenest sensibility; under these trees he had studied that Roman grandeur he so well personated on the stage, the cares of royalty, the terrors of guilt, and those mournful and striking agitations, of which he has so often presented a faithful picture to an admiring audience.

I hastened on, before my fellow-travellers, and alone, I wandered through an alley, into which the thickness of the foliage prevented the rays of the sun from penetrating; it seemed to me as if the shades of the illustrious personages whom Talma had so often invoked, hovered round me. Full of these reveries, I perceived not that my friends were so near me; a lady patting me on the shoulder, caused all these phantoms of imagination to vanish, with which I had peopled the gardens of Brunoy.

Our guide gave us some details concerning her former master; she spoke of him with interest, and with a tenderness which excited our emotions. A tear stood in her eye when she related the manner of his death. There is no funeral oration that can be half so valuable as a simple eulogium from the lips of a faithful servant, and we felt assured that he must have been a good master whose loss can inspire such artless expressions of regret.

"He was unsuspecting and benevolent," said she; "he would very often come and talk with us; and when we were at dinner, if he liked what we had, he would sit down with us. He would often repeat to us 'You are very happy; you can eat when you are hungry: as for us, we lose all our appetite while a great dinner is getting ready.' Ah! his kindness of heart was inexhaustible! He had purchased a house to join to his park, and there he put in the old nurses of his children; he next placed there one of his friends: he was good to every creature in the village; think, then, if he was not beloved!"

We expressed a wish to see the apartments. "You will find nothing particular there," said she; "M. Talma was not fond of luxury and show; he always said it was enough for a country-house to have a good garden, good wine, and a good bed, and not any thing more. You will not find here any of those superfluities which people in town declare they cannot do without, and which they drag along with them into the country."

She spoke of his usual habits. He kept very little company; he was fond of solitude, and often, when his drawing-room was encumbered with a crowd of visitors, he would steal away, to go and walk in one of those allees which he had caused to be made with so much care.

Poor Talma! he died at the moment when he had just put the last finish to that property which he had occupied for many years.

CONGRESSIONAL ANECDOTE.

During Mr. Jefferson's administration, syrup was provided in the capital for the refreshment of the members of congress. This was furnished and charged under the head of stationary. The National Intelligencer tells us, that a member who did not like the beverage, jocosely remarked, that he should be very glad if the officers of the house would provide a little whiskey for those who preferred it, and charge it to the account of fuel.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Polar Expedition.—We believe but one feeling will pervade the great body of reflecting and enlightened people, and that will be of deep chagrin and disappointment, when they learn that the contemplated expedition to the southern and western oceans is defeated. Congress have refused their final assent to the measure, notwithstanding all the preliminary steps had been taken, and all the necessary arrangements made by the government and its agents, in pursuance of a law of the last session for imparting to it the fullest effect and efficacy. It is difficult to comprehend the real motives for this sudden and unexpected change of purpose, this instability of views, on the part of the national representatives. The stale plea, we believe, for the destruction of a project at once so honourable to the nation, and so promising in important results, was the necessity of adhering to a system of close retrenchment and strict economy. But we are utterly at a loss to conceive the cause of that pressing necessity. With a rich commerce, abundant and powerful means, and the national debt so much reduced in its amount as to be undeserving of a moment's anxiety or solicitude, we confess ourselves incapable of perceiving any substantial grounds or rational arguments that can be offered in its justification. Indeed it strikes us as being absolutely derogatory. The plan of the expedition was evidently conceived in profound wisdom, and with a single eye to the promotion and preservation of great and valuable interests. Our trade to those seas has long been of such magnitude and value as not merely to authorize, but actually to require, that this scheme should be carried into prompt and vigorous execution. The honour, not less than the prosperity of the country demanded its fulfilment. The national sentiment was strong in its favour; and our pride of character seemed committed in the undertaking. It was, moreover, recommended by a regard to economy itself, since the trade to those seas is not only large, but annually increasing. The dangers incident to navigating them is made to appear most perilous, when it is known that more than two hundred islands and shoals, some of them very dangerous, have been discovered by navigators, not one of which can be found in any chart. Surely here were inducements sufficiently strong to urge the accomplishment of the course so wisely planned. But, to the humiliation of the public, and, as we think, to the utter disgrace of many of our representatives, the whole is frustrated, and will, we presume, be consigned over to ruin and forgetfulness. The authors of the folly merit unreserved scorn and reprobation.

A Circular.—A few days since, we received, through the medium of the post-office, a printed circular, which, on examining, we found to contain the remarks published in the Mirror week before last, on the subject of uniting Broadway with the Fourth Avenue. It is gratifying to find that other individuals view this matter in so favourable a light, and it serves to impress us still more strongly with the belief that the opinions we have, on various occasions, expressed concerning it, are founded in propriety and justice. Whatever may be the final decision of the common council touching this interesting subject, we beg it may be borne in mind, that the motives by which we have been governed in freely expressing our sentiments, have been of the purest kind, for we have not a farthing's worth of property to be affected by it in any shape.

Clinton-Hall Association.—We learn, from the Journal of Commerce, that ten thousand dollars have been recently subscribed by merchants of this city, to the Clinton-Hall Association, in addition to the sum of twenty thousand collected last year. If, therefore, says the paper above quoted, the proprietors of the Atheneum, as has been proposed, unite with this association in erecting an edifice for both institutions, and appropriate twenty-five thousand dollars on their part, a fund of fifty-five thousand dollars is already secured. To pay for the lots and erect a building of sufficient magnitude for the purposes intended, a still larger sum is required; and we earnestly hope that our liberal merchants will not relax their efforts till the full amount is raised which shall be necessary to carry this noble object into effect.

Mr. Woodworth.—On Wednesday evening next, this gentleman will take a benefit at the Park theatre, on which occasion the opera of the "Forest Rose" will be presented, with a variety of other entertainments. Tickets of admission may be obtained of Mr. W. at his residence, 636 Pearl-st.

WHAT CAN A POOR MAIDEN DO?

HUMOROUSLY.

Were it not for these men we should not do a-miss, Nor pa-pas nor mam-mas dis-e-bey; But, a-las! when with sighs they demand but a kiss, Why, what can a poor maiden say? She cries no, then cries hush, then looks down with a blush, While he swears to his vows he'll be true; And with one by your side who will not be de-nied, Why, what can a poor maiden do? She cries no, then cries hush, then looks down with a blush; Why, what can a poor maiden do? Why, what can a poor maiden do? Why what, why what can a poor maiden do?

While they guess there's a heart pleading for them within,
'Tis in vain that our lips say them nay;
But, alas! if they once are determined to win,

Why, what can a poor maiden say?
She cries no, with a blush; he persists, she cries hush;
If she fly, still the lovers pursue:

Though these men we may fear, yet without them, oh dear!
Why, what can a poor maiden do?
Why, what can a poor maiden do?

FAMILIARITY.

OLD Nick, who taught the village school,
Had wed a maid of homespun habit:
He was stubborn as a mule,
And she was playful as a rabbit.

Poor Jane had scarce become a wife,
Before her husband sought to make her
The very pink of polished life,
And trim and formal as a quaker.

One day the master went abroad,
And sadly simple Jenny missed him;
When he returned, behind her lord
She gently stole, and fondly kissed him!

The husband's anger rose—and red
And white his face alternate grew;
"Less freedom, ma'am!" Jane hung her head,
And said, "I didn't know 'twas you!"

A BALLAD.

The lady's cheek is very pale,
The lady's eye is dim;
It rests upon the distant sail,
Though not, alas! on him
Whose honeyed words and ardent phrase
Had won her youthful heart,
Ere sadder years and darker days
Had caused those tears to start.

She thinks on times that long have fled,
On hours of rapture past;
When love his sunlight on her shed,
And guarded from the blast.
Her thoughts are on his treacherous face,
And on his eye of jet;
As if she vainly hoped to trace
Those features cherished yet.

And memory paints the moonlight bower,
Where first he told his love;
The scene where rose, and fragrant flower,
And stars that watched above,
Bore witness to the mutual vow,
And to the blushing kiss,
And to the gentle words so low—
They murmured only bliss.

But where are now her hopes so gay?
And where, oh where is he?
Like rainbow tints, they've passed away,
And he is on the sea.
The bark that bears him from the land,
The sails that waft him o'er,
Are destined for a distant strand,
And for a foreign shore.

The lady weeps—she turns away—
She may not mark again
That vessel cleave the parting spray,
Or catch her lover's strain.
And she has sought her silent bower;
How lonely now it seems!
For gone for aye the favourite flower,
And perished her young dreams.

STANZAS.

My weary heart!—Joy, wake again,
Within its deep and still recess,
The thrill which thy delusive strain
Can pour upon its loneliness!
Wake there the throb of young delight—
The holy extacies, which dwell,
Lit by the spirit's golden light,
Gems of the soul's young treasure-cell.

Give me the dreams which once could bless
The glory of life's morning hours;
And make this dreary wilderness
Once more a thoroughfare of flowers;

When but the sense of life and air
Shed in the soul a heavenly ray,
Ere the "snow-cloud of cold despair"
Had gathered o'er my lonely way!

My weary heart!—how on its shrine
Fate's dim and faded offerings lie;
Prompting the spirit to repine,
While all its aching chords reply!
How many hopes have stirred its strings!—
Ambition—love—oh! what are they?
Gone—with earth's many-withered things,
As the stars sink in gloom away!

Now, as I gaze upon the gloom
Of early life's untroubled sky,
I feel a pang that passeth show,
Touching my heart; and in mine eye,
Tears, like the drops of April-cloud,
A freshening influence seem to shed
Upon that warm and sweet domain,
O'er which time's murmuring wave hath sped.

False dreams! they ne'er will bless again!

EDWARD COATE PINKNEY.

"And they laid him in the earth, and pressed the green turf down upon his manly beauty, and the enemies of the living came together and wept over the dead."

"He was not of your order."

And let them weep—and let them mourn—
Weep till the lava-drop appears;
Weep till their tears to blood shall turn—
Weep till their blood shall turn to tears!

And let them mourn—mourn till the hue
Of grief shall tincture every vein;
Mourn till her sad, wild spectral crew
Permit joy's torch to blaze again!

Mourn till the brow of manhood wears
The brilliance of its early day;
Mourn till the heart of manhood bears
Its first, last smile—its childhood ray!

Mourn till the mind of boyhood can Feel, as in after years it must,
The cares that mark the life of man—
The spirit's blight—the feeling's rust!

What boots it? Him ye mourn is dead;
His flight is far beyond your ken;
In life he did not with you tread—
In death profane him not, ye men!

His spirit's plume was wild and free—
The eagle creeps not, may not bend
From his high flaming destiny,
To call each butterfly his friend.

The nightingale may fail to charm
With her sweet strain the tough-eared bat;
But fine-strung hearts will feel, and burn
With joy no less, because of that.

Then peace to Pinkney!—traces still
Of his bright track move on to fame:
Some gems, whose brilliancy doth fill
The mind with light, adorn his name.

IMPROMPTU,

ON BEING PRESENTED, BY A LADY, WITH A SMALL STONE HEART.

Take back, dear girl, this cold return,
For passion warm and true as mine:
A heart of stone, from thee, I spurn,
For heart so cold can ne'er be heart of thine.

AMELIA.

—“I WAS not quite thirty,” said Wieland to us, “when I obtained the chair of philosophical professor in this college in the most flattering manner. I need not tell you my amour propre was gratified by a distinction rare enough at my age. I certainly had worked for it formerly; but at the moment it came to me, another species of philosophy occupied me much more deeply, and I would have given more to know what passed in one heart, than to have had power to analyze those of all mankind. I was passionately in love; and you all know, I hope, that when love takes possession of a young head, adieu to every thing else; there is no room for any other thought. My table was covered with folios of all colours, quires of paper of all sizes, journals of all species, catalogues of books, in short, of all that one finds on a professor's table; but of the whole circle of science I had for some time studied only the article rose, whether in the Encyclopedia, the botanical books, or all the gardener's calendars that I could meet with. You shall learn presently what led me to this study, and why it was that my window was always open, even during the coldest days. All this was connected with the passion by which I was possessed, and which was become my sole and continual thought. I could not well say at this moment how my lectures and courses got on, but this I know, that more than once I have said, ‘Amelia,’ instead of ‘philosophy.’

“It was the name of my beauty—in fact, of the beauty of the university, Mademoiselle de Belmont. Her father, a distinguished officer, had died on the field of battle. She occupied with her mother a large and handsome house in the street in which I lived, on the same side, and a few doors distant. This mother, wise and prudent, obliged by circumstances to inhabit a city filled with young students from all parts, and having so charming a daughter, never suffered her a moment from her sight, either in or out of doors. But the good lady passionately loved company and cards; and to reconcile her tastes with her duties, she carried Amelia with her to all the assemblies of dowagers, professors' wives, canonesses, &c. where the poor girl ennuied herself to death with hemming or knitting beside her mother's card-table. But you ought to have been informed, that no student, indeed no man under fifty, was admitted. I had then but little chance of conveying my sentiments to Amelia. I am sure, however, that any other than myself would have discovered this chance; but I was a perfect novice in gallantry; and, until the moment when I imbibed this passion from Amelia's beautiful dark eyes, mine, having been always fixed upon volumes of Latin, Greek, Hebrew, Chaldaic, &c. &c. understood nothing at all of the language of the heart. It was at an old lady's, to whom I was introduced, that I became acquainted with Amelia; my destiny led me to her house on the evening of her assembly; she received me—I saw Mademoiselle de Belmont, and from that instant her image was engraved in lines of fire on my heart. The mother frowned at the sight of a well-looking young man; but my timid, grave, and perhaps somewhat pedantic air, reassured her. There were a few other young persons—daughter and nieces of the lady of the mansion. It was summer—they obtained permission to walk in the garden, under the windows of the saloon, and the eyes of their mammas. I followed them; and, without daring to address a word to my fair one, caught each that fell from her lips.

“‘Amelia,’ said a pretty little laughing espigle, ‘how many of your favourites are condemned to death this winter?’ ‘Not one,’ replied she; ‘I renounce them—their education is too troublesome and too ungrateful a task, and I begin to think I know nothing about it.’

“I assumed sufficient resolution to ask the explanation of this question and answer; she gave it to me. ‘You have just learned that I am passionately fond of roses; it is an hereditary taste; my mother is still fonder of them than I am. Since I was able to think of any thing, I have had the greatest wish to offer her a rose-tree in blow—as a new year's gift—the first of January. I have never succeeded. Every year I have put a quantity of rose-trees into vases; the greater number perished; and I have never been able to offer one rose to my mother.’ So little did I know of the culture of flowers, as to be perfectly ignorant that it was possible to have roses in winter; but from the moment I understood that it might be, without a miracle, and that incessant attention only was necessary, I promised myself, that this year, the first of January, should not pass without Amelia's offering her mother a rose-tree in blow. We returned to the saloon—so close was I on the watch, that I heard her ask my name in a whisper. Her companions answered, ‘I know him only by reputation; they say he is an author; and so learned, that he is already a professor.’ ‘I should never have guessed it,’ said Amelia; ‘he seems neither vain nor pedantic.’ How thankful was I for this reputation! Next morning I went to a gardener, and ordered fifty rose-trees of different months to be put in vases. ‘It must be singular ill fortune,’ thought I, ‘if, among this number, one at least does not flower.’ On leaving the gardener, I went to my bookseller's—purchased some works on flowers, and returned home full of hope. I intended to accompany my rose-tree with a fine letter, in which I should request to be permitted to visit Madame de Belmont, in order to teach her daughter the art of having roses in winter; the agreeable lesson, and the charming scholar, were to me much pleasanter themes than those of my philosophical lectures. I built on all this the prettiest romance possible; my milk-pail had not yet got on so far as Parrette's, she held it on her head; and my rose was not yet transplanted into its vase, but I saw it all in blow. In the meantime, I was happy only in imagination; I no longer saw Amelia; they ceased to invite me to the dowager parties, and she was not allowed to mix in those of young people. I must then be restricted, until my introducer was in a state of presentation, to seeing her every evening pass by with her mother, as they went to their parties. Happily for me, Madame de Belmont was such a coward in a carriage, that she preferred walking when it was possible. I knew the hour at which they were in the habit of leaving home; I learned to distinguish the sound of the bell of their gate from that of all the others of the quarter; my window, on the ground floor was always open; at the moment I heard their gate unclose, I snatched up some volume, which was often turned upside down, stationed myself at the window, as if profoundly occupied with my study, and thus, almost every day, saw for an instant the lovely girl, and this instant was sufficient to attach me to her still more deeply. The elegant simplicity of her dress; her rich, dark hair wreathed round her head, and falling in ringlets on her forehead; her slight and graceful figure; her step at once light and commanding; the fairy foot that the care of guarding the snowy robe rendered visible, inflamed my admiration; while her dignified and composed manner, her attention to her mother, and the affability with which she saluted her inferiors, touched my heart yet more. I began, too, to fancy, that, limited as were my opportunities of attracting her notice, I was not entirely indifferent to her. For example, on leaving home, she usually crossed to the opposite side of the street; for, had she passed close to my windows, she guessed that, intently occupied as I chose to appear, I could not well raise my eyes from my book; then, as she came near my house, there was always something to say, in rather a louder tone, as, ‘Take care, mamma; lean heavier on me; do you feel cold?’ I then raised my eyes, looked at her, saluted her, and generally encountered the transient glance of my divinity, who, with a blush, lowered her eyes, and returned my salute. The mother, all enveloped in cloaks and hoods, saw nothing. I saw every thing—and surrendered my heart. A slight circumstance augmented my hopes. I had published ‘An Abridgment of Practical Philosophy.’ It was an extract from my course of lectures—was successful, and the edition was sold. My bookseller, aware that I had some copies remaining, came to beg one for a customer of his, who was extremely anxious to get it; and he named Mademoiselle Amelia de Belmont. I actually blushed with pleasure; to conceal my embarrassment, I laughingly inquired, what could a girl of her age want with so serious a work? ‘To read it, sir—doubtless,’ replied the bookseller. ‘Mademoiselle Amelia does not resemble the generality of young ladies; she prefers useful to amusing books.’ He then mentioned the names of several that he had lately sent to her; and they gave me a high opinion of her taste. ‘From her impatience for your book,’ added he, ‘I can answer for it, that it will be perused with great pleasure; more than ten messages have been sent; at last, I promised it for to-morrow, and I beg of you to enable me to keep my word.’ I thrilled with joy, as I gave him the volumes, at the idea that Amelia would read and approve of my sentiments, and that she would learn to know me.

“October arrived, and with it my fifty vases of rose-trees; for which, of course, they made me pay what they chose; and I was as delighted to count them in my room, as a miser would his sacks of gold. They all looked rather languishing, but then it was because they had not yet reconciled themselves to the new earth. I read all that was ever written on the culture of roses, with much more attention than I had formerly read my old philosophers; and I ended as wise as I began.

“The death of the greater number of my cleves, however, soon lightened my labour; more than half of them never struck root: I flung them into the fire. A fourth part of those that remained, after unfolding some little leaves, stopped there. Thus withered my hopes; and the more care I took of my invalids—the more I hawked them from window to window, the worse they grew. At last, one of them, and but one, promised to reward my trouble—thickly covered with leaves, it formed a handsome bush, from the middle of which sprang out a fine, vigorous branch, crowned with six beautiful buds that got no collar—grew, enlarged, and even discovered, through their calices, a slight rose tint.

"On the twenty-seventh of November, a day which I can never forget, the sun rose in all its brilliance; I thanked my stars, and hastened to place my rose-tree, and such of its companions as yet survived, on a peristyle in the court. I then dined, drank to the health of my rose, and returned to take my station in my window, with a quicker throbbing of the heart.

"Amelia's mother had been slightly indisposed; for eight days she had not left the house, and, consequently, I had not seen my fair one. On the first morning I had observed the physician going in; uneasy for her, I contrived to cross his way, questioned him, and was comforted. I afterwards learned that the old lady had recovered, and was to make her appearance abroad on this day, at a grand gala given by a baroness, who lived at the end of the street. I was then certain to see Amelia pass by, and eight days of privation had enhanced that thought; I am sure Madame de Belmont did not look to this party with as much impatience as I did. She was always one of the first—it had scarcely struck five, when I heard the bell of her gate. I took up a book—there was I at my post, and presently I saw Amelia appear, dazzling with dress and beauty, as she gave her arm to her mother; never yet had the brilliancy of her figure so struck me: this time there was no occasion for her to speak to catch my eyes; they were fixed on her, but hers were bent down; however, she guessed that I was there, for she passed slowly to prolong my happiness. I followed her with my gaze, until she entered the house; then only she turned her head for a second; the door was shut, and she disappeared, but remained present to my heart. I could neither close my window nor cease to look at the baroness's hotel, as if I could see Amelia through the walls; I remained there till all objects were fading into obscurity. The approach of night, and the frostiness of the air, brought to my recollection that the rose-tree was still on the peristyle; never had it been so precious to me; I hastened to it; and scarcely was I in the anti-chamber, when I heard a singular noise, like that of an animal browsing, and tinkling its bells. I trembled, I flew, and I had the grief to find a sheep quietly fixed beside my rose-trees, of which it was making its evening repast with no slight avidity.

"I caught up the first thing in my way; it was a heavy cane. I wished to drive away the gluttonous beast; alas! it was too late; he had just bitten off the beautiful branch of buds; he swallowed them one after another; and, in spite of the gloom, I could see, half out of his mouth, the finest of them all, which, in a moment, was champed like the rest. I was neither ill-tempered nor violent; but at this sight I was no longer master of myself. Without well knowing what I did, I discharged a blow of my cane on the animal, and stretched it at my feet. No sooner did I perceive it motionless, than I repented of having killed a creature unconscious of the mischief it had done; was this worthy of the professor of philosophy, the adorer of the gentle Amelia? But thus to eat up my rose-tree, my only hope to get admittance to her! When I thought on its annihilation, I could not consider myself so culpable. However, the night darkened; I heard the old servant crossing the lower passage, and I called her. 'Catherine,' said I, 'bring your light; there is mischief here. You left the stable door open—that of the court was also unclosed—one of your sheep has been browsing on my rose-trees, and I have punished it.'

"She soon came in with the lantern in her hand. 'It is not one of our sheep,' said she; 'I have just come from them, the stable-gate is shut, and they are all within. Oh, blessed saints! blessed saints! what do I see!' exclaimed she when near; 'it is the pet sheep of our neighbour Mademoiselle Amelia de Belmont. Poor Robin! what bad luck brought you here? Oh! how sorry she will be!' I nearly dropped down beside Robin. 'Of Mademoiselle Amelia?' said I, in a trembling voice; 'has she actually a sheep?' 'Oh! no, she has none at this moment—but that which lies there: she loved it as herself—see the collar that she worked for it with her own hands.' I bent to look at it. It was of red leather, ornamented with little bells; and she had embroidered on it in gold thread—'Robin belongs to Amelia de Belmont; she loves him, and begs that he may be restored to her.' 'What will she think of the barbarian who killed him in a fit of passion; the vice that she most detests? She is right, it has been fatal to him. Yet if he should be only stunned by the blow: Catherine! run, ask for some ather, or eau de vie, or hartshorn—run, Catherine, run.'

"Catherine set off: I tried to make it open its mouth; my rose-bud was still between its hermetically-sealed teeth; perhaps the collar pressed it; in fact the throat was swelled. I got it off with difficulty; something fell from it at my feet, which I mechanically took up and put into my pocket without looking at, so much was I absorbed in anxiety for the resuscitation. I rubbed him with all my strength; I grew more and more impatient for the return of Catherine. She came with a small phial in her hand, calling out in her usual manner, 'Here, sir, here's the medicine. I never opened my mouth about it to Mademoiselle Amelia; I pity her enough without that.'

"What is all this, Catherine? where have you seen Mademoiselle Amelia? and what is her affliction, if she does not know of her favourite's death? 'Oh, sir, this is a terrible day for the poor young lady. She was at the end of the street searching for a ring which she had lost, and it was no trifle, but the ring that her father had got as a present from the emperor, and worth, they say, more ducats than I have hairs on my head. Her mother lent it to her to-day for the party; she has lost it, she knows neither how nor where, and never missed it till she drew off her glove at supper. And, poor soul! the glove was on again in a minute, for fear it should be seen that the ring was wanting, and she slipped out to search for it along the street, but she has found nothing.'

"It struck me, that the substance that had fallen from the sheep's collar had the form of a ring—could it possibly be! I looked at it; and judge of my joy, it was Madame de Belmont's ring, and really very beautiful and costly. A secret presentiment whispered to me that this was a better means of presentation than the rose-tree. I pressed the precious ring to my heart, and to my lips; assured myself the sheep was really dead; and, leaving him stretched near the devastated rose-trees, I ran into the street, dismissed those who were seeking in vain, and stationed myself at my door to await the return of my neighbours. I saw from a distance the flambeau that preceded them, quickly distinguished their voices, and comprehended, by them, that Amelia had confessed her misfortune. The mother scolded bitterly, the daughter wept, and said, 'Perhaps it may be found.' 'Oh yes, perhaps,' replied the mother with irritation—'it is too rich a prize for him who finds it; the emperor gave it to your deceased father on the field when he saved his life; he set more value on it than all that he possessed besides, and now you have thus flung it away; but the fault is mine for having trusted you with it. For some time back you have seemed quite bewildered.'

I heard all this as I followed at some paces behind them; they reached home, and I had the cruelty to prolong, for some moments more, Amelia's mortification. I intended that the treasure should procure me the entree of their dwelling, and I waited till they got up stairs. I then had myself announced as the bearer of good news; I was introduced, and respectfully presented the ring to Madame de Belmont; and how delighted seemed Amelia! and how beautifully she brightened in her joy, not alone that the ring was found, but that I was the finder! She cast herself on her mother's bosom, and turning on me her eyes, humid with tears, though beaming with pleasure, she clasped her hands, exclaiming, 'Oh, sir, what obligation, what gratitude do we not owe to you!'

"Ah, Mademoiselle! returned I, 'you know not to whom you address the term gratitude.' 'To one who has conferred on me a great pleasure,' said she. 'To one who has caused you a serious pain—to the killer of Robin.'

"You, sir?—I cannot credit it—why should you do so? you are not so cruel.'

"No, but I am so unfortunate. It was in opening his collar, which I have also brought to you, that your ring fell on the ground. You promised a great recompense to him who should find it; I dare to solicit that recompense; grant me my pardon for Robin's death.'

"And I, sir, I thank you for it,' exclaimed the mother; 'I never could endure that animal; it took up Amelia's entire time, and wearied me out of all patience with its bleating; if you had not killed it, heaven knows where it might have carried my diamond. But how did it get entangled in the collar? Amelia, pray explain all this.'

"Amelia's heart was agitated; she was as much grieved that it was I who had killed Robin, as that he was dead. 'Poor Robin,' said she, drying a tear, 'he was too fond of running out; before leaving home, I had put on his collar, that he might not be lost—he had always been brought back to me. The ring must have slipped under his collar. I hastily drew on my glove, and never missed it till I was at supper.'

"What good luck it was that he went straight to this gentleman's! observed the mother.

"Yes—for you,' said Amelia; 'he was cruelly received—was it such a crime, sir, to enter your door?'

"It was night,' I replied; 'I could not distinguish the collar, and I learned, when too late, that the animal belonged to you.'

"Thank heaven, then, you did not know it!' cried the mother, 'or where would have been my ring?'

"It is necessary, at least,' said Amelia with emotion, 'that I should learn how my favourite could have so cruelly chagrined you.'

"Oh, Mademoiselle, he had devoured my hope, my happiness, a superb rose-tree about to blow, that I had been long watching, and intended to present to—to—a person on new-year's day.' Amelia smiled, blushed, extended her lovely hand toward me, and murmured—'All is pardoned.' 'If it had eaten up a rose-tree about to blow, cried out Madame de Belmont, it deserved a thousand deaths. I would give twenty sheep for a rose-tree in blow.' 'And I am much mistaken,' said Amelia, with the sweetest naïveté, 'if this very rose-tree was not intended for you.' 'For me? you have lost your senses, child; I have not the honour of knowing the gentleman.' 'But he knows your fondness for roses; I mentioned it one day before him, the only time I ever met him, at Madame de S's. Is it not true, sir, that my unfortunate favourite had eaten up my mother's rose-tree?' I acknowledged it, and I related the course of education of my fifty rose-trees.

"Madame de Belmont laughed heartily, and said, 'she owed me a double obligation.' 'Mademoiselle

Amelia has given me my recompense for the diamond,' said I to her; 'I claim yours also, madam.' 'Ask, sir.' 'Permission to pay my respects sometimes to you.' 'Granted,' replied she, gayly. I kissed her hand respectfully, that of her daughter tenderly, and withdrew. But I returned next day—and every day. I was received with a kindness that each visit increased. I was looked on as one of the family. It was I who now gave my arm to Madame de Belmont to conduct her to the evening parties; she presented me as her friend, and they were no longer dull to her daughter. New-year's day arrived. I had gone, the evening before, to a sheepfold in the vicinity, to purchase a lamb similar to that I had killed. I collected from the different hot-houses all the flowering rose-trees I could find; the finest of them was for Madame de Belmont; and the roses of the others were wreathed in a garland round the fleecy neck of the lamb. In the evening I went to my neighbours with my presents. 'Robin and the rose-trees are restored to life,' said I, in offering my homage, which was received with sensibility and gratefulness. 'I also should like to give you a new-year's gift, said Madame de Belmont to me, 'if I but knew what you would best like.' 'What I best like—ah, if I only dared to tell you!' 'If it should chance now to be my daughter.' I fell at her feet, and so did Amelia. 'Well,' said the kind parent, 'there then are your new-year's gifts ready found; Amelia gives you her heart, and I give you her hand.' She took the rose-wreath from off the lamb, and twined it round our united hands. And, my Amelia," continued the old professor, as he finished his anecdote, passing an arm round his companion as she sat beside him, "my Amelia is still to my eyes as beautiful, and to my heart as dear, as on the day when our hands were bound together with a chain of flowers."

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

MADAME DE SEVIGNE.

As I am a sort of general reader of polite literature, I have thought it disgraceful not to have read Madame de Sevigne's Letters; those letters so celebrated for their wit, vivacity, originality, and the beauty of their style, and which the reading world had been unanimous in admiring during one hundred and fifty years. But these letters composed nine volumes, closely printed; and, as time was allotted to me only in a definite portion, I was not certain that I might not employ it to greater advantage than in reading nine volumes of letters, even of acknowledged excellence. Years have passed over my head, my stock of time is diminished, and, a month ago, I resolved to give a part of what remained to Madame de Sevigne's Letters. I found in them all I expected, and much that I had not been taught to expect; for they appeared to me as remarkable for the justness and propriety of the serious observations, as for the playfulness of fancy, or the ease and elegance of their style. Of many examples found in support of this fact, I extract the following, though they will suffer from not being read in connexion with the subjects to which they relate:

"It appears to me truly wise to endure the tempest with resignation, and to enjoy the calm when it pleases heaven to restore it to us."

"God knows that I desire nothing more than his will; the futility of wishes should always recall us to this submission."

"Those who are disposed to be patient, and to take comfort, find reasons every where."

"Should we not be just, and place ourselves in the situation of others?"

"Attention to what others say, and the presence of mind by which we quickly comprehend and answer, are principal objects in our intercourse with the world."

"We are more or less affected by great qualities, in proportion as we have more or less relation to them."

"I am still alone, without being dull. I have plenty of books, work, and fine weather; these, with a little reason, go a great way."

"It seems to me that I have been dragged, against my will, to the fatal period when old age must be endured; I see it, I have attained it; and I would, at least, contrive not to go beyond it, not advance in the road of infirmities, pain, loss of memory, disfigurements, which are ready to lay hold of me; and I hear a voice which says, 'You must go on, in spite of yourself; or, if you will not, you must die,' an alternative at which nature recoils. Such, however, is the fate of those who have reached a certain period. But a return to the will of God, and to that universal law which is imposed upon us, restores reason to its place, and makes us call in patience to our aid."

In reading the letters of Madame de Sevigne, I have never, for a moment, lost sight of herself. In Paris, I have associated with her and her friends: at the Rocks, I have walked with her in the woods; in every place, I have been with her when she was writing to her daughter. So strongly did I enter into her feelings, that I wished her to join her daughter, though I should thereby lose her inimitable letters, which I would have doubled in number had it been in my power.

Madame de Sevigne was rich and beautiful, of high birth, and possessing high talents; yet she demands nothing for herself, makes no claims. There is not one line, in her thousand letters, which betrays a consciousness of superiority; on the contrary, she evinces a degree of humility, which might appear questionable, if we did not know her to be totally free from affectation. In principle she is firm; in her intercourse with the world she is conciliating. She considers what is due to others, and frequently sacrifices her own comfort to contribute to theirs. The religion of Madame de Sevigne is submission to God, and her morality is justice, peace, and benevolence. She had a penetration which saw perfectly, a judgment which decided rightly, and a prudence which never went astray.

But Madame de Sevigne, so just, so reasonable, in thought and in action, had one feeling which neither reason nor religion could control; this was her excessive love for her daughter; a love which passed the bounds of maternal love, and for which, as there is no precedent, there is no name. She lived but for her daughter, and she died because she feared her daughter would die.

ASIA MINOR.

There are few spots of earth visited by the traveller calculated to excite emotions more melancholy than those experienced by such as have passed over even the most unfrequented portions of Asia Minor. Except in the immediate vicinity of its cities, he encounters few traces of life or civilization; all beyond is "barren and unprofitable;" his path lies across plains tenanted by the stork and the jackal, or over hills whence the eye wanders along valleys, blooming in all the luxuriousness of neglected nature, or withering in loneliness and sterility. Throughout lands once adorned with the brightest efforts of genius and of art, and rife with the bustle and activity of a crowded population, his footsteps will light upon nothing save the speaking monuments of decay, and his eye meet no living forms except those of his companions, or by chance a dim prospect of the weary caravan, that creeps like a centipede across the plain, or winds amidst the mazes of distant hills. There are few scattered hamlets, and no straggling abodes of mankind; danger and apprehension have forced the remnant of its inhabitants to herd together in towns for mutual security, and to leave the deserted country to the bandit and the beast of prey. The wandering passenger pursues his listless route, surrounded by privations and difficulties, by fatigue and apprehension, few beaten tracks to guide his course, and few hospitable mansions to shelter his weariness. By night he rests beside his camel in the karavanserai, and by day he hurries along, with no comforts save those which he carries with him, and no companions but his thoughts. But these are sufficient, and they spring up with every breath and at every turning: his very loneliness is sublimity; his only prospect, beauty; he reclines upon earth, whose every clod is a sepulchre of greatness, and he is canopied by a sky

"So cloudless, pure, and beautiful,
That God alone is to be seen in heaven."

A Dutchman tells a story of his striking a man with his fist in a bar-room. The blow was so tremendous, that the man who was struck disappeared in an instant, and no trace of him was ever afterwards seen, except a small grease spot on the floor where he had stood!

PRINCIPLES OF DRESS.

In ancient Greece, costume was justly elevated to the rank of a fine art: its principles were defined; its influence on taste, on the arts, on manners, and on morals, was wisely appreciated; and public officers were appointed to prevent the violation of its fundamental laws. In modern times, costume has greatly degenerated; the most ungraceful forms, and the most inconsistent combinations of colour, have studiously been adopted; but, happily for the improvement of public taste, all classes now, more or less, avoid such glaring deformities. As it should be the characteristic and criterion of all the fine arts, that their respective subjects possess expression, or produce at once a definite, a consistent, and an agreeable effect upon the mind, so, in costume, is all this powerfully effected. Nor are the principles on which this fine art produces these effects, either undefinable or actually vague. Thus, for example's sake, as all objects, when enlarged above and diminished inferiorly, have, like the inverted pyramid, an air of lightness, and one of heaviness, when oppositely constructed; just so, in costume, the small head-dress and enormous train characterise the more stately dame, while the large hat or bonnet, and shorter dress, distinguish the livelier girl.

ANECDOTE OF BARON HOLBACH.

This singular character was always ambitious of being regarded as a man of universal science; and he received, one day, from an American port, a letter from an intimate friend, which was written in the following manner:

"I had a very comfortable and safe passage here, unmarked by any particular event, except the following, which I think well worthy your attention. A cabin-boy fell from the mainmast on the deck and broke his leg; it was tied together as strongly as possible, with packthread steeped in rosin and brandy; in a minute after this operation, he could use it as well as he did before the accident. All the crew were present at this process, and we know not which to admire most, the skill of him who undertook the cure, or its entire success."

The baron lost no time in communicating this intelligence to the college of surgeons, vouching for the veracity of his correspondent, and the disciples of Esculapius debated together to find out the means of so marvellous a cure; it is even affirmed that one among them was about to publish a learned dissertation, to prove and establish by physical reasons, the manner in which this operation ought to be performed, when the baron received a second letter from his friend, which contained the following lines:

"I forgot to mention one trifling circumstance in the account of the event of which I informed you in my last: which is, that the leg of the cabin-boy, which was broken, was made of wood."

FUSELI.

Fuseli was short in stature; his eyes were full, prominent, and, like the eagle's, piercingly brilliant. He dressed well, and at all times looked like a superior man. His remarks generally witty, and sometimes severely cutting; but to the ladies, particularly those who were qualified to give him the retort-courteous, he was cautiously and precisely polite. In early life he suffered each of his many female admirers to suppose herself the favourite fair. Miss Moser, at one period, drew that conclusion, and for a long time he flirted with Angelica Kauffmann; but he found, at last, that her glances were directed toward Sir Joshua Reynolds and Mr. Parker. In Fuseli's marriage state, Mrs. Wolstoncraft fell desperately in love with him; and many other ladies were exceedingly delighted with his conversation.

THE PLEASURES OF WINTER.

It is in winter that we should endeavour to enjoy the recollected pleasures of summer, and delight ourselves with the memory of the warmth of colouring, beauty of appearance, and verdurous clothing of the festival scenes that have passed from us; and let us hope that we may be permitted again to luxuriate in the golden light, the beautiful flowers, and the delicious music of birds, that ever characterise this pleasure-fraught season. Again, winter is the season of domestic delights—of sociality—of fireside enjoyments—of twilight musing—of that mild melancholy which whispers us of the coming winter of our lives, mixed with the cheerful hope that we have yet some delicious days of summer, dreaming to enjoy and call ours, ere the May of our lives falls into 'the sere and yellow leaf' and its autumn dies the lap of winter.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.
STANZAS.

I cannot call thine image up as I was wont to do,
In days when every moment's thought would bring thee to my view;
When all the earth was full of thee, so that I looked on nought
Which did not bring before my eyes the object of my thought.

I met thee in the crowded hall, and in the public throng;
Thy form was foremost in the dance, thy voice first in the song;
They fixed alone my eager eye, and chained my list'ning ear,
And in my hours of solitude thou still seemed hovering near.

And when the social circle met, in youth's hilarity,
'Twas sweet to me to hear them speak, because they spoke of thee;
I listened with a blushing cheek, and with a beating heart,
But mutely—for my faltering speech would far too much impart.

And when in sleep mine eye I closed, I could not shut out thee,
Still thy pale brow and soft dark eyes would haunt my memory;
And visions bright and beautiful came softly gliding by,
Fraught with the music of thy voice, the sunshine of thine eye!

But now thy very looks are things which I can scarce recall,
I meet thee not in lonely walk, nor yet in crowded hall;
And though each thing that meets mine eyes brings memories of thee,
They come all shadowy and dim, not bright and vividly.

Thy form is but a phantom now, that visits still my dreams,
But dim and undistinct to me, each once high vision seems;
The shadows of my former dreams, they only bring to me
Some faint remembrance of the past, some likeness dim of thee!

Oh! is it that I love thee less, that thus the thought of thee
Comes like a twilight o'er my mind, so faint and shadowy?
Would that it were! for then my heart in freedom would be blest;
But now 'tis an unquiet thing that vainly seeks for rest.

I loved thee in thy darkest hour, when clouds were on thy brow,
And when that roseate cheek of thine had changed its hue to snow;
And when thy pale lip wore a curl which spoke of inward strife,
When thy dark eye its brightness lost, thy sunny smile its life!

Yes—even then I loved thee, 'midst the gloom of grief and ill;
And now, when gladness fills thy heart, I feel I love thee still—
Though not with such devotedness as when like ruins thy lot,
When life was wearisome to thee, and earth a dreary spot.

Farewell! I may not breathe the name which I have loved so well,
Lest it should wake within my heart its nearly slumbering spell.
Even now one glance of thine would rouse feelings which should be o'er,
Then fare thee well—'tis better far that we should meet no more!

FIRST FRIENDSHIPS.

TIME changes all things. It is the language of our hexameters at school, and of our declamations at college: it is confirmed by the lamentable experience of our manhood, and remembered in the bitter reflections of our age. Dynasties fade into nothing; monarchs quit the palace for the prison; Napoleon dies at St. Helena; Brummel languishes at Calais. These are matters which interest us little, and concern us less. But the old god, with his scythe and his hour-glass, his wrinkles and his wings, wakens us to a more melancholy sense of his supremacy, when he interferes with the enjoyments which are springing up in freshness and verdure around our own hearts; when he points to the blighted friendship, the blasted love, the sympathies extinguished, the brotherhood severed in twain. Listen to a young man of twenty. He has formed opinions which no temptations will shake, connexions which no circumstances will dissolve. He is going into the world with a set of companions whose thoughts and feelings are his own, and he will defy the corrupting influences of cold society, hand-in-hand with men whose principles he embraces, whose genius he admires, whose talents must make them illustrious, whose ambition will never make them base. Five years hence, all this will appear to him, according to the temperament of his mind, very ludicrous, or very sad. To me, it is one and the other by turns; for my mirth and my dejection flow from the same springs, and are often blended in their course.

At twenty, thanks to a fondness for mathematical science and the somewhat too sedulous attentions of an over affectionate mother, I was pronounced "delicate," and sent to Madeira. I remained there four years, and came back re-established. Contented, myself, with aspiring to the second rank, and sometimes arriving at the third, in the sports and studies of childhood and youth, I had been a devout worshipper of the undisputed ascendancy of others, and had looked forward, with delighted anticipation, to the time when those whom I had seen starting from the goal in all the buoyancy of unproved exertion, should wear the wreath with which my fancy already encircled them, and associate me, not in the glory, but at least in the exultation of their success. And now, as the vessel neared the shores of my fatherland, the pleasantest of all the thronging feelings with which the first glance of her white cliffs created or revived, were those with which I looked back to the warmth of my old friendships, and forward to the certainty of their renewal.

The first month after my return was spent at the home of my birth, among the trees whose first shoots I had watched, and the lawns where my first games had been played. External nature was at least the same. The flowers were as bright, and the oaks as green, as when my boyhood loved them; the breeze wandered as freely, and the course of the rivulet was unchecked: but the mother, whose tenderness had made all these things fairer and dearer to me, was no more; and the brother, whose tastes had been my own, whose wishes had only followed or anticipated mine—of whose fondness I found a record in every spot I visited, and every recollection I called up—was slumbering by her side. I was alone in the world. I heard, too, tales which surprised me, of those whose companionship through life I deemed was to be my richest treasure. But I turned a deaf ear to every thing which pained me. The occurrences of life might have given a new direction to their energies, a new subject to their thoughts; but all the undercurrents of feeling must surely flow on as pure and transparent as of old. I got through the statements of my agent and the accounts of my steward, and prepared, with a nervous satisfaction, to judge for myself. I settled myself in lodgings in town, and set out to look for Arthur Montague, in Lincoln's Inn.

He had been my companion at Trinity, had kept on the same staircase, associated with the same set, pulled in the same boat, and played billiards at Cherterton, with nearly equal dexterity. But it was not by these circumstances only that our intimacy had been formed and cemented. His was a character singularly fitted to attract and retain the admiration and esteem of his fellow-students. Enthusiasm was its life and being. Talents he had, and of a high order; a clearness of perception which I have rarely seen surpassed; a readiness of acquirement which I have scarcely ever known equalled. But many who might have kept pace with him in the race of distinction, were distanced by the fervour of spirit which animated every effort and invigorated every nerve. He had been the leader of the republican party in the debating club of his day, and had exercised a remarkable influence over the minds of soberer listeners and sounder judges than ever I pretended to be. The courtesy of his manners, the occasional joviality of his habits, obliterated the prejudices which the ultra-liberalism of his principles excited; and, in the sittings of our little senate, the earnest sincerity of his pleading, his fluency of diction, his unbounded copiousness of illustration, dazzled where they did not enlighten, and confused the antagonists whom they failed to convince. There were a number of embryo statesmen among our ranks, each with his particular merits and his own knot of admirers; one doled out the comfortable assurances of the Morning Post, another retailed the gloomy forebodings of the Times; one had his little jest, or apt quotation, for every subject which presented itself, another decorated the barren waste of reasoning with flowers that ever were exported from the Emerald Isle. But of all our orators, Montague was the only one who spoke as if he were interested in a decision in which he could not, by possibility, be interested. If he advocated radical reform, you would have thought a majority would have sent him to parliament to-morrow. If he attacked the extravagance of ministers, you would have fancied that the burthens of the nation would be actually the lighter for the carrying of the vote he moved. He went straight to his point, leaving on the one side the trope of the rhetorician, and on the other the pun of the scoffer; never labouring to astonish, never studying to overwhelm; his end was to persuade; and when at last he found himself in a minority of one to twenty, no one doubted his sincerity, and no one denied his talents. The last time I had shaken hands with him, was at the close of one of these harangues. The question which, in the plenitude of our imaginary supremacy, we were determining, was, whether the moral and political state of the country had been advanced during the last twenty years. The son of a great borough-holder had gone out of his way to let off some clever jokes against the march of intellect, which had long been the watchword of the liberals. "I think," said Montague, "that I watch the progress of that march; that I do not miscalculate its steadiness or its rapidity. If I doubted, I would not trust the glorious memory, and swear by William Pitt—I would abuse the licentiousness of our press, and scribble in the John Bull. I would apostrophize the purity of our constitution, and look forward to a treasury borough. But I do not so judge the times. I trust a day will come, when a poor man, who is fathered by no peer, and patronised by no person, may win the power to do good without selling himself to do evil." That night, as Montague sat down, the cheers of two hundred men were heartily his. They were not given to his opinions, for scarce a dozen of his hearers held them; nor to his eloquence, for he had spoken briefly and unconnectedly. They were given by friendly anticipation to the honesty of his future life.

I found him now in small uncomfortable chambers, through which the light of heaven streamed dim and dismal, as if it shrank from the accumulated wisdom of ages which was reposing on the table and book-shelves. A few guinea briefs were lying conspicuous before him, and Fearn on Contingent Remainders gaped awfully by their side. Montague himself I should scarcely have recognised, if the name, legibly printed on his outer door, had not made me sure of my man. The fresh hue of his complexion had faded, and was replaced by the sallow, dingy colour, which is the generic distinction of all who feed upon precedents, and digest the quibbles of the court. The open vivacity of his eye was gone, and his voice, as he welcomed me, sounded husky and monotonous. If this had been the only alteration perceptible, the approaching long vacation would have set all to rights. But the spirit of the mind was gone. He had sunk into the apathy and stagnation which the coldness of the world's stoicism prepares for the young and the ardent. He had learned that patriotism is a dream, and integrity a jest; that principle is well parted with for practice, and that a silk gown is chiefly purchased if character is its price. And so he talked of reform with a quiet indifference, and of honesty with a bitter smile; he saw nothing in the catholic cause but the violence of its advocates; nothing in Lord Eldon but the soundness of his law; he seemed embarrassed by the presence of a friend from whom he might expect allusions to old times and old associations; and as I left the room, he drew his chair to the table, and took up his pen to finish his pamphlet in defence of the Principles of Pleading.

I had known Charles Merton, the gayest of the wine-party; the loudest on the midnight ramble; the petted favourite of noblemen and fellow-commoners, who relied upon his companionship for popularity as confidently as upon their silk gown and silver lace. I had seen him receive his gold medal in the senate-house, greeted by the sunshine of a thousand bright eyes, and hailed by "the loud collision of applause"

ing gloves." I had heard him at my last supper in Neville's court, singing his own half-jovial, half-melancholy song:

"Fill to the flowers that have faded away,
"Fill to the joy whose end is sorrow;
"Fill to the friends we lose to-day,
"And the loves we forget to-morrow."

And I remembered the convivial unanimity with which his rich and illustrious guests cried shame upon his sorrowful foreboding. I found him now poor and friendless, broken in health, ruined in spirits, dining in cellars, and reporting for the "Bell's Life in London!"

I remembered Lord Leybourn, the most courteous and affable of our aristocracy; he had been proud and pleased in the society of literary men, and had shown that he did not think the cultivation of the fine arts, and an acquaintance with the elements, at least, of scientific pursuits, altogether unbecoming the future possessor of a princely estate, and the heir to an old marquise. He had honoured me with as much of his intimacy as the difference of our ranks allowed; and if I felt flattered by the civilities of nobility, surely I should have been painfully rescued from my self-conceit, if I could have fancied that recognition would have been more difficult in the lobby of St. Stephen's than it was in the quadrangle of St. John's. His lordship passed me in Regent-street with a glance of imperturbable unconsciousness; and when I met him under circumstances which did not admit of so decided a measure, bowed gracefully, and "was sure he had had the honour of being introduced to me somewhere."

Wearied and annoyed by all I saw, disgusted by changes of habit and feeling which were, doubtless, the natural product of every-day circumstances, but which struck me forcibly, because I had not witnessed the gradual process by which they had been effected. Sickened by each successive experiment, and at last looking doubtfully into myself, and almost expecting to find, in my own heart, symptoms of decay as manifest as those which I saw in the hearts of all around me, I prepared to give up the search, to return to my own fireside, and to assemble around it new friends, in whom I would repose more limited confidence—for whom I would cherish more guarded esteem. The evening which preceded my departure from London was spent at a crowded ball, to which I went, not expecting enjoyment, nor purposing to seek it, but in the moody spirit of self-punishment, which so often sends the saddest guest into scenes which may afford the strongest contrast to the sullenness of his own soul. As in my young days of joyous expectancy I had been fond of looking onward to the future destinies of those who crossed my path, now I found amusement in looking back to what I fancied might have been the early promise of those by whom I was surrounded. That officer of four-and-twenty, unrivalled in the curl of his mustache, unexceptionable in the accuracy of his coat, irresistible in the delicacy of his hand, was doubtless the Hector of the school at ten years old; open of heart and sharp of knuckle, quick to speak and firm to strike; with muscles of proved elasticity, and frame of tried endurance. That paragon of pirouettes, to whom Vestris were a clumsy mountebank, and Coulon a vulgar clown, was, perhaps, the ruddy leader of every childish game, the hardest hitter with the bat, the surest marksman with the taw. And that laureate of loveliness, the inditer of stanzas upon broken fans, and sonnets upon unclasped slippers, wandered, perhaps, in his infancy among the streams and mountains, and longed for fame with Milton's longing, and loved nature with Shakespeare's love.

I was awakened from these reflections by the growing spirit and vehemence of a conversation in my immediate vicinity. A lady, dressed in the most recherche style, and sparkling with diamonds from brow to waist, was entertaining a knot of dangle admirers with small-talk of the most approved order. "Oh, now, Mr. Popham, you are really too bad; twenty-seven or twenty-eight, at farthest: I have known her since I was no higher than your dumpty goddess, Sir George—and I am sure, quite sure, she was not more than twenty when I was fourteen. Apropos of fourteen—you are just come from Oxford, Quentin, and you can tell me whether there were twelve or fourteen wise men; I have a bet about it with Lady Margaret; and she is so blue, it will be delicious to win her money. And do you know, talking of money, I want money sadly, just now; my fortune at carte has been dreadful, quite dreadful; and I must really have a pony phaeton. Have you seen Mrs. Fenton's? the sweetest thing! She drives a black pony and a white pony; and we call them Day and Night—isn't it clever? and Mr. Vivian has made a charming epigram about them. Make him show it to you. Oh, Mr. Villiers, that snuff-box is quite too interesting. You shall give it me, I insist upon it. It is for monsieur. I am ashamed of the thing he produces after dinner. Who is that pale man staring so hard at us? Does any body know him? He looks like the statue in Don Giovanni, or Ulysses come back to his fatherland. Who knows him? Do you? do you? do you?"

I went up with all the assurance I could muster, and made myself known. She was indeed Ellen Trevor. I had left her the grace and ornament of her father's vicarage in Cumberland, beautiful, and unconscious of her beauty; accomplished, and looking to no boarding-school for her accomplishments. She had been flattered from her cradle, and yet she was not vain; she had lived in the country, and yet she was not vulgar. Nature had made "a lady of her own." Now, she was lady something, I forget what, the arbitress of taste, the patroness of bonnets, the jaded, and wearied, and envied object of commonplace compliment and vapid adulation. I believe she was glad to recognise the playmate of her infancy, even in a scene which accorded so ill with the recollections which our mutual memories retraced. "I am strangely altered since you knew me," she said. "You have learned much at least," I answered. "Oh!" she said, laughing, "I was seventeen when we parted; and after that, you know, 'on apprend souvent à pleurer, et on n'apprend rien de plus!'"

THE REPOSITORY.

A LESSON.

CHARLES JOHNSON and Howard Jones were chums of the same school. Johnson was at that time set down for a lad of a dull, slow spirit and wit; and, apparently without feeling, felt silently for all who deserved it, and sometimes for those who did not; while Jones, with much loud talk of feeling, and a collection of the most approved maxims of charity at his tongue's end, seemed never to possess either. These boy-friends were parted, and became men at last. Charles burst out into the man of genius; the early morning of his life was apparently dull, but its noon gave promise of a glorious after-day; while Howard, who in his youth had excited the greatest hopes of his friends, sunk into the mere man of the world. Though the one was now mammon-minded and sordid almost to avarice, and the other a mere creature of the elements, "that plays in the plighted clouds;" though one was poor and the other rich; though as dissimilar as darkness and light, as immixable as water and oil, as opposite as ice and fire, they were nevertheless friends—such friends as the world understands by that much-abused word.

Howard, indeed, threw much more rapidly than his friend grew unfortunate. But, to keep up the appearance of friendship and humility, when he fell in with him, he would not loose his sleeve till he had him seated at his silver-spread table; and Charles, who was too noble to be envious of another man's happiness or wealth, was there the merriest of the merry, and kept the table in a roar with equal pleasure to himself and to others. Time, however, was rather slow in reconciling the riches of the one to the poverty of the other, but did eventually so far succeed, that Jones began to care about half as much for Johnson's neediness as he did himself—and here we come to our story.

Howard had employed a skilful mechanic to repair his chaise; and the business being done, as was his custom, he thought no more about paying than Dives did of Lazarus. The needy creditor had suffered his wealthy debtor to stand in his books longer than the usual time, for he was—as a poor tradesman often is, to the shame of the rich—afraid to ask "so great a man as Mr. Jones" for so paltry a sum. At length—for Patience herself will sometimes grow impatient—the poor man called himself. Mr. Jones could not look at his bill then; he had "a particular friend with him"—Johnson was there—he might call again next month. The humble man turned away from the proud man's door with weary foot, for he had journeyed some miles. The month passed away, and he called again; but he could not see him—"Thomson, his particular friend Thompson, was there"—he might call again in a week. He called in a week; he was not at home—his still more particular friend, Wilson, was there then—"call again;" he did; he was not up. "Call again;" he did; he was not down. "Call in the city;" he was out of town. "Call at the villa;" he was in town. In short, let him call when he would, or where he would, it was to no purpose.

Charles's humane heart was shocked at the evident reluctance of Jones to part with his money; and resolved, when an opportunity offered, to punish his unfeeling friend in some way that should exhibit his covetousness in its true light. In the meantime—by one of those accidents in the life of a poor man of letters—happening to have ten guineas in his pocket, he privately paid the poor mechanic the five he so much wanted, contenting himself with the hope that, when he had thoroughly shamed his penurious rich friend thoroughly again into feeling, he should get repaid.

An opportunity soon served for his scheme. Jones had lately had a large estate in the West-Indies bequeathed to him by a rich bachelor uncle, and was in daily expectation of receiving the proceeds. Johnson, by some means, had heard of the arrival of the agent at Liverpool, but concealed the information. In the meantime Jones betrayed such a feverish impatience to handle the expected cash, that, what with plethora, and passion, and the megrims, into which every day's disappointment threw him, he took to his bed. It was now that Charles determined to effect, if possible, a cure of his rapacious love of money, and to revenge the neglect and wrong he had done to the sick creditor.

Accordingly, on the following morning, before the city shop-boys had watered the usual rings in the dust of the dog-days, he was at Jones's door, dressed in all the tight importance and loose nankeen trowsers of a warm West-Indian. The knocker was as yet unmuffled: he knocked importantly; and after a reasonable dressing-time, descends an appearance in a mob-cap, with a dull, death-watching face, and a mouth yawning to the circumference of a Dutch oven: it was Mrs. Shuffleton, the nightly nurse.

"Mrs. Jones, I presume, madam?" said Charles, bowing most respectfully to her inaudible list shoes. "No, sir," simpered the flattered feminine, very proud of the mistake, "Mrs. Shuffleton, night-nurse,

&c. at your service," curtsying herself down to about half her altitude."

"Well, then, good morning to Mrs. Shuffleton, at my service! Pray how is Jones this morning? I've just arrived from the West-Indies, and the first thing which I hear is, that Jones, my dear, generous Jones, is ill?"

"Yes, ill indeed, sir; poor dear gentleman; he's had five physicians!"

"Five physicians!" exclaimed Charles, "that's very dangerous, indeed! He must be a hale, hearty man, to survive such an attack! Five physicians! poor man! poor Jones! Good morning, madam; my compliments, and all that."

"May I have the honour of your name?" curtsied Mrs. S.

"Oh certainly, certainly; Hurricane, madam—Mr. Hurricane, from the West-Indies—Hurricane, the agent. You'll wake poor Mr. Jones, if he should happen to be asleep, and tell him that I called, and not wishing to disturb him, will call again."

"La! sir," exclaimed Mrs. S., "you are the very gentleman that Mr. Jones is so anxious to see!"

"Very possible—very likely; but really I cannot wait; I've my cousin Thomson to call on, and console with him on the death of his wife's kitten—poor things, they have no children, and such a loss is consequently very terrible!"

"But he's so anxious to see you," urged Mrs. S.

"Ho! certainly he shall; but I must see Thomson immediately; you'll say my name is Hurricane—Hurricane. I am in the greatest possible haste, or I would wait on Mr. Jones. Good morning, madam! Hurricane—you'll remember!" tapping Mrs. S. on the elbow impatiently with a walking-cane; and then off he went, leaving the nurse all womanly wonder at his coolness.

Two hours are past, and he has again knocked at Jones's door, as if he would knock him down who opened it; and again Mrs. Shuffleton descends in all the freshness of a laced tucker, flounced apron, morning gown, and "shining morning face."

"Well, how's Jones now?"

"The powers of goodness!" exclaimed she, lifting up her hands and her eyes; "I'm as glad as a May-queen that you've come back so soon, sir! Poor Mr. Jones, as soon as he heard that a white gentleman from the West-Indies had called, leaped out of bed like a lunatic madman."

"Just so! Then he is better! I'm very glad to hear it indeed—very! Good morning, madam, and my compliments, and whatever is usual to be said on these interesting occasions."

"But, my dear sir," remonstrated Mrs. S., "seizing him by the button, "he wishes of all things to see you: pray now do, dear Mr. Harry Cane, walk in!" implored the kindly nurse.

"It's impossible, my dearest madam!"

"But he's dying, sir!" insisted she.

"Very good: but he must not die till I see him. I've the most positive engagement with my particular friend Wilson, who is leaving town for his country house. The resigned old gentleman would think me particularly unfeeling if I did not see him set off."

"Well, but, my dear sir——"

"Mrs. Shuffleton," said Charles, with mock earnestness and solemnity of manner, "it is impossible. Good morning, and my compliments as before." Saying this, he departed.

Mrs. S. looked all astonishment, and quietly shutting the door, and then opening it again, to look once more at the author of her wonderment, she shut it, and went up stairs to poor Jones, who was more sick with impatience than any other complaint, and told him what a strange gentleman "that Mr. Harry Cane was."

"The man must be a brute, to trifle with a dying man!" vociferated Jones, as he pushed his patient nurse out of the room, and half-way down the stairs. "If I had ever treated any man so, I should have deserved this!"—and then he kicked his rheumatic and venerable valet into the anti-chamber.

At eight o'clock Charles returns: the knock, the Mrs. S. and the "Well, how's Jones?" again occur: to which the nurse, who had not yet recovered from the rudeness with which she had been thrust out of the bed-room, answered,

"Ah, sir, poor Mr. Jones is certainly mad, and will not outlive this day!"

"Exactly so," replied Charles, coolly playing with his cane; "then I'll call to-morrow; for I have promised to meet the very best fellow in the world, my friend Jackson. Good morning, Mrs. Shuffleton—" ton, he would have said, but the good nurse at that moment remembering the push she had had down stairs, or else impatient at the supposed Mr. Hurricane's prevaricating puttings off, shut the door in his face, and went off in a huff.

At nine he returns, and rings, for he was afraid the lion's head would not answer his inquiries, as it was by this time muffled in white leather, and looked totally sick and silent; but the wary Mrs. S. saw through the blinds that it was her old troublemaker, and, perhaps, out of a momentary spirit of revenge for the violence which had been done to her sacred office, and more sacred person, refused to open. At ten, therefore, he sends a ticket-porter, with instructions to ring long and loud: this succeeds, and down descends the surly nurse, looking as if she could wring his nose as long as he had rang the bell.

"Ho—a gentleman wants to know whether Mr. Jones could see Mr. Hurricane some time next week?"

Jones heard this message, and losing the little patience he ever possessed, bawled out,

"Tell the rascal to come here immediately, or I'll have him arrested for embezzlement, and teach him what it is to trifle with a dying man!"

The porter departs growling, and at twelve another comes to say, that "the gemman would wait on him to-morrow, as soon as he had seen Mr. Simpson, his tailor."

At one, a third inquires how Mr. Jones was at twelve; at two, the same porter comes to know how he was at one; and at three Johnson himself reappears, and ringing louder than before, Jones is heard, in the distance, swearing like a cutpurse.

"Tell the barbarous Barbadoes rascal to come up stairs, or I'll send the contents of a blunderbuss after his heels!" were the last words of Jones, as his man opened the door, with an

"Ah, how do ye do, Mr. Johnson?"

"How's Jones now?" asked Charles, with a negro-bullying, West-Indian sort of voice, that seemed to be half choked with suffocating segars.

At this critical juncture, Mrs. Shuffleton appeared from a side-parlour, and Jones at the stair-head, in his bed-gown and velvet cap. This was an unexpected denouement.

Charles was now compelled to enter in; and being asked his motive for such an unseasonable frolic, and having explained, "that it was to teach him, who had been insensible to the sickness and patience of another, the cruelty of being trifled with, and the pain, which is worse than sickness, of seeing man indifferent to the sufferings of his fellow-man"—here he produced the poor chaise-mender's receipt for his five guineas. Jones saw, with a blush, the cruelty of his neglect of the needy creditor, and taking Charles by the hand, pressed it with more than his usual warmth, forgave him the manner of his lesson, forgot his megrims, and patiently waiting the arrival of his agent—who came the next day with the immense revenues of his estate—is now a man of great wealth; gives liberally to all who want, that do not deserve to want; is kind and considerate to all, whether poor or rich; and loves his friend above all men, as the man who taught him the true value of wealth, and that it can only give happiness where it bestows the means of making those happy who are less favoured by fortune.

ARABIAN LITERATURE.

If the annexed is to be considered satisfactory evidence of that ready invention which has been sometimes claimed as peculiarly characteristic of the female sex in emergencies, may it not be taken strongly to support the opinion, that in executing their devices, they regard more the end proposed than the means for its accomplishment?

A TALE OF BAGDAD.

It is related that a young man of graceful stature and beautiful countenance resided formerly at Bagdad, where he was most distinguished among the sons of the merchants. One day, whilst he sat in his shop, a lovely damsel approached; having looked at him, she perceived written over his door these words: "There is no cunning equal to that of men, since it surpasses that of women."

"By my veil," said she, "this man shall be the sport of female cunning, and he shall change this inscription."

On the next day she returned most richly dressed, and attended by many slaves. Under pretence of purchasing some article, she seated herself in the young man's shop.

"You have beheld," said she, "the gracefulness of my person; can any one presume to affirm that I am hump-backed?" at the same time she uncovered part of her neck. The young merchant was fascinated. "I appeal to you," continued she, "whether I am not well-formed." She then showed him her finely turned arm, and her face, which in beauty equalled the moon when near its fourteenth night, saying, "Are these features marked with the small-pox, or who shall dare to insinuate I have lost the use of one eye?"

The merchant requested to know her reasons for thus exposing to his view so many charms, generally concealed under a veil.

"Sir," said she, "I am rendered miserable through the tyranny of my father, a sordid, avaricious man, who, abounding with riches, will not expend the smallest trifle to establish me in matrimony."

"Who is thy father?" inquired the merchant.

"He is the grand cady," replied she, and then departed.

The young man, in a transport of astonishment and love shut up the doors of his shop, and hastened to the tribunal, where he found the magistrate.

"I come, sir," exclaimed he, "to demand in marriage your daughter."

"She is not worthy," replied the judge, "of so handsome and amiable a man."

"She pleases me," said the young man; "do not oppose my wishes."

A contract was immediately concluded; the merchant agreed to pay five purses before the nuptials, and settle fifteen as a jointure. The father still represented how unsuitable the bride would prove, but the young man insisted that the nuptials should be celebrated without delay; and on the next morning, as is the custom of the country, he was admitted to the chamber of his bride. But when he had removed the veil that covered her face, he beheld such an object!—may heaven defend us from the sight of such ugliness!—for in her was comprised every thing completely hideous. He passed the time as if he had been in the prisons of Deylem, amongst the monstrous demons. As soon as possible he left his wife, and returned to his shop, and refreshed himself with coffee. Many of his acquaintances passed by, and amused themselves with jokes respecting the charms of his bride.

At length the lovely form of her who had contrived this affair appeared before him. She was more richly ornamented than on the preceding interview; so that a crowd of persons stopped in the street to gaze upon her.

"May this day," said she, "be auspicious to thee, my dear Olueddyn; may heaven protect and bless thee!"

The young man's face expressed the sadness of his heart. "How have I injured thee," replied he, "that thou hast in this manner made me the object of thy sport?"

"From thee," answered the beautiful and fascinating stranger, "I have not experienced any affront; but if thou wilt reverse the inscription over thy door, I will engage to extricate thee from every difficulty."

The merchant instantly despatched a slave, desiring him to procure from a certain writer an inscription, in letters of blue and gold, expressing, "There is no cunning equal to that of women, since it surpasses and confounds the cunning of men." The inscription was soon traced, and brought by the slave to his master, who placed it over the door of his shop. Then, by advice of the fair damsel, he went to a place near the citadel, where he concerted with the public dancers, bear-leaders, and those who exhibited the tricks of monkeys; in consequence of which, while he was sitting the next morning, drinking coffee with his father-in-law, the cady, they came before him with a thousand congratulations of joy, and styling him their cousin. The young merchant immediately scattered among them handfulls of money. The judge was amazed, and asked many questions.

"My father," said the young man, "was a leader of bears and monkeys; such has been the profession of my family; but having acquired some wealth, we now carry on the business of merchants with considerable success."

"But dost thou still," asked the judge, "belong to this company of bear-leaders?"

"I must not renounce my family," replied the young man, "for the sake of thy daughter."

"But it is not fit," exclaimed the judge, "that such persons should espouse the daughter of one who, seated on a carpet, pronounces the decisions of law; one whose relations ascend even to our prophet."

"But, my good father-in-law," said the merchant, "recollect that thy daughter is my lawful wife; that I value each hair of her head as a thousand lives; that for all the world I would not consent to be separated from her."

At last, however, a divorce was formally executed; the money which the merchant had settled was returned; and he, having applied to the parent of her who had contrived this stratagem, obtained the lovely damsel in marriage, and during many years, enjoyed the utmost conjugal felicity.

NATURAL HISTORY.

AERIAL SPIDERS.

THE cobwebs which are found occasionally floating in the air, alighting on the face and person as we walk, in threads of finest texture, and which are observable more especially in dewy mornings, at certain seasons, overspreading the fields with a tissue charged with pearly globules, sparkling in the sun's rays, are the work of vast numbers of aerial spiders, which, descending during the night to imbibe the moisture, weave among the blades of grass the webs which collect the dew. The cause of the rising of this insect and its web into the air, since its specific gravity considerably exceeds that of the atmosphere, has been variously explained. Mr. Blackwall, in an address to the Linnean society, professes to account for the ascent of the threads, by ascribing it to the effect of warm currents of air emanating from the surface of the ground. Mr. John Murray combats this doctrine, and accounts for the phenomenon in these floating webs on electrical principles. The following is the substance of his observations on this interesting insect, in the "Magazine of Natural History," of November last. During the day these aerial spiders, according to the electrical state of the atmosphere, either rise in a vertical direction—and that rapidly or slowly, as they are affected by the same electrical circumstances—or they float at angles more or less inclined to the horizon, or on a parallel with its plane. They have the power of propelling their threads in a similar variety of directions, either in motionless air, or in an atmosphere agitated by the winds; or even against the wind, the threads preserving invariably the direction in which they are propelled, and never intermingling; and sometimes a pencil of threads, presenting the appearance of a divergent brush, is propelled. On comparing these operations of the insect with the electrical state of the atmosphere, the following corresponding results are observable:—When the air is in a positive state, as in clear and fine weather, the spider makes his ascent most easily and rapidly; when it is weakly positive, he rises with difficulty to a limited altitude, and with but slight inclination of the propelled threads above the plane of the horizon; while, when the negative electricity prevails, as in cloudy weather, or on the approach of rain, he is altogether unable to ascend; so also, as toward evening, the positive electricity of the air becomes feeble, and during the night changes to negative, then the spiders descend to the earth. With regard to the habits of this little aeronaut in other respects,

Mr. Murray says, he is greedy of moisture, though otherwise abstemious; its food is perhaps peculiar, and only found in the superior regions of the sky; like the rest of its tribe, it is doubtless carnivorous, and may subservise some important purpose in the economy of Providence; such, for instance, as the destruction of that truly formidable, though almost microscopically minute insect, the furia infernalis, whose wound is stated to be mortal. Its existence has been indeed questioned, but by no means disproved; that, and some others, injurious to man, or to the inferior creation, may be its destined prey, and thus our little aeronaut, unheeded by the common eye, may subserve an important good.

Historical Society.—A report has lately been submitted to the legislature from this society, in which the committee appointed for the purpose detail a full account of their proceedings during the last two years. The grant of five thousand dollars, made in 1827, has been faithfully applied to the object intended—the payment of the debts of the society. "Relieved," says the document before us, "by the munificent grant, from the embarrassments which, at that period, threatened their very existence, the society avail themselves of this occasion to acknowledge their grateful sense of the obligation conferred upon the institution, by the timely succour afforded by the legislature. For their present prosperous condition, they are solely indebted to that public spirit which, characteristic of the popular sentiment, has nobly achieved splendid designs of inestimable value to the state, and permanently monumental of its fame." Whatever objections we might raise to the style of this passage, we cannot but accord with the ideas intended to be conveyed. The library contains seven thousand volumes; three thousand of which relate directly to the history of America. There are also three hundred volumes of newspapers, of the most interesting and important dates.

Theatrical.—It is Hazlett, we believe, who observes that "to read a good comedy is to keep the best company in the world, where the wittiest things are said, and the most amusing happen;" and certainly to be present at the representation of a good comedy, when the different parts are correctly conceived, and spiritedly sustained, "with all appliances and means to boot," is one of the pleasantest things imaginable; and the only wonder is, that more people are not of that opinion. We never could comprehend how sentimental comedy—what an anomaly!—and murdering melo-drama, came to be so very much the fashion. How the public, having "senses, organs, and affections," should forsake the company of the old dramatists—"fellows of infinite jest and most excellent fancy"—and take up with the lachrymose set—a few excepted—that succeeded them, is utterly inconceivable: it is as if a reasonable man were to give up sparkling wine for milk-and-water. A dose of melo-drama is worse still. This is a pity—and the more so, as there is a host of comic talent in this city equal to the task of embodying and giving effect to the gay wit and rich humour of Wycherley, Farquhar, Sheridan, Colman, &c. This assertion, we believe, will be contradicted by few who have witnessed the performance of the "Poor Gentleman," the "Heir at Law," or "Secrets worth Knowing," at the Park theatre. The principal strength of that company, however, lies in what is called low comedy. In this line, Hilson, Barnes, and Placide, form a trio that it would be difficult to match; but the fine gentleman of genteel comedy has never had, within our recollection, an adequate representative at this house. On this account, the Aimwells, Archers, Captain Plumes, and young Mirabels, are as little known to the Park audience, as if those worthies had not been drawn in the English language.

Morton's play of "Secrets worth Knowing," was performed at the Park on Friday evening, and in a manner that gave satisfaction to all present, if we may judge from the applause elicited. No man better understands the business of playwriting than Mr. Morton: he is complete master of what is termed stage-effect; and though his plots are frequently a collection of improbabilities, and his characters a mere compound of extravagancies, yet there is enough of redeeming merit about both to furnish forth an excellent evening's amusement, when supported, as on the present occasion, by good acting. In remarking upon the acting of a play, or, indeed, any thing else, it is pleasanter to praise than to blame; but easier to blame than to praise, and for the simple reason, that the language of approbation is much more limited than that of reprobation; but we must avoid repetition as well as we can. Hilson, as the steward, old April, displayed the same ability which usually marks his personation of similar characters, viz. hale, hearty, boisterous old men, with a dash of rough, natural feeling; his two scenes with Greville, and that with Undermine, were very effective. A complete contrast to April, and equally as good, was Barnes's old Nicholas; it was as fine a specimen of hoary-headed rascality, and withered iniquity, as can well be imagined; the querulous, squeaking, suspicious voice and tottering walk were in fine keeping, and there was a turn of the eye, and a contortion of the muscles, as the old sinner's fears of death came strong upon him, that were perfectly irresistible. To give full effect to the character of Plethora, and carry the ludicrous to its highest pitch, the length of the person who represents it ought to be inordinately disproportioned to his breadth; Placide, therefore, had up-hill work to do, but his rich comic talents carry him through every difficulty, and he made it one of the most amusing characters in the piece. The part of Undermine was in the hands of a Mr. Horton, a very useful and judicious actor, and much superior to those who have preceded him in his line at this theatre; and Mr. Simpson, as the young auctioneer, Rostrum, played with vivacity and spirit. Messrs. Woodhull and Barry, as the two serious heroes, went through their evolutions in a very creditable manner, excepting that the former lacked spirit and the latter discretion. There is nothing, however, in either part, to call forth a spark of ability. We have very methodically noticed the males, and must now come to the ladies. Mrs. Hilson looked interesting as Rose Sydney, and that is about all the character requires; while that excellent actress, Mrs. Wheatley, looked any thing but interesting as Sally Downright, though she played the part, we believe, as well as any one that ever appeared in it. But during the whole evening we did not see any thing that pleased us more than Mrs. Sharpe as Mrs. Greville; and it is the more particularly deserving of notice, as it is one of those unobtrusive class of characters that do not call forth the marked approbation of an audience. The great merit of this performance was its general propriety; there was nothing like overstrained or affected grief about it, but a quiet sadness and natural ease and grace that are very rarely met with on the stage in such parts; in fact, its great charm was that it savoured so little of the stage, but was just what we may suppose would be the actions of an amiable woman in real life, similarly circumstanced. Take the comedy altogether, it was performed in a manner that would have done credit to any place of amusement; and we have been particular in mentioning all concerned, for two reasons; in the first place, because, in this instance, they richly deserve it; and, secondly, because the individuals composing the regular company are, in general, neglected altogether, or else dosed with the most gross and preposterous flattery, by having talents and capabilities ascribed to them, to which they have no just claim.

Of the Bowers we will speak hereafter, though there is little to remark upon at present, as the Ethiop has been got up in a style which calls for such a frequency of repetition, as to prevent the appearance of any other novelty. It is announced that several new pieces are in preparation.

Masquerades.—It will be seen—says the editor of the American—by the report of the common council, that it was determined to make application to the legislature for a law prohibiting these entertainments. There seemed to be, and we confess we are gratified by it, but one mind in the board, as to the propriety of putting down this new and noxious species of amusement. The only question was, as to the power of the board, in reaching the case without any law. Where there was doubt, it was wise to take the sure course, and apply to the legislature. Meantime, this decisive opinion of the common council will, we trust, have all the effect of a positive enactment, upon those, at least, who regard not merely the letter of a law, but the spirit and purpose in which it is enacted. Two masquerades are now advertised for next week; and unless public opinion supply, for the time being, the absence of prohibitory regulations, twenty may follow—if at one theatre, then at another; and if at the theatres, then at taverns, dancing-rooms—and so through all places and classes. The experience of this sort of amusement in Europe has long since proved that it contributes not at all to the gratification of refined or well regulated taste, and that it leads infallibly to license and disorder. We rejoice, therefore, that it is not to be naturalized among us.

2. Now, through the charmed air,
Slowly ascending,
List to the chanted prayer,
Solemnly bending:
Hark! hark! it seems to say,

Turn from such joys away,
To those which ne'er decay,
Though life is ending.
3. O'er the fallen warrior's tomb
Holy monks are bending;

From the solemn cloister's gloom,
Hear the dirge ascending:
Hark! hark! it seems to say,
How vain is glory's way,
Life's joys and empire's sway,

In the dark grave ending!
4. So, when our mortal ties
Death shall dis sever,
Lord, may we reach the skies,
Where care comes never;

And in eternal day,
Joining the angels' lay,
To our Creator pay
Homage for ever.
Hallelujah! Amen.

HUMAN LIFE.

COME! ye that toil in hope, and, from your day
Of grief and pleasure, look for days to come,
With clearer suns, and skies of purer ray,
With more of gladness, and with less of gloom,
With less of blight, with more of cloudless bloom.
Come ye! and ponder well how this can be,
That, till man's step is trembling by the tomb,
Some lurking earthly dream of hope or glee,
Won from some bubble's light, beguiles his misery!

Come! pleasure-searchers: I would converse hold
Of the dim phantoms ye have chased so long,
With brow of gladness, and with wing of gold—
A witching cadence in her luring song—
As o'er earth's waste ye chase her tones along—
The viewless murmurs in the depths of air—
Each hour of youth, each haunt of fame among,
With her eye brightening, as a spirit's are;
Angel in form and face—cold, dull, yet still as fair!

Ay, I would ask, if her beguiling tongue
Filled the young breast with an enduring thrill;
If the glad voice wherewith the enchantress sung—
In past existence—charms the spirit still,
Or from death's victim moves the icy chill?
Can joy's fond memory break the web of doom,
Which casts a shade o'er nature—glen and hill,
And glad stream rushing—touching all with gloom—
Making the sad eye dim, which hope may ne'er illumine?

Man should not mutter—if the mind be free
From the low baseness of the meaner clay;
If the heart answers to the melody
Of spirit voices, as in childhood's day,
When free thoughts wander to its scene away,
Painting the present from the gullest past;
If from earth's beauty, in a calm survey,
Man can glean pleasure which will ever last,
Why should a sombre cloud o'er the warm brow be cast?

Joy! thou art found in the untrammelled soul—
In the rapt spirit, wandering, pure and free,
Spurning the fetters of earth's low control—
O'erspreading heaven like sunbeams in their glee,
Lighting the surges of a troubled sea
With gleams empyrean: from this element
Of sordid striving, thought may turn to thee,
Standing aloof—on loftier purpose bent,
With an immortal halo linked, and blessed, and blent!

There is a power in the mysterious sky—
In the great multitude of stars at night—

When the spring-cloud floats, gemmed with glory, by,
Dipt in the gladness of the young moon's light,
In the morn's fragrance, and the dim twilight—
There is, in these, a blessedness which care
May never mar; and in its pure delight
The soul is brightened, as the heavens are,
When the rich starlight falls in the blue summer-air.

SENT TO MY SISTER WITH THE PRESENT OF A DIAMOND RING.

Wilt thou accept this little ring?
Although it be a trifling thing,
A brother's gift—'twill sometimes bring
A pleasant thought to thee.

When happy faces smile around,
When mirth and innocence abound,
Oh may my sister's heart be found
To dwell awhile on me!

When, in the silence of thy room,
Thy thoughts grow serious—yet no gloom
Dim thy dark eye or pale thy bloom,
May'st thou remember me.

And when thou kneel'st at thy God before,
And voices sweet their praises pour,
For all his good and varied store,
Mingle a prayer for me.

The diamond here that meets thy sight,
And glitters like a star of night,
Is like to virtue's stronger light,
Such as I hail in thee.

The silver that enfolds the stone,
And to its lustre adds its own,
Are like the milder graces strown
So plenteously round thee.

The ring that round thy finger winds,
And firmly there the diamond binds,
Is like the golden link of minds
Which chains thyself to me.

Then take the gift—may no rude fears
Disturb the course of future years;
Nor hidden sighs, nor secret tears,
Be ever known to thee.

But joy, and peace, and holy love,
May these alone my sister prove;
And happy here, and blest above,
Each wish perfected be.

LONDON.

Oh, in London there's fun done, so gaily and daily,
There's no one can blow one, you know, with a grace;
For treating, and eating, and smoking, and joking,
And drinking, and pinking, oh, London's the place.

Such dancing and prancing, and milling, and billing,
They scare away care away—are they not blest?
Such rambling and gambling, of sinners and winners,
Beginners make skimmers as sharp as the rest.

In London, if undone, by fun done, and run down
By bailiffs and catiffs, with pitiless rage;
A debtor can better—by shunning their dunning
By cunning or running—escape from the cage.

Such jarring and sparring, with Charlies no parlies,
But mill away, kill away, as you've been taught;
While squaring and swearing, the fancy we can see
Delighting in fighting, for that is your sort. JOHN BULL.

PRESENT FAME.

—For me,
I rhyme not for posterity,
Though pleasant to my heirs might be
The incense of its praise,
When I, their ancestor, have gone,
And paid the debt, the only one
A poet ever pays.

But many are my years, and few
Are left me ere night's holy dew,
And sorrow's holier tears, will keep
The green grass where in death I sleep.
And when that grass is green above me,
And those who bless me now and love me,
Are sleeping by my side,
Will it avail me aught that men
Tell to the world, with lip and pen,
That once I lived and died?

No—if a garland for my brow
Is growing, let me have it now,
While I'm alive to wear it;
And if, in whispering my name,
There's music in the voice of fame,
Like Garcia's, let me hear it! HALLUCK.

METAPHYSICS.

—“and reasoned high
Of Providence, foreknowledge, will, and fate,
Fixed fate, free will, foreknowledge absolute,
And found no end, in wandering mazes lost.
Of good and evil much they argued then,
Of happiness and final misery,
Passion and apathy, and glory and shame—
Vain wisdom all, and false philosophy.”—Milton.

If we could be translated into a more perfect state of existence, with all our identity and memories about us, what an interesting subject of contemplation would be our pilgrimage upon earth; what a different aspect human affairs would assume when we were elevated above their immediate interests; when we could behold them in their relations as a great whole, and perceive how all the parts were adapted to some grand consequence!

I have sometimes fallen in with reasoners, who, from the very fact that they have observed closely and thought deeply, have discarded all generally received opinions upon metaphysical subjects; and, with a singular strength of argument, convinced themselves of the truth of some of the ancient theories, that we have been created accidentally. They assert that it is more impossible—if I may be allowed the use of such a term, where we are surrounded on all sides by apparent impossibilities—to imagine the time when matter did not exist, than to suppose that it has existed for ever. Taking it for granted, therefore, that matter, in some mode or other, either as atoms floating about in infinite space, or in the form of subtle gas, or perhaps in some shape with which we are totally unacquainted—for, the more we learn, the more we are struck with our ignorance in regard to the fundamental truths of nature—has always existed, they tell us that it must intrinsically have qualities, for what is it but a collection of qualities? Now, how it should gain any quality, though the most insignificant that meets our observation, is entirely incomprehensible to us; and when we have once perceived that, from its own nature, it possesses such as shape, density, elasticity, attraction, repulsion, colour, &c. the truly philosophical mind will experience no farther surprise, nor infer the influence of any extraneous agent, from the discovery of those qualities which distinguish dead matter from that portion endued with life, thought, sensation, affection, &c.

Nature, they say, teems with life. The microscope admits us into a new world of living and well organized beings, and startles the imagination with conjectures vague and indefinite as to the line of distinction, if there be any, which marks the limits of that which is inert, without any particular origin and destiny, and that from which rise the world of mind, the viewless tide of affection, the agents of reason, and all those faculties which mortals have ascribed to a separate creation, distinct in itself from the inferior mass of chaotic substances, which emanates from the ineffable Deity, and which, when disentangled from its mysterious connection with matter, shall flow on to the accomplishment of unknown purposes, beyond the reach of human conjecture.

I myself am an humble observer of these things. I cannot altogether restrain my thoughts; but I fly from the extremities to which they would lead me, and seek shelter in my ignorance from all gloomy conclusions. The restless mind may for a while abandon the pleasing hopes among which in youth it had reposed, like an infant sleeping upon flowers, and shape its solitary flights through the joyless region of dim speculation; but unless it be ruined by the innumerable horrors it must encounter, it will turn back exhausted and dissatisfied to the common opinions and hopes of man. Yet there are many who have been injured by dwelling too long upon such subjects, and been lost to society and themselves, amid the forbidden and dangerous mazes of metaphysics. It is best at once to acknowledge our ignorance. Man cannot cope with nature. There are subjects around which she has flung the barrier she meant to be insurmountable, and we should no more endeavour to break out of the limits which she has assigned to the range of human intellect, than we should endeavour to rise into the clouds, or live beneath the sea.

I was led to these meditations by a letter which I lately received from a friend whom I had once considered a ruined man. He was in an excellent business, and could, by industry, have attained independence; but he mortified his family at first by neglect of all his duties, and afterward by abandoning himself to dissipation. It soon became evident that he was yielding to habitual intemperance, which soon grew so much upon him that he was banished all society but such as he met in his idle haunts through the midnight streets or the riotous tavern. For this singular alteration in his character no satisfactory reason could be assigned. He had before conducted himself with the strictest regard to the interests and feelings of his friends, and won their affection as well as their esteem, by the amiable and manly disposition which all occasions displayed. Inquiry was made if any secret misfortune had disgusted him with the world, and impelled him to seek the fatal relief of the bowl; but the history of his past life exhibited nothing more than the common incidents of youth and manhood—such changes as occur in the ordinary nature of things, over which we grieve the stated period, and then forget in the hopes, pleasures, and new disappointments which chequer the little day of life. He had gone on in this manner for a year, and when all hope of his reformation had passed away, he suddenly appeared a new man. He resumed the character of an amiable and industrious citizen. He lived again happily in the bosom of his family. His business flourished beneath his anxious care, and, at this time, he is a happy husband and father.

He wrote me some time ago. His letter was long, and, to me, very interesting, and confirmed my opinion that the world is not so bad as we are apt sometimes to deem it. I will extract a few paragraphs for the benefit of such young gentlemen as allow their thoughts to wander away too far from the realities of life. Let nature take care of her own works. We have every reason to believe that she knows what she is about, and when we discover the exquisite care she has taken for our enjoyment, and feel the blessings innumerable which her bounteous hand has lavished upon us, why should we suppose her favourable disposition will ever change?

After some account of the manner in which the subject of religion had affected him, and the despondency into which he fell in consequence of it, he adds:

“I had now no object for which to live. I had trusted with too much confidence to my own reason, and it had betrayed me into infidelity upon every subject. There seemed to be no Providence over human occurrences. I had lost my hold on all the feelings which link man with man, and lead his hopes on through the bright vistas of future happiness. In short, it was atheism, which comprehends all of horror that humanity can suffer. It took all the tinge of comfort from life. It made pleasure a mockery, and hope an empty dream. The earth offers to the imagination no prospect so utterly bleak as that of the atheist. He has no confidence in nature. In the thrillings of pleasure he feels no gratitude; in the anguish of suffering he knows no consolation. The world that moves on carelessly around him, was not made for him. He walks over it as an usurper, and after his brief hour of hopelessness, when he has snatched his selfish joys, and endured his lonely labours, he sinks back into the eternal grave, and mingles, like a brute, with the common mass of things. To escape reflections like these, I rushed into every excitement that chance offered, and I can scarcely say in which situation I was more wretched, in the cold desolate moments of reason, or in the wild frenzy of intoxication.

“It was on my way to one of these scenes of debauchery, that I was met by a gentleman whom formerly I had much esteemed. He introduced me to his family, and I awoke to a scene of domestic bliss, the very existence of which I had forgotten. He was an elderly man. His wife was yet the object of his sincere affection, and he had sons and daughters growing up in happiness and beauty around him. From the circle which gathered around his cheerful fire, all misery seemed excluded. The amusements every where opened to intelligence, here sufficed to beguile their leisure hours; and those affections which I had suffered to lie dormant, here occupied all hearts, and shed a charm, an inexpressible charm, over the scene. I could not but contrast it with the lonely madness of my own fate; and when the dance had ceased, and his youngest daughter had finished one of those touching songs which surprise the heart sometimes into the tenderness of a woman, and all the fair forms whose soft voices and beaming eyes yet lingered in my mind had passed away, I was prepared for the conversation which he introduced, and the conclusions to which he intended it should lead me. He heard me describe my feelings with patience, and, after much argument, by which I was often compelled to acknowledge myself in the wrong, he finished with the following remarks:

“The miseries which you have suffered are not uncommon, and, were they permanent, few of us could be in any degree satisfied with life. But they are clouds which, though they will rise in the mind at certain times, yet melt away of themselves, and leave the character purer and better for the mental tempests which they engender. There are three different periods in the life of a thoughtful man, when the world wears different aspects. To the eye of youth it is all gay. We trust all who promise, and love every one who smiles. The present is bright, but it is nothing to the brilliancy of the future; and all the delightful feelings of our nature unfold themselves luxuriantly, without experience to guide, or sorrow to chill them. But the season of youth steals swiftly away. Before we are aware, we have reached the stage of manhood, and are mingling in its wider adventures, and adapting our boyish hopes and opinions to its stern necessities. Soon we begin to perceive that the scenes around us have changed, and then to wonder that we ourselves are so much altered. That which we used to value, no longer satisfies our wishes. That which we used to wish, appears now wild and romantic. We find that we must contract the sphere of our hopes, and be content with much which, in the pride and ardour of earlier imaginings, we had rejected with disdain. Our old school-mates, who but yesterday were sporting with us on the green, have grown up to maturity, and assumed their rank in society; and they to whom we once looked up with awe and reverence, from whose lips we received wisdom, have passed away, and their names are strangers in the places where they were once known and loved. It is very probable that, at this time, our own misfortunes begin to darken around us. We bid farewell to the thoughtlessness of our earlier hours, and can number the disappointments which have blighted our own hopes. The future loses its tinge of glory. Even the present often becomes a waste. Each year, as it comes more darkly over us, dissolves some lingering spell of boyhood, and severs, one after another, the links that connected us happily to the earth. Now we acknowledge, in the private chambers of our thoughts, that the events we most earnestly desired can never take place. Many of our dearest friends are gone. Many for whom alone we seemed to live, and without whose companionship and approbation wealth and fame would be almost valueless, have departed; not for a day or a year, but for ever; and after the mind has exhausted its every power of suffering in vain wishes and wretched recollections, it settles down at length into a gloomy acquiescence—a stagnant content. Here misery assumes its most hideous form, and we are in danger from wild opinions and tempting excitements. The desolation within prompts us to seek relief abroad, and it depends upon the nature of the path we here choose, whether we go forth upon a career of honour and happiness, or sink into idleness and oblivion. The affections which once stretched out their tendrils to embrace every surrounding object, now recoil from all contact, and wither up within the deep, cold, silent recesses of the heart. Our mind, once filled only with soft dreams and undisturbed affections, is now thronged with spectral doubts and fierce and dangerous resolutions. It is as if an elysian garden, where flowers had breathed and lovely girls wandered, were suddenly converted into a scene of warfare, its shady cloisters shaken by the roar of cannon, and its flowers trampled down by the tread of battle. This is, perhaps, the most important season of life. There comes over the spirit a species of desperation, a recklessness of present and future, a wantonness of despair, where reason sits listless upon her throne; and the mind, crazy with the influence of a morbid imagination, plunges into the unfathomable abyss of metaphysical conjecture. Here all is dark, void, limitless, and unearthly; and in its mighty chaos we lose all identity and interest in common things. We believe ourselves lapsing along to a termination of all our feeling, and, shuddering, we yield to our fate. Many a noble fellow is here destroyed. Many a proud spirit that has long warred in vain with the influences of the world, bends, at length, and bows down to the dust in anguish and shame. But this humour of the mind also passes away, the tumults of the bosom gradually subside, and he becomes familiar with nature as it is. The imagination returns from her dark flights, reason discovers new objects of interest and affection, and the void in the heart is filled. Go back, my friend,' continued my companion, 'and learn to meet the changes of life with firmness and dignity; and if your situation afford nothing else, still you may enjoy the pride of human intellect in buffeting the storms of fate, and standing erect, though all around you be in ruins. Do your duty, and nature will accomplish the rest. But beware of yielding to the impulse of a moment, lest you destroy the chance of happiness for years.'

"I retired to my rest with these new views of the world, and experienced relief that others could comprehend me, and had known similar despondency. I abandoned all the habits to which I had resorted before, and mingled again with the world. It would be superfluous for me to say with what horror I regarded the dangers I had escaped, and the gratitude with which I remembered the sympathy by which I had been rescued. I am now as happy as I ever was. All my affairs go on prosperously; the labour of my day is far from being unpleasant; and you will never realize the great happiness I experience on returning to my home in the evening, till you try for yourself the—but I am interrupted. My little boy is putting up his red lips for a good-night kiss, which will tell you better than any description what I mean, and my wife is playing upon the piano, accompanied by my sister, in a chord so sweet, that I must stop to listen. HUDIBRASTICS.

Some mouths are like to open doors,
Through which the vulgar rabble pours;
While some are like a palace gate,
Whence all proceed in decent state.

As on the anvil, shaped by blows,
The iron to a hammer grows,
Wherewith to beat some other mass,
That 'neath its weight is doomed to pass;
So slaves submit to tyrants' sway,
The first to flatter and obey;
Yet, having gained authority,
They like their masters learn to be.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

DRESS.

Do not require your dress so much to fit as to adorn you. Nature is not to be copied, but to be exalted by art. Apelles blamed Protegenes for being too natural.

Never, in your dress, altogether desert that taste which is general. The world considers eccentricity, in great things, genius; in small things, folly.

Remember that none but those whose courage is unquestionable can venture to be effeminate. It was only in the field that the Lacedemonians were accustomed to use perfumes and curl their hair.

Never let the finery of chains and rings seem your own choice; that which naturally belongs to women should appear only worn for their sakes. We dignify foppery when we invest it with a sentiment.

To win the affections of your mistress, appear negligent in your costume—to preserve it, assiduous; the first is a sign of the passion of love; the second, of its respect.

The most graceful principle of dress is neatness; the most vulgar is preciseness.

Dress contains the two codes of morality—private and public. Attention is the duty we owe to others—cleanliness, that which we owe to ourselves.

Nothing is superficial to a deep observer. It is in trifles that the mind betrays itself. "In what part of that letter," said a king to the wisest of living diplomatists, "did you discover irresolution?" "In its us and gr," was the answer.

There is an indifference to please in a stocking down at heel—but there may be malevolence in a diamond ring.

He who esteems trifles for themselves, is a trifler—he who esteems them for the conclusions to be drawn from them, or the advantages to which they can be put, is a philosopher.

WIT.

If we take a survey of the various talents with which the human mind is endowed, we shall, perhaps, find none that is affected by so many, and possessed by so few, as wit. The reason is, we think, sufficiently obvious. The natural vanity which inhabits the breast of every man, from the quaker to the beau, leads him to wish to shine among his fellow mortals. Wit enables a man to assume a high rank in any company into which he may be introduced; every one acknowledges its power, and courts the society of the man known to possess it. But wit is not a mere accomplishment, it must be a gift. The bright flame must exist naturally in the breast of the person, and have been amalgamated with the rest of his composition when he was created.

The lash of satire, the grating cut of irony, the scorpion sting of sarcasm, and the sharp repartee, are weapons which have been wielded with such tremendous effect, that the most powerful potentates of the earth, the bravest warriors, and most lofty statesmen, have writhed under their affliction, and been forced to acknowledge their power.

A man may possess the most gigantic mind, the most solid and extensive learning, with the most brilliant accomplishments, and not have one spark of wit in his composition. On the contrary, a person who knew not a letter of the alphabet, has been known, merely by the force of this one talent, to confound the philosophy, and render useless, for the time, the acquirements of the most erudite.

We do not mean to assert that wit does not improve by the mind's cultivation; in this respect it resembles taste, which is also a natural attribute. In proportion as the mind becomes enlarged by education, the range of the fancy becomes more extensive, wit has more materials to work upon, and also more experience to work withal.

It has been remarked of persons thus gifted, that they have seldom many friends. This may be true, when they make a wrong use of their wit, which is too often the case. Conscious of power, the wit seldom suffers the weapons in his possession to rest for want of use, but darts his shafts at random, amongst a company always too much absorbed in the amusement of the moment to mark how the barbed arrow rankles in the bosom of any individual victim. Such conduct is cruel, but the inflictor, absorbed in the fancy of the moment, and cheered by the laugh he has raised at the expense of some individual, perhaps as worthy as himself, never dreams of having caused pain to any one. How would he shudder to hear that a powerful man, armed with a naked two-edged sword, had placed himself in the midst of a convivial assembly, and, without having received any provocation, begun to inflict sundry cuts and stabs at random, upon the defenceless and light-hearted throng who surrounded him! This is exactly his own case; nay, he is the more cruel of the two; wounds of the mind, especially if it be a sensitive mind, are more painful than those of the body. He knows himself to be armed with a weapon, in the use of which perhaps none present can compete with him, and he, therefore, exercises it upon those who are totally defenceless.

When wit is used in a playful manner, it is a truly amiable quality. We know of no greater pleasure than that of spending an evening in a company possessing a good fund of this same good-natured enlivening wit. It keeps away disagreeable thoughts, and, while bright eyes flash and young bosoms exult, morose age, and even sombre sullenness, will relax their rigid features under its genial influence. The quaintly-turned speech, the lively sally, the sly, dryly-expressed inuendo, the well-fitted double-entendre, yea, even the vile pun, each in its turn is echoed and re-echoed by the pealing laugh. The heart expands, and all the best feelings of nature predominate. The lively fancy shoots out into more brilliant and daring efforts, and the bold youth tries a still higher flight: he fails, but still the peal of merry laughter salutes even his failure. A flame of friendship is kindled; the pains, disappointments, and turmoil of the world are forgotten; the genius of wit presides triumphant, and cries

"Hence, loathed Melancholy!"

Melancholy flies, and the demon of discord dares not to show his head. Such are the powers which ye possess, O ye wits! and as we know you to be too amiable to prefer giving pain to giving pleasure, we are sure, for the future, you will use the brilliant faculty which nature has bestowed upon you, in the way most likely to conduce to the happiness of those around you.

FANCY BALLS.

For some weeks the worthy burghers of New-York have been raving distracted about a species of entertainment, recently brought forward among the beau monde of this country, under the title of "Fancy Balls." The public diaries of that goodly city are loaded with details of the dresses, and decorations, and assumed characters, and indescribable delights, accompanying these exquisite specimens of advancement in the career of fashion. To a plain, plodding, sober-minded citizen, accustomed to the ordinary dancing parties of yesterday, these new-fangled fetes may appear somewhat startling; and when he learns that "the most respectable citizens" have condescended to array themselves in the habiliments of a harlequin, and don the cap and bells of a zany, he may open his mouth with marvel, and exclaim, "Well, men may make mountebanks of themselves in a free country with the greatest impunity. The next step, in order to follow the track of our cockney exemplars, will be to establish four-in-hand clubs, mount the box of a stage-coach, and emulate the skill of our Jehus; an employment productive of far better effects, in its connexion with the ordinary business of society."

But what signify the croakings of such staid and inflexible opponents of the progress of improvement? Do we not learn by the diurnals of the Duytch-descended town-corporate of Nieu-Nederlandt, that the contrivances in question are getting to be vastly in vogue, and that all who would consider themselves at the tip-top of the ton, must know somewhat of the management of these balls of fancy. Do we not read that Punch and Judy, the Grand Turk, and Red Jacket, Palmers from the Holy Land, and Hottentots from the sands of Zahara, all attired in apt costume, with masks over their visages, and set phrases at their tongues' ends, illustrative of their diverse personifications, were in attendance? How excessively amusing! Imagine the wit and wisdom that must have circulated amidst the throng! Conceive, if possible, how enormously entertaining the sight of an oriental monarch coming in contact with a pilgrim "with peace in his shoes," each joking the other in good homely English! That sensible people should visit theatres, and be amused by the help of their own imaginations, the illusions of scenery, the language of eminent authors, and the skill of trained performers, was once thought to be reasonable; but now, that species of recreation must be set down as a very unfashionable sort of folly; since gentlemen, and ladies too, may themselves become actors, and find out, exactly, how they ought to feel, and speak, and look, when attempting to play the fool! HOUSE-HUNTING.

Mr. Editor—When my great grandfather, Hans Von Schnitzenberg, who was a burgo-master and a common council-man to boot, voted in the old city-hall, at the head of Broad-street, that quarter day should end on the first of May, and there should be but one day in the year to move, I remember that my great grandmother said to him in the most affectionate manner, "Hans, you are a fool; why don't you let quarter day come when it pleases, and let the folks move about when they please. Now mind what I say: our posterity will always grumble, and our houses will be run down with persons who want to have a peep, rather than to hire the premises, and the sand on our floor will have to be smoothed a dozen times a day."

And so, Mr. Editor, it turns out to be. Scarcely does the first of February arrive, and bills are posted on the door, when house-hunters—idle gossips, decayed spinsters, and old dowagers—throw on their cloaks, and away they go, from house to house, inquiring the rent, posting through the rooms, peeping into the pantries, trotting up into the garrets, and asking a thousand questions about this thing and that thing—whether the house is hot or cold, damp or dry, has rats or Manhattan water, and what may be its comforts, inconveniences, advantages, or defects—and then it is rap, rap, all day. One slushy morning last week, a lady and her two handsome daughters, seeing a bill on my house, knocked tolerably hard—walked into the parlour and took a comfortable seat by the fire. "Mary Jane, my love," said the old lady, "pull off your India-rubber shoes, or you'll not have the good of them when you go out. Miss obeyed, and placed her over-shoes, filled with snow and melted mud, on the bright brass edges of the grate-pan. My grandmother gave her a sharp look, but said nothing. After warming their feet for some time, throwing off their cloaks, the girls arranged their ringlets at the glass—quite at home—it was time to talk of business. "Well," said the old lady, "this is a handsome room enough—small, very small—bless me, that's a handsome picture—Pyramus and Thisbe, I vow, done by Vanderdecken. No pantries, madam, between the folding-doors? O, I see the house is old-fashioned—wooden mantle-pieces. Cornelia, my dear, run up stairs with this young woman, and look at the chambers." Cornelia tripped up stairs sans ceremonie, and began an agreeable prattle with the maid. "Is this your best chamber?—how confined—ceilings low—no inside shutters.—Open that closet-door—O, family jars—sweetmeats, I suppose—I like quince.—Where's the nursery?—up two pair of stairs?—it won't do—can't take the trouble of running up and down—quite a confined place—let's go through the kitchen.—Heavens, how dark!—no Manhattan water?—no closet for the pots?—how inconvenient!—O, cooking, I see—chimney as large as the parlour—why don't you use coal?—fooh, how it smokes!—I shall be as brown as a mustee.—Ma, it won't do; it's too small and out of order." By this time the party had thoroughly warmed themselves, adjusted their dresses, and sallied out of the room, with "It won't answer, ma'am; but there's a house opposite with a bill on't, and as we have an hour to spare before dinner, we will go through it. Good morning."

Thus, Mr. Editor, begins the evil of house-letting and inspecting, and the fact of all houses being to let at one and the same time, sends forth an army of real or pretended tenants and expectants, and scarcely has one set made their exit but another makes their entrance. Now, as our common council can do every thing, and any thing; and extensive as their powers, positive and implied, may be, cannot you persuade them to pass a law making the first of May come at any other time it pleases? N. Y. Enquirer.

A FABLE.

To an ox, who was the owner of a meadow, a certain rabbit owed a year's board. He was likewise indebted, more or less, to all the neighbours. Wherever he went, "pay for the grass," "pay for the bran," "pay me," "pay me," were the cries which rang in his ears. Having exhausted all his promises and grimaces, his creditors began to threaten him, and he found it necessary to play them some trick. One day, when he was alone, and thinking of this, he saw a dead gazelle lying on the ground. "This will do; my importunate friends," quoth he, "you shall see something new." Having flayed the dead gazelle, he dressed himself in the skin, which he adjusted as well as he could, and then stalked into the meadow. "Alas! poor gazelle!" exclaimed every tender-hearted animal, "what has happened to thee? why art thou so miserably thin?" "It was the rabbit whom I interrupted when he was engaged in some sorcery. He cursed me, and that brought me into this condition. Heaven preserve you from vexing him!" "Ha! do you hear that, comrades? This hint comes very apropos. I fear some mischief; let us leave the rabbit alone."

Moral.—When a man is clever, he may avoid paying his debts.—There are a good many clever rabbits about town.

RIVAL ARTISTS.

Mortimer, the painter, was remarkably tall, and Edwards a very short man, and, unfortunately, deformed, though he always stood erect, to make the most of himself. These artists painted each a picture of the same subject, the Cavern of Despair, from Spenser, which they sent to the Society of Arts for a prize; and during the time their works were hanging up, it happened that Mortimer and Edwards were standing by the side of each other, looking at Edwards's picture. Edwards, quite erect, with his usual importance, striking his cane perpendicularly on the floor, at arm's-length, thus addressed his antagonist: "Well, Mr. Mortimer! how do you like my picture?" "Sir, there are some good parts in it; but why did you make your reptiles so small?" Edwards, putting his left hand upon his hip, or, what may be better conceived, his arm a-kimbo, looking up to Mortimer, observed, "The smaller the more venomous."

PLANNING.

Some wag in the provincial journals is gravely circulating a paragraph, under the title of "a hint to the learned," in which he proposes to establish a subscription society for publishing such books as booksellers will not publish. Why not have other establishments for selling such meat or fish as butchers or fishmongers will not sell?

SLEEP.

A question has been raised how much sleep is required, and how long it is necessary to be in bed, for the purpose of rest and refreshment. Eight hours have been allotted for the labourer, and six for the scholar and gentleman. Very few gentlemen, however, are satisfied with this scale; and a capacity for sleeping makes the greater part of this class of the community inclined to double the period. The capacity for sleeping, like the capacity for eating and drinking, is to be increased by indulgence. Much depends upon habit. Some people can sleep when they will, and wake when they will; and are as much refreshed with a short nap as a long one. Sea-faring people have this property from education. I have known persons who have never indulged in a second sleep. One gentleman, who entertained a notion that a second nap was injurious, invariably got up as soon as he awoke, no matter how early the hour, winter or summer. Others again will sleep for four-and-twenty hours. The celebrated Quin had this faculty. "What sort of a morning is it, John?" "Very wet, sir." "Any mullet in the market?" "No, sir." "Then, John, you may call me this time to-morrow." So saying, he composed himself to sleep, and got rid of the ennui of a dull day in the arms of Morpheus. One gentleman, in the Spectator, used to sleep by weight. "I allow myself, one night with another, a quarter of a pound of sleep, within a few grains more or less; and if upon my rising I find I have not consumed my whole quantity, I take out the rest in my chair." A lazy old woman used to apologize for lying in bed, by saying, that "she lay in bed to contrive." Strange as this old woman's excuse was, it was an example followed by one of the most extraordinary geniuses of this country, viz. Brindley, of whom it is recorded, that when any great difficulty occurred in the execution of his works, having little or no assistance from books, or the labours of other men, his resources lay within himself. In order, therefore, to be quiet, and uninterrupted, whilst he was in search of the necessary expedients, he generally retired to his bed; and he has been known to lie there one, two, or three days, till he had obtained the object in view. He would then get up and execute his design without any drawing or model. There are different kinds of sleepers, as well as different kinds of sleep; some cannot sleep from home—others cannot sleep at home; some can sleep on a board, and snore on a carpet; while others tumble and toss on a soft bed, as if the down disconcerted them. Some again cannot sleep in a noise; others cannot sleep out of it. A miller awakens the moment the mill stops; and a tradesman from Cheap-side cannot sleep in the country, because "it is so plaguy quiet." Somnambulists, or sleep-walkers, usually sleep with their eyes open; but without vision. Shakspeare, who may be considered a very good medical authority, makes Lady Macbeth a somnambulist with her eyes open—"but their sense is shut." This is not always the case, however, and there is a singular exception, in the instance of Johannes Oporinus, a printer, who being employed one night in correcting the copy of a Greek book, fell asleep as he read, and yet ceased not to read, till he had finished not less than a whole page, of which, when he awoke, he retained no recollection. There are many curious histories of sleeping prodigies on record. The Philosophical Transactions have several; in one, a man slept from August till January. There is a case, read before a society of physicians in 1766, of Elizabeth Orvin, who began her sleeping fit in 1738, by a four days' nap, and for ten years afterward never slept less than seventeen hours out of the four-and-twenty. Dr. Brady relates, that some strange methods were resorted to to rouse her—such as rubbing her back with honey, and in a hot day exposing her to a hive of bees, till her back was full of bumps—making a pincushion of her, and performing acu-puncturation with pins and needles—flagellation, and "other old experiments," which the doctor informs us he thinks better to "pass over in silence," all of which might as well have been spared, for she was very sulky and good for nothing when she was awake. This sulkiness, however, should be noticed, as being connected with the complaint. Previously to this somnolent disease, many of the persons have become uneasy, sullen, and surly. In all, the mind has evidently been affected; and in some, where there has been extreme abstinence, their waking hours have been characterized by decided mental aberration. Quarterly Jour.

TO *****

"And on that cheek, and o'er that brow,
 "So soft, so calm, yet eloquent,
 "The smiles that win, the tints that glow,
 "But tell of days in goodness spent,
 "A mind at peace with all below,
 "A heart whose love is innocent."

Is thy heart pure and gentle? do thine eyes
 Reflect indeed the feelings of a heart
 Replete with nature's gentlest sympathies?
 Is the smile on thy lips devoid of art?
 Is thy face but thy mind's fair counterpart?
 Ah! wherefore do I ask thee? can it be
 That the world's lessons even now impart
 Their cold suspicious caution unto me,
 That I should thus distrust, oh, gentle one! e'en thee?

Oh! once it had been unalloyed delight
 To meet with such an one as thou—and why
 Must other feelings now arise to blight
 So pure a source of happiness? for I
 Have driven thy sweet face far from my memory,
 Even as a thing I may not dwell upon;
 For thoughts of bitterness came rushing by,
 Clouding my heart, until I strove to shun
 The memory e'en of thee, thou young and guileless one!

Yes! vainly now I struggle to recall
 Thy sweet and open beauty—though still gleams
 Of its mild radiance on my spirit fall
 At intervals, still rise upon my dreams
 Those eyes of sunny light, whose smiling beams
 Seem fraught with hope and gladness—still I view
 That matchless mouth, whose perfect beauty seems
 Fresh from the sculptor's hand, save that its hue
 Of soft rich crimson, shows the painter's magic too.

Even now, although my heart is changed, 'tis sweet
 And soothing to my spirit, though it be
 Weary and worn with struggling, thus to meet,
 In this cold heartless world, with one like thee.
 O fresh young spirit! it is sweet to see
 Thy yet unpractised heart and spirit light,
 Frank e'en as childhood's, and as mildly free,
 Shedding, o'er all, its radiance, pure and bright,
 Till earth its first fair hue wears even to my sight.

Yet even in my happiest hours there dwells
 A touch of sadness; now, while on my ear
 Thy voice of melody entrancing swells,
 While in thy sunny smile, reflected clear,
 I see the gladness of a heart which ne'er
 Harboured a thought it feared or blushed to own,
 There comes a dim foreboding, sad and drear,
 Hushing that voice of music's sweetest tone, [throne.
 And quenching those bright eyes where gladness holds her

Prophet of evil! dark foreboding heart!
 Can mine eye gaze not on a form so fair
 But thou must dream of death's approaching dart,
 Marring the joyous beauty centred there?
 Yet there are blights more fatal—better far
 That thy young spirit's light be quenched, than be Darkened with earth's pollutions:—may the star
 Of thy yet spotless life its brilliancy [free.
 Ne'er lose, but set undimmed, from earth's dark cloudings

Oh! mildly beautiful, and gently good!
 Thy fair young brow no care doth yet o'ercast;
 Thou dost not yet o'er bitter feelings brood;
 Upon thy open brow thy soul is glassed;
 But soon this fairy period will be past,
 And thy pure thoughts be mixed with earth's alloy;
 For thou art verging on to manhood fast,
 And soon the world's cold maxims will destroy
 The freshness and the truth which clung around the boy!

BIOGRAPHY.

MOORE.

POETRY is almost coeval with the origin of society. Nations in general had poets, even before they were acquainted with the elements of literature. This assertion may seem problematical to many; but, if we reflect on the nature of the case, it is not so surprising as to be incredible. An occasional elevation of thought, a fit of animation, or a strong excitement, will lead the speaker into a course of diction superior to the tameness of ordinary conversation. Figurative and metaphorical language, forcible allusions and apt comparisons, drawn both from nature and from art, will offer themselves to the mind of one who unites imagination with talent; a measured cadence will soon follow; and this species of amusement will at length become an art. Thus poetry may be supposed to have arisen. Sometimes it was left to make its own impression without accompaniment. On other occasions it was aided by the rude music of early times. After the introduction of writing, it necessarily became more regular in its construction, more elegant and refined.

The earliest poets of whose genius we have any remains, were those of the Hebrew race. The Greeks subsequently became famous in the poetic art, and were apparently the first nation that reduced it to precise and systematic rules. But a servile adherence to rule is disclaimed by many modern bards, who think that poets are privileged to soar above all critical laws. Genius, indeed, ought not to be closely fettered; yet every branch of literature may be improved by rules, because, in general, they are founded on common sense. The writer who now demands our notice, is well acquainted with the dicta and the maxims of Aristotle and Longinus; and, if he does not always observe them, it is because he ventures sometimes to think for himself.

Mr. Thomas Moore was born in Dublin, about the year 1780. Being the son of a respectable merchant, he received a good education, first under Mr. White, an able instructor, and afterward at Trinity College, where his attainments as a classical scholar distinguished him above the generality of his fellow students. In the year 1795, he became a member of the society of the Middle Temple. It was then his intention to study the law; but he did not find it necessary to practise that profession. His inclinations leading him into another course, he devoted himself to poetry and elegant literature. His translation of Anacreon, published before he had completed his twenty-first year, evinced his learning and talent; and it was soon followed by a volume of poems, chiefly of an amatory complexion. Some of these pieces are neither loose nor indelicate; but others seem to require the apology which the author made for them, alleging that they were the "productions of an age when the passions very often give too warm a colouring to the imagination, which may palliate, if it cannot excuse, the air of levity that pervades so many of them."

In 1805 he procured an appointment which gave him an opportunity of visiting the United States. Being a strenuous advocate for freedom, he anxiously observed the nature of the government and the state of society in the republic. He then repaired to St. George, one of the Bermuda islands, and began to act as registrar to the vice-admiralty court; but he did not long execute the office in person, being content to resign one half of the emolument to a deputy, by whose imputed acts of embezzlement he was afterward subjected to trouble and vexation.

Continuing his literary pursuits, he at length established his fame by the beauties of Lalla Rookh. His illustration of a variety of national melodies, by appropriating characteristic poetry to each, highly gratified the public; and the subsequent productions of his muse did not—as is sometimes the case—detract from the prevailing opinion of his merit. He has also distinguished himself as a biographer. His Life of Sheridan is marked by spirit and ability, as well as by the graces of style; and it is free from that partiality which is too frequently shown where the life of a selected individual is the object. His acquaintance with the history of his native country is displayed in the supposed Memoirs of Captain Rock; and his satirical asperity is as conspicuous in that work, as in the account of the Fudge Family.

But of all his works, the one which we think most worthy of his genius and reputation, and which will be a durable monument to his fame, is "The Epicurean," published in 1827. Although written in prose, this is a poem, and a masterly poem, alike valued for its lustre and its purity. The style has all the liveliness which usually marks his compositions, and abounds in those sparkling illustrations which give animation to his poetic prose. Take, for example, some at random—"fountains and lakes, in alternate motion and repose, either wantonly courting the verdure, or calmly sleeping in its embrace"—"though Melancholy, as usual, stood always near, her shadow fell but half-way over my vagrant path, and left the rest more welcomingly brilliant from the contrast"—"I could distinguish some female tones, towering high and clear over all the rest, and forming the spire, as it were, into which the harmony lessened as it rose"—"I saw the love-bower and the tomb standing side by side, and pleasure and death keeping hourly watch upon each other." The design is simple, and exhibits no remarkable mechanical ingenuity; but it is executed with a flowing pencil, and in warm and brilliant colours. There is no straining after vehemence and sublimity; but there is, throughout, abundance of poetical thought and imagery, grace and refinement.

The chief features of Mr. Moore's poetry are grace and tenderness; yet he is not deficient in animation nor in force. He seems to pour forth his whole soul when he treats of the enchanting passion of love; and, if the other feelings of the heart are not so well delineated by him, he at least touches them with an elegant pencil. He may be styled the minstrel of the day; for he is at once a poet, singer, composer, and instrumental performer.

SPENCER.

Spencer was steeped in romance. He was the prince of magicians, and held the keys which unlocked enchanted doors. All the fantastic illusions of the brain belonged to him—the dreamer's secret, the madman's visions, the poet's golden hopes. He threw a rainbow across the heaven of poetry at a time when all seemed dark and unpromising. He was the very genius of personification; and yet his imagination was less exerted than his fancy. His spirit was idle, dreaming, and voluptuous. He seems as though he had slumbered through summer evenings in cave or forest, by Mulla's stream or the murmuring ocean. Giants and dwarfs, fairies, and knights, and queens, rose up at the waving of his charming rod. There was no meagreness in his fancy, no poverty in his details. His invention was without limit. He drew up shape after shape, scene after scene, castle and lake, woods and caverns, monstrous anomalies, and beautiful impossibilities, from the unfathomable depths of his mind. There is a prodigality and consciousness of wealth about his creations, which remind one of the dash and sweep of Rubens' pencil; but, in other respects, his genius differed materially from that of the celebrated Fleming. In colouring they are somewhat alike, and in the "Masque of Cupid" some of the figures even claim an affinity to the artist's shapes. But, generally speaking, Spencer was more ethereal and refined. Rubens was a decided painter of flesh and blood. He belonged to earth. His men were, indeed, sometimes chivalrous and intellectual—his beasts were grand and matchless—but his women were essentially of clay, and of a very homely fashion. Spencer sketched with more precision, and infinitely more delicacy. He had not the flash and fever of colouring which lighted up the productions of the other; but his genius was more spiritualized, his fancy traversed a lofty eminence, and loved to wander in remoter haunts. The brain of the one was like an ocean, casting up at a single effort the most common and extraordinary shapes; while the poet had a wilderness of fancy, from whose silent glades and haunted depths stole forth the airiest fictions of romance. The nymphs of Spencer are decidedly different from those of the painter; and his sylphs have neither the hideous looks of Poussin's carnal satyrs, nor that vinous spirit which flushes and gives life to the reeling Bacchanals of Rubens.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EMBLEMS.

I ask not of the autumn gale, with sore leaves on its wing,
Why the dim cloud outspreads its fold above the sky of spring;
Why the new buds were folded up, when its first tone was heard,
When to the far and bright southwest wandered the summer-bird;
Or why the stream gave back no more the image of the sky,
But with red trophies on its breast, went sad and moaning by;
While the harvest sheaves were gathering in, and the reaper's sickle shone,

Like a saddening thought in memory's brain, of visions that are gone.
Why should the spirit question thus, when soon the winter's wreath
Will fade on the far mountain's brow, at spring's awakening breath;
When its cloud-curtain soon will drop, and in the pleasant sky
The warm sweet voice of the year's birth, will echo wild and high;
While birds in its far depths will sit—and, thrilling from each mouth,
Will steal pervading melody, like tidings from the south;
When stream and leaf will glance, and thought will wander far and free,
Bringing new smiles and fresh delight, oh, nature! unto thee.

I asked not of the dying sun, why, when at evening-tide
His last red glance is cast abroad on the green upland side,
Why the glad influence of his smile may not yet linger on,
Or why his yellow locks should blend with twilight's fold of dun;
Day, night, and morn must come and go along the changeful sky,
Grateful with shadow and with shade to the inquiring eye;
All have a blessing in their birth—all hold a tranquil power,
Whether 'tis morn's awakening glow, or evening's pensive hour!

Thus should the soul in silence glaze, lit by pale memory's star,
Along the heaving tide of life, whose wrecks and bubbles are;
And tho' the light of joy is dim, tho' hope's warm dream hath fled—
Tho' the deep wind hath mournful tones along the shivering dead,
Still let the spirit look abroad, and onward, to the rest,
Which comes, as twilight-shadows steal along earth's verdant breast;
And chastered in the night of ill, amidst its shadowed gloom,
Look to the holy morn which breaks the darkness of the tomb!

THE DRAMA.

PLAYERS.

It is a curious fact, that the greatest actors have been produced in those nations where they have been the least esteemed as men. Among the Romans, theatrical declamation was carried to greater perfection than among the Greeks; and the Romans held actors as slaves, while in Greece they were freemen, and devoted to a profession which was not considered as dishonourable. No Greek writer mentions a single actor who had ever distinguished himself in his art; while the Romans speak with admiration of their Æsoppos and their Roscus—and yet the Paphian law prohibited the marriage of senators with women who had ever exhibited themselves on the stage. Modern nations are not less capricious. France has produced most skilful and distinguished actors, both comic and tragic, notwithstanding the prejudice which exists against them. In England this prejudice is not carried to quite so great a length. Lord Chatham corresponded with Garrick, and his ashes repose in Westminster Abbey. In this country, public opinion is not very favourable to professional players; the most distinguished for talent do not rank very high in society, and however much they may be admired, they are not allowed to mingle on equal terms with those who constitute the best society of our cities. This is owing to the force of public opinion, which will not be easily changed, whether it be well or ill founded. In this country, where the most splendid field is open to legal or medical talent and industry, the occupation of a "poor player, who struts and frets his hour upon the stage," is not one, however alluring the fame may be which it promises, that will induce many to follow it. In this profession, however, no ordinary man can attain perfection or fame. A great actor must be a man of genius; he must unite to the intellectual many of the best physical powers. The tragedian should be the creature of passion, and possess great sensibility and intelligence, as well as a fine person and a good voice. He should, according to Talma, himself an admirable model, be gifted with an imagination which "associates him with the inspiration of the poet, transports him back to times that are past, and renders him present and identified with those historical personages or impassioned beings which have been created by genius; which reveal to him, as if by magic, their physiognomy, their heroic stature, their language, their habits, all the shades of their character, all the movements of their soul, and all their singularities—and which enables him to enter into the most tragic situations, and the most terrible of the passions, as if they were his own." These remarks are unquestionably correct. To express passion in all its shades and varieties, it must have been felt; and the actor must be liable to the extremes of passion, and consult and study his own nature, before he can exhibit them in all the truth and power of reality. "In my own person," says the same celebrated French tragedian, "in any circumstance of my life in which I experienced deep sorrow, the passion of the theatre was so strong in me, that, although oppressed with real sorrow, and in the midst of the tears I shed, I made, in spite of myself, a rapid and fugitive observation on the alteration of my voice, and on a certain spasmodic vibration which it contracted in tears; and I say it not without some shame, I even thought of making use of it on the stage, and, indeed, this experiment on myself has often been of service to me." Lekain is said, in his latter years, to have fallen passionately in love with a Madam Benoit, whom he always placed in the first side-wing of the theatre whenever he played, and addressed to her all the expressions of tenderness and love which he had to speak to the actress playing with him, to give real force and tenderness to those expressions. Much of this power, however, is the effect of imitation. Garrick is said to have witnessed the agony of a man who had accidentally let fall from his arms, while dandling it in a piazza, a child whom he almost madly loved, and the player always availed himself of this terrible picture in his personation of Lear. But these imitations are not peculiar to the player—the poet and the painter are alike influenced by them. Michael Angelo is reported to have stabbed his brother, that he might transfuse the contortions of his features, in the agony of death, on the canvass. Ariosto excited a violent burst of rage in his father, and, in ecstasy, allowed him to indulge it, that he might describe an angry father with greater power, in a comedy he was then composing.

A tragedian does not require more talent, but he must possess more power, sensibility, and enthusiasm, than a comedian. The comedian represents incidents, and personates characters, that he sees every day, and with which he is familiar; his imagination has less exercise; he is acting in the sphere in which he, in fact, revolves; he has only to employ the faculty of imitation in representing the little passions, follies, and weaknesses of those in his own condition in life: but his observation must be accurate; if he exaggerate or fall short of nature, it will be immediately observed by those before whom he appears, who, from their own experience, are always capable of judging of the correctness of the copy they are contemplating. "The tragic actor, on the contrary, must quit," says Talma, very properly, "the circle in which he is accustomed to live, and launch into the high regions where the genius of the poet has placed and clothed, in ideal forms, the beings conceived by his imagination, or already furnished him by the pen of history. As to the physical qualities, it is evident that the pliability of the features, and the expression of the countenance, ought to be stronger, the voice more full, sonorous, and more profoundly articulate in the tragic actor, who stands in need of certain combinations, and more than ordinary powers, to perform, from beginning to end, with the same energy, a part in which the author has frequently collected in a narrow compass, and in the space of two hours, all the movements, all the agitations, which an impassioned being can often only feel in the course of a long life. When we," he then asks, "consider all the qualities necessary to form an excellent tragic actor, all the gifts which nature ought to have bestowed on him, can we be surprised that such actors are so rare?" We close these remarks with the following anecdote, which serves to exhibit the admiration which the tragic talents of Talma could excite:

Having entered into an engagement to perform at Bordeaux, he received the following curious letter, previously to his arrival, addressed

"TO THE SON OF MELPOMENE.

"SIR—I have only six francs, and am without resource. I hear you are to honour the town with your presence, and that at the very moment when I propose to put an end to my life. I therefore defer my project in admiration of your talents, which I know only by your fame. I conjure you, then, to hasten your visit, that I may admire you, and expire. Refuse not the desires of your fellow-creature, who, being able to live only four days, has divided the sum which remains, as follows:

Four days' nourishment,	3 francs	0 sous.
Fit,	2 do.	10 do.
Poison,	0 do.	10 do.
	6 francs.

THE ESSAYIST.

TIME.

THERE never was any thing so warred against as time. Many men are, by profession, time-killers; and most persons are, more or less, in a constant state of hostility with that which, if rightly treated, is man's best friend. Some do not hesitate to style time "the enemy;" and others, while they pretend a friendship for it, fail not to treat it as a foe. But still time exists in spite of all the attempts of man against its life, and pursues its uninterrupted course, while successive generations of mortals perish by its side.

Of time-killers by profession there are numbers. Of these, the idler boasts of being the greatest, though in fact he is the least successful. The only gratification of his life consists in a few certain meals, and some incidental circumstances. The time not taken up in these is to him a dreary blank, which he would, if possible, annihilate. After breakfast, he starts to kill time till dinner; and from dinner till supper he pursues the same game; but at night his bag is still empty. Miserable sportsman! he cannot even produce a few feathers from the wings of time, so bad a marksman is he. Time is in fact making game of him, and leads him a will-o'-the-wisp dance from morn till night. With no one do the hours pass more heavily. The hour-glass seems, as it were, to float before his sight, and the more his eye is fixed on it, the slower appears the sand to flow.

The libertine is also by profession a time-killer; but while he levels desperate blows at "the enemy," his more cautious opponent retaliates with a surer aim. His very exertions to maim the foe only tend to weary, weaken, and destroy himself.

The man of pleasure, though in some measure a time-killer, is more properly a time-driver. He would make a slave of time. He would yoke it to his chariot-wheels; he would drive it his own pace; and when he pleased, he would drive it away altogether. But time is a restive beast, and will not submit to be so treated: it obeys neither the lash nor the rein; and the more he tries to get rid of it, the more it haunts him.

The man of the world is a pretended friend of time. He courts its favour, and would fain turn it to account. But time is not so easily caught. It appears for a short period to lend itself to his projects. It poises for a moment on its wings; but this is only that it may take the better aim; then pounces on its prey, and with a fell sweep of its scythe mows down all his schemes of happiness, and scatters his hopes to the winds.

The busy man may be considered as a time-hunter.

He is ever engaged in a breathless pursuit of time. He grasps the shadow, but the substance escapes.

The indolent man has not the spirit either to attack or to pursue time: he is, therefore, neither a time-killer nor a time-hunter, but a time-catcher. He is constantly laying traps for time; but his bird-lime snares never succeed; and while he is trying to catch time, it hops out of his reach.

The sycophant, every one knows, is a time-server; and perhaps, of all the meddlers with time, he is the only one who appears to profit by his business; for it must be acknowledged that he too often succeeds in his worldly schemes.

O Time! how art thou bothered and bantered! The fool loses thee; the wise man finds thee; the sportsman runs against thee; the gamster bets against thee; the fiddler keeps thee; the dancing-master kicks thee; and the drummer beats thee. So that, poor Time! thou art lost, found, jostled, cheated, kept, kicked, and beaten! and yet, after all this ill-usage, thou dost not appear a whit the worse for wear.

But though time is thus treated by the world, there is a period at which every one would fain claim its indulgence or arrest its steps. "One short moment for repentance!" cries the dying sinner. "A long day!" prays the condemned culprit. "A short time longer!" exclaims the unsatisfied sensualist. "If I had but time!" sighs the worldly schemer. And yet all these either have been, or are, engaged in open or disguised hostility with the very object whose compassion they solicit, or whose flight they deplore.

My poor friend, Sir Pendulum Pivot, was the most unlucky wight in his dealings with time that ever I met with. He was a professed economist of time, and yet he never had a moment to spare. His mind was a kind of balance-wheel, ever vibrating between the right and the wrong; so that, in deciding upon neither, he left every thing undone. His watch was constantly in his hand, and yet he kept no watch upon himself. His house was full of time-keepers; and though time was thus ever staring him in the face, he was always, most paradoxically, either before or behind his time. In music he was sure to be out of time; and in dancing he never could keep time, though, like other fops, he had a glaring pair of clocks at each ankle. In the literal sense of the word, he was a time-server; and yet ungrateful time served him at last a scurvy trick; for the poor knight died of vertigo, because the surgeon could not arrive in time to bleed him.

He only is the truly wise man who, knowing the nature and the value of time, conforms himself to its movements, and seeks to benefit by its presence; neither endeavouring to accelerate nor to retard its pace; being aware that time waits for no man, he wisely waits upon time. Time is then to him as the bark in which he sails; it moves, but he perceives not its progress. Thus he floats quietly down the stream of life, till time at length launches him into the ocean of eternity.

SONG.

To love thee was the easiest task
Affection ever taught me;
But now I'm forced with smiles to mask
The wo that task has wrought me.
I saw thee fond, and thought thee true,
And swiftly flew my hours;
But oh, I wove a wreath of rue,
Which I mistook for flowers.
Then go, deceiver, haste away,
To me be lost for ever,
Since I am doomed to hail the day
That shall our fortunes sever.
Yes, go, nor let me see again
That smile, love's treacherous token,
Lest I once more resume my chain,
And this poor heart be broken.

THE SEPARATION.

"Lorsque l'on aime comme il faut,
"Le moindre éloignement nous tue;
"Et ce, dont on cherit la vue,
"Ne revient jamais assez tôt."

He's gone, dear Fanny!—gone at last—
We've said good by—and all is over;
'Twas a gay dream—but it is past—
Next Tuesday he will sail from Dover.
Well! gentle waves be round his prow;
But tear and prayer alike are idle;
Oh! who shall fill my album now?
And who shall hold my pony's bridle?

Last night he left us after tea—
I never thought he'd leave us—never;
He was so pleasant—wasn't he?
Papa, too, said he was so clever!
And, Fanny, you'll be glad to hear,
That little boy, that looked so yellow,
Whose eyes were so like his, my dear,
Is a poor little orphan fellow.

That odious Miss Lucretia Browne,
Who, with her horrid pugs and libels,
Is always running through the town,
And circulating tracts and bibles;
Because he never danced with her,
Told dear mamma such horrid scandal,
About his moral character,
For stooping just to tie a sandal!

She said he went to fights and fairs—
That always gives papa the fidgets;
She said he did not know his prayers—
He's every Sunday at St. Bridget's;
She said he squeezed one's waist and hands,
Where'er he waited—a plague upon her!—
I danced with him at Lady Bland's,
He never squeezed me—'pon my honour!

His regiment have got the rout—
They came down here to quell the riot,
And now what can they be about?
The stupid people are so quiet:—
They say it is to India, too—
If there, I'm sure he'll get the liver!
And should he bathe—he used to do—
They've crocodiles in every river.

There may be bright eyes there, and then!—
I'm sure I love him like a brother;—
His lute will soon be strung again,
His heart will soon beat for another.
I know him well! he is not false—
But when the song he loves is playing,
Or after he has danced a waltz,
He never knows what he is saying.

I know 'twas wrong—'twas very wrong—
To listen to his wild romancing;
Last night I danced with him too long—
One's always giddy after dancing:
But when he begged me so to sing,
And when he sighed, and ask'd me, would I?
And when he took my turquoise ring,
I'm sure I could not help it, could I?

Papa was lecturing the girls,
And talked of settlements and rentals;
I wore a white-lace frock—and pearls—
He looked so well in regimentals!
And just before we came away,
While we were waiting for the carriage,
I heard him, not quite plainly, say
Something of blacksmiths—and of marriage.

He promised, if he could get leave,
He'd soon come back—I wonder, can he?
Lord Hill is very strict, I b'lieve.—
What could he mean by blacksmiths, Fanny?—
He said he wished we ne'er had met.—
I answered—it was lovely weather!
And then he bade me not forget
The pleasant days we passed together.

He's gone—and other lips may weave
A stronger spell than mine to bind him;
But bid him, if he love me, leave
Those rhymes he made me love, behind him:
Tell him I know those wayward strings
Not always sound to mirthful measures;
But sighs are sometimes pleasant things,
And tears from those we love are treasures.

Tell him to leave off drinking wine,
Tell him to break himself of smoking,
Tell him to get to bed at nine—
His hours are really quite provoking.
Tell him I hope he won't get fat,
Tell him to act with due reflection;
Tell him to wear a broad-leaved hat,
Or else he'll ruin his complexion.

Tell him I am so ill to-day—
Perhaps to-morrow I'll be better;
Tell him before he goes away,
To write me a consoling letter:
Tell him to send me down that song
He said he loved the best of any—
Tell him I'm sure I can't live long,
And—bid him love me—won't you, Fanny?

COURT ANECDOTES.

JUST REPROOF.

WHEN Holbein the painter was privately drawing a lady's picture for Henry the eighth, a nobleman forced himself violently into the chamber. Holbein resenting this violation of his privacy, threw him down stairs; the peer cried out; Holbein bolted himself in, escaped over the roof of the house, and running directly to the king, fell on his knees, and besought his majesty to pardon him without declaring the offence. The king promised to forgive him, if he would tell the truth. Immediately arrived the lord with his complaint. After hearing the whole, his majesty said to the nobleman—"You have behaved in a manner unworthy your rank. I tell you, of seven peasants I can make as many lords, but not one Holbein. Begone, and remember this, if you ever pretend to avenge yourself, I shall look on any injury you do the painter as done to me."

A BOLD RELIANCE.

In Mr. Fox's frolicsome days, a tradesman, who held his bill for two hundred pounds, called for payment. Charles said he could not then discharge it. "How can that be?" said the creditor; "you have just now lying before you bank-notes to a large amount." "Those," replied Mr. Fox, "are for paying my debts of honour." The tradesman immediately threw his bill into the fire. "Now, sir," said he, "mine is a debt of honour, which I cannot now oblige you to pay." Charles, much to his honour, instantly paid him his full demand.

FREE AND EASY.

Frederick, while reviewing his guard, happened to take out his snuff-box, and was tapping on the lid, when one of his grenadiers stepped out of the ranks, and said, "Please your majesty, I'll take a pinch." The king demanded, in an angry tone, what he meant by such a freedom, and he replied, "In my country, sire, when any one taps on the box, it is a sign that every body round is welcome to a pinch, and I thought your majesty meant as much." The king laughed at this odd explanation of an odd custom, and presented the box, a gold one, enriched with jewels, to the soldier, bidding him keep it for his sake.

A MIRROR FOR VANITY.

Queen Elizabeth, admiring the elegance of the Marquis de Villa de Mediana, a Spanish nobleman, complimented him on it, begging, at the same time, to know who possessed the heart of so accomplished a cavalier? "Madam," said he, "a lover risks too much on such an occasion; but your majesty's will is a law. Excuse me, however, if I fear to name her; but request your majesty's acceptance of her portrait." He sent her a looking-glass!

POWER OF BEAUTY.

Olympias suspected that Philip of Macedon, her husband, withdrew his attachment to her in favour of a Thessalian lady. Falling in with the superstitious opinion of the day concerning the people of Thessaly, the queen suspected that her rival had used magic arts to seduce the affections of Philip. Stimulated by the desire of revenge, and abhorrence of the frail Thessalian's frauds, she rushed into her presence. On the first sight of the beauty of complexion, and symmetry of features, and form of her rival, the awe-struck queen exclaimed, "I see, lady, and forgive your sorcery: it consists in your charms alone. To look upon you, is, at the same moment, to love you." Proud and vindictive as she was, she exhibited this rare instance of jealousy disarmed by beauty. It was this same Olympias who said of a young man of the court of Macedon, that had married a beautiful woman of a very doubtful character, that he had indeed consulted his eyes, but not his ears.

A DEAR BARGAIN.

Louis XI. in his youth, used to visit a peasant, whose garden produced excellent fruit. When he ascended the throne, his old friend presented him a turnip of extraordinary size. The king smiled, and remembering his past pleasures, ordered a thousand crowns to the peasant. The lord of the village hearing of this liberality, thus argued with himself: "If this fellow get a thousand crowns for his turnip, I have only to present a capital horse to the munificent monarch, and my fortune is made." Accordingly, he carries to court a beautiful barb, and requests his majesty's acceptance of it. Louis highly praised the steed, and the donor's expectation was raised to the highest, when the king called out, "Bring me my turnip!" and presenting it to the seigneur, added, "This turnip cost me a thousand crowns, and I give it to you for your horse."

SKETCHES OF SOCIETY.

A SKETCH OF A FRENCH YOUNG LADY,

EDUCATED AT A CONVENT.

ADDRESSED TO A YOUNG ENGLISH LADY.

A FRENCH young lady, at sixteen or seventeen years of age, goes from a convent into the world—you know what a convent is—the nuns, with whom she has lived ever since her childhood, restore her to her parents, who frequently the same day deliver her to a husband—her only previous acquaintance with whom consisted in some frigid compliments paid her through a grate. She can say her beads, the angelus, the benedicite, the thanksgiving; she has learned a hundred ways of recommending herself to the saint whose name she bears, to her guardian angel, to the patron saint of the order and of the convent. She has read more than once some extracts of the legend; she knows a number of marvellous tricks which demons and spirits play in this lower world; she is ignorant of none of those little pastimes with which the imagination and judgment of girls are exercised; she can colour images, and adorn with straw and gilt paper an Agnus Dei or a holy relic, as elegantly as a professed nun. Perhaps she also knows how to embroider a flower in gold or silk, and in thread on cloth, to work à la marli, to make buckles of ribands, and even to knit stockings. She has received in the great parlour some lessons of the minuet and country dance; she makes admirably well the most profound courtesies. Lastly, if she is fond of music, the matron grand chantress will take a pleasure in teaching her to sol-fa, and she will sing most devoutly little hymns and long canticles.

See, madam, how far they go—the knowledge, the talents, the attainments, of a young Frenchwoman of quality, who has been well educated. The mother glories in having a daughter so well formed for the world; she pretends to discover that she does not hold up her head, that she has a shoulder too high, or an awkward air, to have it thought that she may still be improved, so as to become a prodigy. The young lady, enriched with such an ample collection of accomplishments, is placed at the head of a numerous and splendid household, is presented at court, introduced into all companies, given up to the great world, and it is recommended to her to become a wife within the year.

The above has been translated from an old French work, and thus parodied with reference to the march of mind in the education of English females:

ADDRESSED TO A CHINESE LADY.

An English young lady at sixteen or seventeen years of age, sometimes sooner, goes from a boarding-school into the world—you know what a boarding-school is:—the governess with whom she has lived ever since her childhood—except during the holidays—restores her to her parents, who, frequently the same day, introduce her to their friends, of whom she knows a little by a few cold caresses she has received from them in her mamma's drawing-room, when at home for the holidays, before being brought out. She knows very well how to conduct herself at church, repeat her prayers, and note down the heads of the sermon. She has a hundred ways of recommending herself to the world for her devotion to the religion she professes—her own conscience, and the patroness of the Bible Society to which she belongs. She has read, at least once, all the popular novels; she knows a number of extraordinary tricks which lords and ladies play in the fashionable world; she is ignorant of none of those little flirtations with which the imagination and judgment of girls are exercised; she can paint flowers, and adorn chimney-pieces with straw and gilt paper, and other nic-nacs, as elegantly as a supplier to one of the bazars. Perhaps she also knows how to embroider a flower on muslin, in worsted or satin-stitch, to work en appliqué, make bead-bracelets, and even gentlemen's watch-guards. She has been taught in the dancing-room how to walk a quadrille, and in the coach-house how to step into a carriage; gives admirable stares, and inimitable nods. Lastly, if she is found to have no taste nor talents for music, the singing-master must bestow the more pains in teaching her to sol-fa, and she will scream most confidently little opera airs, and play long concertos.

Think, madam, how wonderful are the knowledge and acquirements of a young English lady of rank, who has been fashionably educated! The mother exults in introducing a daughter so well tutored to play her character—affirms she is all talent, beauty, and elegance—completely finished—an absolute phoenix. The young lady, enriched with so many perfections, finds herself the leader of a numerous and flattering set of acquaintances—is presented at Almack's—goes to every party—devotes herself to fashion—and is advised by her mamma to become the bride of the most eligible man that offers before the close of the season.

A JUDICIOUS TITLE.

On a vacancy in the Scotch bench, a certain advocate, of some standing at the bar, but by no means remarkable for the brilliancy of his parts or the extent of his legal knowledge, was in full expectation of being appointed to the vacant gown. This is done by a court letter, signed with the king's sign manual. In the full flutter of his darling hopes, he one day encountered an old brother lawyer, notorious for the acidity of his temper and the poignancy and acrimony of his remarks. "Weel, friend Robby," said the latter, "I hear ye're to get the vacant goon." "Yes, Mr. C—k, I have reason to believe so. "Have ye gotten doon your letter yet frae London?" "No; but I expect an express every minute." "Nae doot, nae doot. Have you bethought yoursel o' what teetle ye're to tak? Lord H—n will never do: ye ken that's the teetle o' ane o' oor grandest dukes. Gude sake, for a bit session lordy like you to gang by the style and teetle o' ane high and mighty prince! my certy, that would be a bonny boorlesque on a' warldly honours and dignities. Weel-a-weel, let that be a pass over. Noo a teetle ye maun hae, that's as clear as the licht, and there's ane come just now into my head that will answer ye to a T: when ye're a lord, freend Robby, ye'll be Lord Preserve Us!" "You are very impertinent, Mr. C—k," replied the nettled judge expectant; "I am sure you may find a waur" (worse.) There never perhaps was, or will be, comprehended so much pithy meaning and bitter sarcasm in a single syllable, as that which formed the astounding response—"Whaur?" (where!)

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Military Parade Ground.—From late proceedings in the common council, it still appears to be the determination of most of its members to destroy this public square. A proposition to this effect has been laid before them and acted upon. Such a project cannot fail to excite the astonishment of the citizens; but should it succeed, we believe it will have to encounter stronger marks of disapprobation than any other scheme, however wild, within our recollection. So far from being able to comprehend the wisdom of the measure, we are free to confess, that, in our view of the subject, it carries with it the marks of the grossest folly, not to say stupidity. In place of doing what is here proposed, we would appeal to the good sense of every man in the city, and ask if it would not be more in accordance with his views to continue the square, and, at a future period, to embellish it by double rows of trees inside the paling, between which a handsome gravelled walk might be made? Have the corporation set their faces against every thing like public improvement and convenience? Are ornaments and good air repugnant to their feelings, and offensive to their senses? This being the only suitable square in the whole city, we would ask how and where the troops, now so numerous and respectable, and who reflect credit on the state, are, at a future day, to be assembled and perform their evolutions? Can it be that the sage gentleman who brought forward the resolution, thought of this matter at the time of doing what he did? And does he think, forsooth, to raise a vain and empty popularity by the project? If he does, we apprehend he will find, in the end, that he has laboured under an egregious mistake. We pity such weakness as much as we despise such folly.

This proposition, savouring so strongly of ignorance and littleness, of narrow views and paltry conceptions, is an argument which bears on its face the stamp of conviction, and which the citizens ought not to forget, of the necessity of another chamber in the corporation, in order that a timely check might be given to schemes which originate either in corrupt motives, or in the senseless brain of would-be great men. We think we have never heard of a case which more strikingly verifies Franklin's remark, that "a collection of wise men is at times the greatest fool in the world." We shall recur to this subject hereafter.

Economy!—It has been whispered that the common council, in order to show their adherence to those doctrines of rigid economy so commendable in prudent rulers, and so characteristic of the wisdom of the age, have it in contemplation to remodel the old jail, with a view to making it a place of deposit for public records, &c. &c. As this cardinal virtue, economy, is in such high estimation, and is one which ought never to be lost sight of, especially among those enlightened statesmen and lawgivers who have no sinister designs to cover, we most cordially yield it our unqualified homage and devotion! In the present instance, we feel ourselves called upon to add our tribute of admiration of the proposed plan, provided it be true, inasmuch as it may be the means of preserving from meditated destruction an edifice which has long been the ornament and boast of the city! The order of its architecture, however, we have never been able to learn. Among the different orders is one, we understand, called the composite; but we believe it does not come under that class—we should say it approached nearer to the nondescript; though we have never been able to find that order in any work on architecture that we have ever examined. Be this as it may, we must all concur in one sentiment, and that is, the regret it would occasion were it resolved upon to deprive the citizens of an old and familiar object, one on which they are accustomed to gaze with complacency and delight, and one presenting all the imposing features of transcendent beauty!

Let us not, for a moment, lose sight of that leading virtue, economy, so much and so ably defended by all writers and spouters, but so little practised by any one. We often advert, with feelings of no ordinary pleasure, to its practical illustration in the early settlement of the city; in the numberless curves of the streets and alleys, their narrowness, and the want of yard-room to the houses; all going to show how well our ancestors understood the true meaning of the term. They taught a salutary lesson of wisdom, by practising what they professed. And shall their descendants dare to disregard this monitory lesson? Forbid it, all ye lovers of the relics of antiquity—all ye admirers of the beauty of deformity!

Since some of our wise men would seem to be "with a saving knowledge blessed," we ask permission to suggest a plan which, in all likelihood, would be the means of producing a considerable revenue. It is known that wild beasts, and other curious animals, brought from beyond sea, and from regions little frequented, are constantly exhibited in our famed metropolis for the gratification and wonder of inquisitive people. Now if these animals were congregated, in place of occupying so many different positions, they would constitute a respectable menagerie. And if the jail or bridewell could be set apart for that purpose, would it not be advantageously and profitably occupied? And since they are so conveniently and centrally situated, would not the public feel the benefit of it? The scheme comes recommended, too, by other considerations, deriving importance from the fact, that splendid portraits are daily exposed, of the numerous animals now concealed in cages. It is therefore manifest, that if all these were suspended on the exterior of the building, whilst the living creatures occupied the interior, here would be such an assemblage of objects for the contemplation of the naturalist, and the lover of the fine arts, as to become at once a school of science and a temple of genius!

Nora's Vow.—We feel great pleasure in being enabled, in the present number, to present our subscribers with a splendid piece of original music.

I.
HEAR what highland Nora said:
"The carlie's son I winna wed:
"Should a' the race o' nature dee,
"And nane be left but I and he,
"For a' the goud, for a' the gear,
"And a' the lands, baith far and near,
"That ever valour lost or won,
"I wadna wed the carlie's son."

II.
"A maiden's vows," auld Callum spoke,
"Are lightly made, and lightly broke.
"The heather on the mountain's height
"Begins to bloom on purple light;
"The frost-wind soon shall sweep away
"That lustre deep frae glen and brae;
"Yet Nora, ere its bloom be gone,
"May blithely wed the carlie's son."

III.
"The swan," she said, "the loch's clear breast
"May barter for the eagle's nest;
"The Awe's fierce stream may backward turn,
"Ben Crashan fa', and crush Kilchurn;
"Our kilted clans, when blude is high,
"Before their foes may turn and fly;
"But I, war' a' these marvels done,
"Wad never wed the carlie's son."

IV.
Still in the water-lily's shade
Her wonted nest the wild swan made;
Ben-Crashan stands as fast as ever;
Still downward foams the Awe's fierceriver;
To shun the clash o' foeman's steel,
No highland brogue has turned the heel;
But Nora's heart is lost and won—
She's wedded to the carlie's son!

ON BEING DUNNED.

I.
Oh, no! I never mention him,
His name's too often heard;
My very shadow seems to bear
A hatred to that word.
From court to court they hurry me,

In spite of my regret;
And when they win a note from me,
They think that I forget.

II.
They bid me seek, in change of scene,
The charms that others see;
But were I in a foreign land,

They'd find no change in me.
'Tis true that I behold no more
The prison where we've met;
But then I see, my "chere amie"—
And how can I forget?

III.
They tell me he is careless now,

And thoughtless of "the day"—
They hint that he forgets me too—
But heed not what they say;
Like me, perhaps, they'll struggle with
Writs, creditors, and debt;
But if they're dunn'd as I've been dunn'd,
They never can forget!

ZAMOR.

THE air was basking in the noontide among the hills that are traversed by the rapid Erigon. The woody sides of the valleys which opened upon the river, lay slumbering in breezy dimness; but the sky was blue and bright around the breasts and peaks of the mountains, except where broad white clouds, floating high and swift between them and the sun, varied the landscape by occasional sweeps of shadow. The sparkling and winding water flowed silently along the green bases of the eminence, and its surface was marked by nothing but the differences of colour occasioned by the wind and stream, and by the fresh-looking islets of water-plants, or the trunk of a tree rolling down the current, and showing its brown branches, or the white rent of its stem, among the shining ripples. Down one of the glens which descend toward the stream, a boy of thirteen or fourteen years of age was slowly wandering. He was tall, and of a noble presence. His open and up-turned brow was surrounded with careless ringlets of light brown hair, and was shaded by a low cap or bonnet, in which he wore an eagle's feather. His dark coloured kirtle descended to his knee, over trowsers which left the leg exposed above the sandal. A belt of wolf's skin sustained a short sword, and confined his dress around the waist; and he led with the left hand, in a twisted chain of gold, a large and powerful dog, while, in his right, he carried a strong hunting spear, the point of which gleamed like a star above his head. His features were of a regular and spirited beauty; and his quick eye perpetually glanced from the path he was pursuing to the mountains round him and the skies beyond. He proceeded in his devious and negligent course, now sinking into thought, now rushing and leaping over rocks and bushes, while the dog sprang up, and barked, and sported round him, till he reached an irregular and broken wood, which spread, though with many intervals, along the green banks of the river.

The boy threw himself under the shade of an oak, where he had a glimpse of the cool water among the stems of the trees; and his canine friend couched quietly by his side, now looking up into his face, now rubbing his legs with its nose, and wagging its bushy tail, now closing its eyes, and sinking with a sigh into a tranquil doze. The youth, too, was so still, that he might have been thought to slumber, had not his restless glances indicated a stir within. It was, indeed, a mind not formed for inactivity; but its present thoughts were rather the overflowing and sport of its vigour, than the application of it to any definite end. He remembered the oracles which had spoken among the ancient oaks of Epirus, till he almost heard the promise of his own greatness sounding from the trees, while they trembled and rustled around and above him. And then came imaginations of the Dryads, the forest spirits, so beautiful and so capricious, who were accustomed to fly from men, and dedicate their loveliness to the green-wood shade. As the breeze moved the shadow of some branch, he started to think that he saw the waving of the airy locks; and he beheld for a moment the twinkle of the light footsteps, in the casual breach of a sunbeam through the foliage, on the dark ground of the vistas before him. These visions passed away, and in their place seemed sweeping through the distant obscurity of the thicket the pomp and triumph of Bacchus—the youth with arms and wine-cups, and baskets of gorgeous fruits unknown to Europe, the dark eyes and glowing limbs of damsels, whose wreaths of oriental flowers shook fragrance through the air, while swiftly and gracefully they flung aloft and struck together their ringing cymbals, ancient Pan with a world of merriment in his pipe, and, amid a tumult of green coronals and wild exultations, the young conqueror himself drawn forward by his lions, with the pride of a hundred victories on his brow, and the joyousness of a hundred vintages on his lips, and a spear so often washed in wine, and so clustered with grapes and ivy berries, half hid among their foliage, that not a trace of its myriad death-stains was visible. They gloamed for a moment from the recesses of the green maze on the eye of the dreaming boy; and why should not he too be the conqueror of Asia, and his banners return over the Hellespont, laden and glittering with the spoils of the Euphrates and the Indus?

He rose while he thought it, so hastily that his dog gave a slight cry at feeling the pull which his collar received from the arm of his master, who stepped forward eagerly for an instant, while his right hand grasped the spear with an energy indicating, even then, how bold would be the spirit, and how wide the fame, of Alexander the son of Philip.

He walked forward for a few minutes with boyish impetuosity, when his attention was diverted by seeing a large blue butterfly, which flew across his path. He freed from the collar the chain which held Lacon, and pursued the insect; while the dog, in imitation of his master, rushed barking, and eager in pursuit of the same wandering object. It led him among the hills which he had before left, never coming within his reach, but never mounting so far away as to make him relinquish the pursuit. It flew at last over the edge of a precipice into a broken and narrow dell; but the fearless and active boy dropped from the verge, and, after scrambling for a minute or two among the rocks and bushes, reached the end of the descent. It was a wild and lonely hollow, on the steep banks and narrow area of which the pine and the cypress rose above the thick under-growth of weeds, shrubs, and flowers. The insect still hovered before its pursuer; and, after a few steps, he found that he had followed it into an ancient cemetery. The tombs seemed to have been mouldering in neglect for centuries, and merely a few irregular mounds, and broken fragments of walls, remained. Beyond one of these relics of building, now covered with different vigorous creepers, the bright blue wings disappeared. He went to the spot, and found that, beyond the dilapidated wall, the sun streamed in upon a little patch of grass. Here the insect had poised itself upon a human skull, half covered with moss, and crowned by a natural wreath of trailing honey-suckle. Thus was perched the beautiful and airy creature he had been chasing, with its azure fans expanded, and glittering in the sunshine. It seemed the immortal Psyche, the spiritual life, waiting to take wing from amid the dust and decay of mortality. The boy leaped over the obstruction, and stooped to seize it; but it vibrated for an instant the splendid pennons which served it for sails, and rose swiftly and far above the head of the disappointed pursuer. He looked after it for a few seconds, and Lacon bayed fiercely at the soaring insect; but his owner stooped again to the relic; for, when he had previously bent toward the butterfly, he had seen what appeared to be metal shining on the turf. It was a large gold coin which lay between the teeth of the skull. The device of an eye within a circle was distinctly visible on one side, and on the other was traced, in the oldest character Alexander had ever seen, the word ZAMOR.

He restored the coin to its place; but, such was his recollection of the occurrence, that the signet wherewith, in after years, he sealed Hephæstion's lips, bore the device of a butterfly poised upon a skull, with the motto ZAMOR.

The youth was a youth no more. He was, in all the vigour and beauty of manhood, a sovereign and a conqueror, and roamed no longer in the woods of Macedonia, but in the deep gloom of an Indian forest. He had outstripped his train in the eagerness of the chase; and, when the thick jungle prevented him from continuing his course on horseback, he leaped from the saddle, and pierced his way on foot. His mantle was now of regal splendour, and his light helmet was encircled with a slender diadem of gold. The garment which fell from under his inlaid cuirass to his knee, was interwoven with silver thread, and his sandals were studded with jewels. His lips had gained the firm expression of will and power, and thought had left its stamp upon his forehead.

He speedily penetrated through the thicket which had interrupted him, and found himself in a little glade, surrounded by spreading trees. He stood still, and gazed for a moment; and it seemed to him that he heard, not far off, the half-stifled sobs of sorrow. He moved in the direction of the sound, and, after pushing through a screen of bushes, found himself near an old man, who knelt upon the ground, close to the trunk of a great tree; and, while his clasped hands trembled on his shuddering breast, the tears fell thickly from his eyes. He wore the dress of a Brahmin. Beside him lay the corpse of a girl, apparently twelve or thirteen years of age. Though her skin was rather more dusky than that of Europeans, she was very beautiful in the eyes of the king. Her round and shining limbs were of the most exquisite delicacy; the long black hair, wreathed with white flowers, fell loose over her maiden bosom, which had ceased to heave with the breath of life. An arrow had pierced her through the body, and the blood had flowed to the knees of the old man, and stained his garments. He was a father wailing over his murdered child.

Alexander silently approached, and saw, that on the left breast of the lovely form, in which the heart no longer stirred, a blue butterfly had placed itself. The agony and tears of the parent did not disturb it. He touched the hair and fingers of the body with a trembling affection, and gazed at it long and passionately; and then again his whole frame was shaken, and he burst into a paroxysm of grief. As the king drew near, the insect rose and soared away to the heavens. Alas! that, like it, the corpse could not raise itself from the dust it adorned, and move again in all the vivacity and grace of its former existence!

The conqueror spoke in a low, reverential, and sympathising voice, to the bereaved father. The old man started at the sound, rose to his feet, and shook off, as far as nature permitted him, the tokens of his agony. Alexander asked him by what misfortune he had lost his daughter. "The soldiers," replied the Brahmin, "of the insane and cruel invader who has attacked our country, seized my child, and would have detained her, but that she escaped by flight from their hands, when one of them shot an arrow, which slew my beautiful and my beloved." "I swear by the gods, they shall be punished; but do you know, old man, to whom you speak, that you thus venture to calumniate the great Alexander?" "If I could not judge by the vulgar signs of those gay and fantastic trappings, I should yet recognise the eyes which so readily glare, the brow that contracts, with passion. These all mark the man who has been accustomed to command others, but not himself." "This is a sight," replied the king, pointing to the dead body, "which prompts me to forgive your boldness." "It is a sight, O king, which should rather teach you that I do not need your forgiveness. You have robbed my earthly existence of its charm and glory—I care not how soon it may end." "This is philosophy which would have pleased Callisthenes. What is your name and condition?" "I am called Sabas; and, after having travelled over many countries, and learned your language in the Lesser Asia, I have lived, and been happy"—here he faltered, and looked at his child—"at the tomb of the sage Zamor."

The warrior started at the name, and asked of Sabas who was Zamor. The Brahmin replied, that he had lived many ages before, and had been a mighty conqueror; but that, after overrunning half the earth, he had flung away at once the sceptre and the sword, and betaken himself to a life of meditation and benevolence. The old man went on to say, that the king would learn more from the chief of the Brahmins, who attended the tomb, and to him Sabas brought Alexander.

The ancient teacher to whom the Grecian commander was thus introduced, trembled in his presence, and, on his demanding to know something more with regard to Zamor, replied, that, in addition to what Sabas had told him, the following information was all he could supply:—"The venerated being in question had employed the latter moments of his protracted life in giving directions as to the place and manner in which his ashes were to be disposed of; and, in his volume of pure morality and sublime devotion which he had left, it was declared that the iron doors which bounded his sepulchre would never open, till one who had been as great a conqueror as himself should demand admission. In the course of many ages none such had presented himself." The pride and curiosity of the sovereign were aroused, and he desired to be led to the tomb. The Brahmin summoned his brethren, and in long files they preceded Alexander to the cavern. Its rocky circuit was of sufficient extent to include them all; and they ranged themselves around the sides, and their leader and the monarch advanced to the tomb, on which several lamps were burning. Here the chief Brahmin offered up his prayers, while the Macedonian went forward to the doors at the farther extremity, and, to the horror of the throng, violently smote the massy metal with the hilt of his sword. The doors crashed open slowly, and displayed a staircase. The king descended fearlessly and alone, and, after a long absence, returned with a haggard countenance and disordered steps to the cavern, while the doors closed suddenly behind him. He seemed, at first, confused and bewildered; but soon recovering himself, he looked round him at the Brahmins, and said, "I know not whether you have a share in yonder mummery; but, at all events, let a wall be built across that entrance, sufficient to prevent any future attempts like mine." He had paused, and seemed relapsing into deep and doubtful thought, when there was heard without, a loud rush and clang, mingled with the sound of trumpets. Alexander knew the notes, and, resuming all the soldier and the king, gravely saluted the generals who had sprung from their horses and entered the cave to seek him. He moved before them to the mouth of the cavern, and found his usual train of several hundred horsemen, with the chief nobility of Macedonia, Greece, and Persia, awaiting his appearance. Innumerable varieties of dress and arms, of language and countenance, were here assembled; and every province he ruled over had sent its noblest and most splendid inhabitants to swell the court of Alexander. All were mounted on the fleetest and most beautiful coursers of Thessaly and Asia, and an unrivalled steed was led by the grooms of the monarch. He mounted it with a careless bound, and while he galloped from the spot, followed by the glittering whirlwind of officers, feudatories, and kings, he talked to those around him of the battle, the chase, the banquet, the philosophy of Aristotle, and the charms of Pancaste.

The day had died in storm; and the chamber of Alexander was closed and lighted. He lay on his couch in the restlessness and pain of a fever from which he was never to recover. He was attended only by a young Persian girl, who watched his lightest word and sign with far more than the carefulness of servility. There was all the intensity of passionate affection in that pale cheek, those tearful eyes, and that quivering forehead. She moved silently through the splendid room at the least hint of the patient's want, and, when it was satisfied, she would sit down and weep in silence. It was early in the evening when he said, "Abra, I would speak with Perdicas." She flew from the chamber, and in a few moments returned with the person named, and then retired to the anti-chamber, where, among slaves, guards, attendants, and physicians, she hid her face in her hands, and sobbed bitterly, while she thought that the man she loved would so soon breathe his last.

Perdicas entered the room silently and slowly, and sat beside the bed. After a few moments of heavy breathing, the king turned toward his friend, and told him to move the lamp so that it might throw no light upon the couch. He then proceeded thus:

"Perdicas, you will remember having once found me in India, at the tomb of Zamor. I have revealed to no man what I saw there; but I will now disclose it to you. The circumstances which led me thither are of but little importance. Suffice it that I presented myself at the iron gates, and that they opened to admit me. I proceeded down a long and dark flight of steps, then through a passage, then down other steps, and had at last advanced to an immense distance through the rock. I thought for a moment of returning, but I went on, and travelled, as it seemed, league after league. At length I reached an iron grating, which, with some difficulty, I pushed open, and found myself in a large chamber. On the opposite wall there appeared to be a faint glimmer of light, and to it I proceeded. I touched the spot, and it felt like the side of a tent, and, in truth, I found that it was a curtain, covering an aperture. I pulled it aside, and a broad pale light burst upon me through the opening, which also gave me a view of another, and far larger chamber than that in which I stood.

"The room into which I looked was a vast gallery, which stretched its dreary vista almost beyond the sight. The floor was of black marble, and the sides of polished porphyry. Along the walls thrones were ranged at equal spaces, to an interminable distance.

Those on one side were all occupied, except the nearest, which bore the name of Zamor, but which his late penitence and imperfect reparation had saved the ancient conqueror from occupying. The throne opposite to this—the first in the vacant line—was inscribed 'Alexander.' And, O Perdicas! could I speak with the tongue of one of those Athenian poets whose renown will be as great as mine, I should yet be unable to express the tithe of that horror which seized me when I looked upon the tenants of those other thrones, and saw that a similar one was destined for me! It is not that they had an aged or a barbaric appearance—though their hairs were white, and their brows haggard, and their dresses were those of the east and of the north—but their faces were marked with a still desperation, and their bodies settled in a calm agony, of which I had no previous conception. I have often looked upon death; but no pangs from the sword, nor from the torture, ever seemed to me more than a slight discomfort compared to the sufferings of those mighty and glorious warriors. They sat motionless as the rocks on the banks of Phlegethon; but it was the tranquillity of an endurance which feels that it would be hopeless to attempt escape. The eyes of some of them were nearly closed, and there seemed no light in their countenances, but a dull, dead glare, which escaped from beneath their shadowing eyelids. There was one hoary head and swarthy cheek, with a diadem of jewels, and the Egyptian beetle on his breast, and I knew the presence of Sesostris. And there was ancient Belus, with the star of the Babylonian wizards on his brow, and leaning his awful head upon his hand. And there was the warrior-deity of those Scythians whom in my boyhood I subdued, clothed in wolf skins, but with a cuirass on his breast, and a crown of iron around his scarred forehead. Hercules, too, whom we have dreamed a god, leaned upon his club in anguish, which, though silent, was more horrible than the pangs he endured from the robe of Nessus; and a greater than he, or than all the rest, showed the writhen features and sunken cheeks of long-sustained suffering beneath those emblems of mysterious strength, the moonlike horns of Ammon. There was one spirit, and but one, in whom the fiery energy of his nature was not repressed by the tremendous fate to which he was subjected—the Greek who in his youth was victor over Asia, the fleetest, the most beautiful, the bravest, the most unhappy, the demi-god Achilles. His eyes still shone like stars amid the burning halo wherewith his head was of old encircled by Minerva, and which still beamed around him, as if in mockery of those white lips, compressed and agitated with a paroxysm of affliction too mighty for even the slayer of Hector to master it. In the shield which leant against his knees, I saw not the images of the harvest and the dance, but the reflection of the hero's innumerable pain.

"The feet of each of these terrible shadows were placed upon an image of the world; and before my throne I saw a similar attribute. My empire seemed to clasp with its boundary an enormous portion of the earth; but its limits were faint and wavering, and, methought, at every instant, they shrank and broke asunder. Above the thrones were trophies; but in the midst of each of them, that gray, stern Destiny, who, from its iron cave, in some distant planet, sends forth the silent blasts that sway the universe, had fixed some emblem of mockery, shame, and evil; the mowing ape, the crawling worm, the foulness of the harpy, the envenomed slime of the serpent, showed themselves among the spoils, weapons, crowns, and banners of royalty and conquest. And over all this a ghastly light was shed from the eyeless sockets of skeleton warders, who waited upon the enthroned victims.

"Can you wonder, my friend, that I felt a horror which swords, and flames, and menacing millions could not inspire, when I gazed upon the agonies of those beings, so dead to all but misery? My eyes almost failed to see, and my feet to stand, when I turned from them to mark the throne which bore so deeply engraven on its granite pedestal, the name of 'Alexander.' From that hour my nature has changed. I have not had the resolution to yield up my conquests, and disrobe myself of my greatness; but I have sought to lose the memory of my former deeds and future doom in revelries and intoxications, which, at last, have brought me death, though they have never bestowed forgetfulness. I shall soon be among those dreary and tormented shadows of departed power and dearly-bought renown. Take you this ring,"—and he gave him the emblematic signet—"and when you look upon it, remember, that not the image you see upon it, of immortal life and unbroken happiness, will dwell with the remains of kings and conquerors, but the polluting earth-worm and the stinging scorpion." His voice had grown hoarse and broken; and he proceeded slowly and feebly: "Though I have failed to profit by the lesson, thus much I have been taught by Zamor."

He never spoke again. He left for his generals the slavery of Greece and the distraction of the world; to Perdicas, a counsel by which he had not profited himself; to Abra, a desolate existence and a broken heart. And so did he perish at Babylon, whose boyhood had sped so blithely among the hills of Macedonia.

THE INVOCATION.

O! blessed heaven, whose power is mighty! give,
Give to my soul the dreams of other years;
The thoughts, whose freshness could earth's waste revive,
Pouring a halo through its mournful tears!
Whose memory now the shadowy past endears;
That sinless Eden, with its pastures green,
Touched with a glow, as of ambrosial spheres;
Its crystal waters, with their glittering sheen;
Its eve of guileless rest, each joyous day between!

Give me the buoyancy of heart—the light,
Which from hope's plume was o'er my pathway shed,
Painting all objects with a young delight,
While her calm heaven the laughing hours o'erspread,
Ere yet the cadence of her voice had fled,
Or the light faded from her truant wing;
Ere grief's lone prayer had over love been said—
Ere love had withered like the glow of spring,
Or autumn's labouring moon thro' storm-clouds flickering.

Oh for the newness of my faded years!
The o'ergladdened heart, that slept not, in its glee!—
How brightly blue that early sky appears,
Rich with the echoing song, the melody
That through its depths went roaming, rich and free!
Voice of a spirit like the firmament—
Gleaming pure thought from wave, and plain, and tree;
O'erspreading earth—with heavenly radiance blent,
And with a golden glow in its own element!

Alas! that glow hath been the meteor's gleam,
Or the sun's blessing in an April sky;
The autumnal star upon the rushing stream,
While the red leaf upon the blast goes by,
And the storm-spirit lifts his voice on high!
Ask of that vision, oh relentless fate!
Ask why the light hath passed from manhood's eye;
Why did the blossoms of love's blessed state
Die on my wearied heart—making it desolate!

Turn not, my spirit! look, oh look not back,
Rousing the ashes from pale memory's urn;
Gathering the dead leaves in its lonely track,
Picturing its gladness which may ne'er return,
And waking fires, which may but briefly burn,
With their proud light in the soul's treasure-cell,
With their sad lessons, which men's hearts must learn,
Till it becomes a story which they tell,
Of severed chains of love, and that wild world—farewell!

EVERARD.

Why is that part of the horizon where the sun sinks like a man's outer garment?—Because it is the west. (vest.)

THE KROUT FEAST.

Perhaps it is not generally known that there exists in this city a society of bons vivans, cycled the "KROUT Club," the members of which are mostly, if not all, of Dutch origin or extraction—lineal descendants of the old Knickerbocker stock. Once a year—or as much oftener as they please—they "hold a solemn feast" in honour of the customs of their forefathers. On such occasions the festive board is loaded with every dainty which the season affords; but the most prominent and characteristic viands are sour-kROUT, smoked sausages cut into ringlets, smoked goose, &c. &c. The presiding officer at these banquets, who is honoured with the title of king, is generally clothed in a regal robe, made of cabbage-leaves, while his royal brows are encircled with a diadem of the same materials. By virtue of his office and prerogative, he is exempt from every duty, even that of thinking—the least degree of activity, except that of mastication, being considered incompatible with the dignity of his kingly station. His reign, however, is generally short, as he who devours the most kROUT at one sitting always succeeds him in office, and presides at the next festival; at the conclusion of which he, in turn, is succeeded by some greater gourmand than himself. At one of these "feasts of reason and flow of" champagne, on a recent occasion, the following ode was sung by a member, and "received"—as the play-bills express it—"with unqualified applause."

Again, brother kROUTs, are we gaily united,
In eating and drinking, to honour our chief;
Each feeling his services richly required,

In laughing and quaffing, a stranger to grief.
Then hail to the banquet of reason and pleasure,
The envy of heroes and monarchs, no doubt;
For this is a bliss they would prize above measure,
To feast upon cabbage converted to kROUT,
The round-headed cabbage, the soft pulpy cabbage,
The sweet wholesome cabbage converted to kROUT.

Oh, think of the prize that is now set before us,
A throne and a sceptre, a crown and a robe;
Then eat till you're filled—in a conquest so glorious,
No true-hearted kROUT but would swa' low the globe.
The wine sparkles brightly, then quaff as you mangle it,
Replenish your plates too, as soon as they're out,
With smoke-seasoned goose, and the savoury ringlet,
And soft pulpy cabbage converted to kROUT,
The round-headed cabbage, the soft pulpy cabbage,
The sweet wholesome cabbage converted to kROUT.

Long life to our monarch, whose station exempts him
From each vulgar drudgery, even to think;
Except to devour sour-kROUT when it tempts him,
Or, when the wine sparkles before him, to drink.
Such a king can of course "do no wrong" to the nation,
His ministers answer, when radicals flout;
Then, brave Knickerbockers, let's strive for the station,
By feasting on cabbage converted to kROUT,
The round-headed cabbage, the soft pulpy cabbage,
The sweet wholesome cabbage converted to kROUT.

FROM THE ART OF BEAUTY.

THE BEAUTY OF THE SKIN.

A smooth, soft, and transparent skin is no less indispensable to the perfection of beauty than elegance of figure; and though much of the beauty of complexion depends upon nature, yet art can often perform wonders, which could not, by the uninitiated, be conceived to be within the limits of possibility.

In one word, training is all-powerful in beautifying the worst and plainest complexion, and rendering it soft, delicate, and transparent, like the natural healthy hue of opening youth; while at the same time it improves the health, strength, and all the finest feelings of pleasurable enjoyment. To those beauties particularly who are beginning to lose their earlier admirers, we must strongly recommend it as capable of insuring them an additional ten years of youth and cynosureship, and even of restoring at least five or ten years of vanished charms. To keep you no longer in suspense, we shall now teach you this wonder-working art; and if, after following it rigidly for at least two months or more, you do not find that our account of its effects are genuine and true, we shall henceforth resign the task of teaching the art of beauty-training.

The first injunction we lay upon you is, that you must rise at six o'clock every morning, or at five, if you please; but not sooner. Before breakfast you must walk in the open air from half a mile to three miles, according to your strength, at a quick pace; and if you botanize by the way, it will be of immense advantage; or in winter, when you cannot do this, note the state of the clouds, according to the classes of Mr. Luke Howard. If you have perspired so as to damp your clothes, or if you have wetted your feet, you must change and have all dry before breakfast; and it is also indispensable to have your skin well rubbed with a soft cotton cloth, or a flesh-brush, for ten or fifteen minutes before breakfast, and to wash your hands and face in cold soft water.

The breakfast itself—not later than eight o'clock—ought, in rigid training, to consist of plain biscuit—not bread—broiled beef-steaks or mutton-chops, under-done, without any fat, and half a pint of mild bottled ale—the genuine Scotch ale is the best. Our fair readers will not demur to this, when they are told that this was the regular breakfast of Queen Elizabeth and Lady Jane Grey. But should it be found too strong fare at the commencement, we permit, instead of the ale, one small breakfast cup—not more—of good strong black tea, or of coffee—weak tea or coffee is always bad for the nerves as well as the complexion. If tea or coffee is taken, the half pint of ale is to be used three hours after breakfast, with a biscuit, on returning from your second walk, which must be as long as the first.

The forenoon must be spent in walking, or any other active amusement out of doors, such as gardening, nutting, romping, &c. Dinner at two, the same as breakfast; no vegetables, boiled meat, nor made dishes being permitted, much less fruits, sweet things, or pastry. Those who are very delicate may begin with a bit of broiled chicken or turkey, but the steaks and chops must always be the chief part of your food. A mealy potato, or a little boiled rice, may now and then be permitted, but no other vegetable.

The afternoon should be spent in amusement in the open air, as before, and supper at seven or eight, as most convenient, at which we allow you tea or coffee, if you have had none at breakfast; if you have, you must take your half pint of mild ale, and a bit of cold fowl, or cold roast mutton or beef, but no fat. Butter, cream, milk, cheese, and fish, are prohibited. You may take an egg occasionally with a biscuit. At meals you may eat heartily, but nothing is allowed between, not even drink, and thirst must be allayed without drink, by bathing the hands and face in cold water. You must always take at least an hour's active exercise before going to bed, and have your feet bathed in tepid water, and your whole skin rubbed with a cotton cloth or the flesh-brush. Go to bed not later than ten.

Except in the case of the very delicate, we can relax nothing of these regulations; and recollect, that whatever rule is broken will tell to the disadvantage of the complexion, for you cannot in conscience expect improvement in beauty, while you do not pay the price of obedience. Recollect, that for the first week or fourteen days you may lay your account with feverishness, thirst, headach, and want of appetite; if you persevere this will go off, and your spirits will improve rapidly.

LEGAL ANECDOTE.

On the day of Lord Eldon's resignation of the great seal, a certain little lawyer, after expatiating, at a dinner party, on the public merits of that noble and learned person, proceeded to speak of his kindness and condescension towards the barristers of his court. "To me," added he, "the loss is irreparable, for Lord Eldon always behaved to me quite like a father." "Yes," said Brougham, who was one of the company, "I understand that he always treated you quite like a child."

CARRIER PIGEONS AND SWALLOWS.

It is well known that pigeons have, from time immemorial, been employed in the east, as letter-carriers, upon extraordinary occasions. The same practice prevailed also among the Romans. When a gentleman went to the theatre or circus, whence it was not easy, on account of the crowded state of the house, to despatch an ordinary messenger, he usually carried two or three doves in his bosom, each of which he dismissed with a note to his family as occasion required. A citizen of Volterra employed messengers still more uncommon. He caught and tamed a number of swallows, which he carried with him to Rome; and when he was victor in the games, he despatched them, smeared with the colour of victory, as the bearers of good tidings to his friends.

VILLAGE SKETCHES.

COUSIN MARY.

BY MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

ABOUT four years ago, passing a few days with the highly educated daughters of some friends in this neighbourhood, I found domesticated in the family a young lady, whom I shall call as they called her, Cousin Mary. She was about eighteen, not beautiful, perhaps, but lovely certainly to the fullest extent of that loveliest word—as fresh as a rose; as fair as a lily; with lips like winter berries; dimpled, smiling cheeks; and eyes of which nobody could tell the colour, they danced so incessantly in their own gay light. Her figure was tall, round, and slender; exquisitely well proportioned it must have been, for in all attitudes—and in her innocent gayety, she was scarcely ever two minutes in the same—she was grace itself. She was, in short, the very picture of youth, health, and happiness. No one could see her without being prepossessed in her favour. I took a fancy to her the moment she entered the room; and it increased every hour in spite of, or rather perhaps for, certain deficiencies, which caused poor Cousin Mary to be held exceedingly cheap by her accomplished relatives.

She was the youngest daughter of an officer of rank, dead long ago; and his sickly widow having lost by death—or that other death, marriage—all her children but this, could not, from very fondness, resolve to part with her darling for the purpose of acquiring the commonest instruction. She talked of it, indeed, now and then, but she only talked; so that, in this age of universal education, Mary C. at eighteen, exhibited the extraordinary phenomenon of a young woman of high family, whose acquirements were limited to reading, writing, needle-work, and the first rules of arithmetic. The effect of this let-alone system, combined with a careful seclusion from all improper society, and a perfect liberty in her country rambles, acting upon a mind of great power and activity, was the very reverse of what might have been predicted. It had produced not merely a delightful freshness and originality of manner and character, a piquant ignorance of those things of which one is tired to death, but knowledge—positive, accurate, and various knowledge. She was, to be sure, wholly unaccomplished; knew nothing of quadrilles, though her every motion was dancing; nor a note of music, though she used to warble, like a bird, sweet snatches of old songs, as she skipped up and down the house; nor of painting, except as her taste had been formed, by a minute acquaintance with nature, into an intense feeling of art. She had that real extra sense, an eye for colour, too, as well as an ear for music. Not one in twenty—not one in a hundred of our sketching and copying ladies could love and appreciate a picture where there was colour and mind, a picture by Claude, or by our English Claudes, Wilson and Hoffland, as she could—for she loved landscape best, because she understood it best—it was a portrait of which she knew the original. Then her needle was in her hands almost a pencil. I never knew such an embroideress—she would sit “printing her thoughts on lawn,” till the delicate creation vied with the snowy tracery, the fantastic carving of hoar frost, the richness of Gothic architecture, or of that which so much resembles it, the luxuriant fancy of old point lace. That was her only accomplishment, and a rare artist she was—muslin and net were her canvass. She had no French either, not a word; no Italian; but then her English was racy, unhackneyed, proper to the thought to a degree that only original thinking could give. She had not much reading, except of the Bible, and Shakspeare, and Richardson's novels, in which she was learned; but then her powers of observation were sharpened and quickened, in a very unusual degree, by the leisure and opportunity afforded for their developement, at a time of life when they are most acute. She had nothing to distract her mind. Her attention was always awake and alive. She was an excellent and curious naturalist, merely because she had gone into the fields with her eyes open; and knew all the details of rural management, domestic or agricultural, as well as the peculiar habits and modes of thinking of the peasantry, simply because she had lived in the country, and made use of her ears. Then she was fanciful, recollective, new; drew her images from the real objects, not from their shadows in books. In short, to listen to her, and the young ladies her companions, who, accomplished to the height, had trodden the education-mill till they all moved in one step, had lost sense in sound, and ideas in words, was enough to make us turn masters and governesses out of doors, and leave our daughters and grand-daughters to Mrs. C.'s system of non-instruction. I should have liked to meet with another specimen, just to ascertain whether the peculiar charm and advantage arose from the quick and active mind of this fair ignorant, or was really the natural and inevitable result of the training; but, alas! to find more than one unaccomplished young lady, in this accomplished age, is not to be hoped for. So I admired and envied; and her fair kinswomen pitied and scorned, and tried to teach; and Mary, never made for a learner, and as full of animal spirits as a school-boy in the holidays, sang, and laughed, and skipped about, from morning till night.

It must be confessed, as a counter-balance to her other perfections, that the dear Cousin Mary was, as far as great natural modesty and an occasional touch of shyness would let her, the least in the world of a romp! She loved to toss about children, to jump over stiles, to scramble through hedges, to climb trees; and some of her knowledge of plants and birds may certainly have arisen from her delight in these boyish amusements. And which of us has not found that the strongest, the healthiest, and most flourishing acquirement has arisen from pleasure or accident, has been in a manner self-sown, like an oak of the forest? Oh, she was a sad romp; as skittish as a wild colt, as uncertain as a butterfly, as uncatchable as a swallow! But her great personal beauty, the charm, grace, and lightness of her movements, and, above all, her evident innocence of heart, were bribes of indulgence which no one could withstand. I never heard her blamed by any human being. The perfect unrestraint of her attitudes, and the exquisite symmetry of her form, would have rendered her an invaluable study for a painter. Her daily doings would have formed a series of pictures. I have seen her scudding through a shallow rivulet like a young Diana, and a bounding, skimming, enjoying motion, as if native to the element, which might have become a Naiad. I have seen her on the topmost round of a ladder, with one foot on the roof of a house, flinging down the grapes that no one else had nerve enough to reach, laughing, and garlanded, and crowned with vine leaves, like a bacchante. But the prettiest combination of circumstances under which I ever saw her, was driving a horse and cart up a hill one sunny windy day, in September. It was a gay party of young women, some walking, some in open carriages of different descriptions, bent to see a celebrated prospect from a hill called the Ridges. The ascent was by a steep narrow lane, cut deeply between sand banks, crowned with high feathery hedges. The road and its picturesque banks lay bathed in the golden sunshine, whilst the autumnal sky, intensely blue, appeared at the top as through an arch. The hill was so steep, that we had all dismounted, and left our different vehicles in charge of the servants below; but Mary, to whom, as incomparably the best charioteer, the conduct of a certain non-descript machine, a sort of donkey curicle, had fallen, determined to drive a delicate little girl, who was afraid of the walk, to the top of the eminence. She jumped out for the purpose, and we followed, watching and admiring her as she won her way up the hill; now tugging at the donkeys in front, with her bright face toward them and us, and springing along backwards—now pushing the chaise from behind—now running by the side of her steeds, patting and caressing them—now soothing the half-frightened child—now laughing, nodding, and shaking her little whip at us—darting about like some winged creature—till at last she stopped at the top of the ascent, and stood for a moment on the summit, her straw bonnet blown back, and held on only by the strings; her brown hair playing on the wind in long natural ringlets; her complexion becoming every moment more splendid from exertion, redder and whiter; her eyes and her smile brightening and dimpling; her figure in its simple white gown, strongly relieved by the deep blue sky, and her whole form seemed to dilate before our eyes. There she stood under the arch formed by two meeting elms, a Hebe, a Psyche, a perfect goddess of youth and joy. The Ridges are very fine things altogether, especially the part to which we were bound, a turfy breezy spot, sinking down abruptly like a rock into a wild foreground of heath and forest, with a magnificent command of distant objects; but we saw nothing that day like the figure on the top of the hill.

After this I lost sight of her for a long time. She was called suddenly home by the dangerous illness of her mother, who, after languishing for some months, died; and Mary went to live with a sister much older than herself, and richly married in a manufacturing town, where she languished in smoke, confinement, dependence, and display—for her sister was a match-making lady, a manœuvrer—for about a twelvemonth. She then left her house and went into Wales—as a governess! Imagine the astonishment caused by this intelligence amongst us all; for I myself, though admiring the untaught damsel almost as much as I loved her, should certainly never have dreamed of her as a teacher. However, she remained in the rich baronet's family where she had commenced her employment. They liked her apparently—there she was; and again nothing was heard of her for many months, until, happening to call on the friends at whose house I had originally met her, I espied her fair blooming face, a rose amongst roses, at the drawing-room window—and instantly, with the speed of light, was met and embraced by her at the hall-door.

There was not the slightest perceptible difference in her deportment. She still bounded like a fawn, and laughed and clapped her hands like an infant. She was not a day older, or graver, or wiser, since we parted. Her post of tutress had at least done her no harm, whatever might have been the case with her pupils. The more I looked at her, the more I wondered; and after our mutual expressions of pleasure had a little subsided, I could not resist the temptation of saying,

“So, you are really a governess?”

“Yes.”

“And you continue in the same family?”

“Yes.”

“And you like your post?”

“O yes, yes!”

“But, my dear Mary, what could induce you to go?”

“Why, they wanted a governess, so I went.”

“But what could induce them to keep you?”

The perfect gravity and earnestness with which this question was put, set her laughing, and the laugh was echoed back from a group at the end of the room, which I had not before noticed—an elegant man, in the prime of life, showing a portfolio of rare prints to a fine girl of twelve, and a rosy boy of seven, evidently his children.

"Why did they keep me? Ask them," replied Mary, turning toward them with an arch smile.

"We kept her to teach her ourselves," said the young lady.

"We kept her to play cricket with us," said her brother.

"We kept her to marry," said the gentleman, advancing gaily to shake hands with me. "She was a bad governess, perhaps; but she is an excellent wife—that is her true vocation."

And so it is. She is, indeed, an excellent wife; and assuredly a most fortunate one. I never saw happiness so sparkling or so glowing; never saw such devotion to a bride, or such fondness for a step-mother, as Sir W. S. and his lovely children show to the sweet Cousin Mary.

THE REPOSITORY.

FLOWERS.

PHILOSOPHERS and divines have made many fruitless efforts to remove that general perversity in mankind, which leads it to despise simple pleasures, and eagerly search out those that possess no value but in their rarity, or the estimation of a senseless fashion. Ages will, I fear, elapse before the world can be amended in this respect, and individuals be taught to calculate the worth of a thing by its intrinsic, or its relative merits, without borrowing their opinions from others. Many will not enjoy what would afford them great pleasure, because such enjoyment is not sanctioned by usage. This is particularly the case as respects cheap and simple pleasures. Simplicity is but little followed, and yet it always obtains admiration.

I went the other day to a fashionable ball, where unwieldy and rich nabobesses promenaded the rooms, adorned with costly pearls, and glittering in jewels, the spoils of every climate under the sun. Even the younger and more beautiful part of the company were attired in the extreme of the ton, and in an exuberance of ornament. There was one lovely girl amongst them who attracted every eye, and far eclipsed those who had exhausted the decorative art of half the milliners and tirewomen of the city. Every heart did her homage, and she moved in the brilliant assembly like some "fairy" vision of the "element." She had no jewels about her person, which was but of the middle stature. A single flower alone decorated her fine head of light brown hair. Her dress was white, with little of flounce or furbelow, but her gait was elegant and graceful. There were other ladies present, as young and beautiful as she was, but they did not seem to attract half so much admiration, for they had too many of the "adulteries of art" about them; she reigned queen "of the ascendant."

This, I am convinced, arose solely from the simplicity of her attire, where there was so much artificial decoration.

There is something of propriety in our natural feelings that informs us what is true taste, and gives us an intuitive knowledge of the really elegant. Let this illustrate the value of simplicity in every thing, in the fine arts, in pleasure, and in our domestic enjoyments. Of the latter, it is astonishing how many that are highly tasteful are within the reach of all, but, for that reason, deemed too cheap to be practicable, notwithstanding their value.

When summer's delightful season arrives, there is nothing more grateful than a profusion of choice flowers around and within our dwellings. The humblest apartments ornamented with these beautiful productions of nature, have, in my view, a more delightful effect than the proudest saloons with gilded ceilings and hangings of Genoa velvet. The richness of the latter, indeed, would be heightened, and their elegance increased, by the judicious introduction of flowers and foliage into them. The odour of flowers, the cool appearance of the dark green leaves of some species, and the beautiful tints and varied forms of others, are singularly grateful to the sight, and refreshing at the same time. Vases of Etruscan mould, containing plants of the commonest kind, offer those lines of beauty which the eye delights in following; and variform leaves hanging festooned over them and shading them, if they be of a light colour, with a soft grateful hue, add much to their pleasing effect. These decorations are simple and cheap. They offer to every class their redundant variety of beauty, at the price of a little labour to him who is disposed to rear them for himself, and at a very trifling expense in a large city to those who choose to purchase them. It is true, the apartments of some few persons are always adorned with them, and their aid is called in somewhat incongruously, to set off the midnight ball-room; but they are not half as common in dwelling-houses as they should be. They offer their rarer varieties to the wealthy, and those not blessed by fortune have a profusion of a cheaper kind at command, they being among those blessings bestowed upon us by our common mother, which are within the reach of all. Lord Bacon, whose magnificence of mind exempts him from every objection as a model for the rest of mankind—in all but the unfortunate error to which, perhaps, his sordid pursuit in life led him, to the degradation of his nobler intellect—was enthusiastically attached to flowers, and kept a succession of them about him in his study, and at his table. Now the union of books and flowers is more particularly agreeable. Nothing, in my view, is half so delightful as a library set off with these beautiful productions of the earth during summer, or, indeed, any other season of the year. A library or study, opening on green turf, and having the view of a distant rugged country, with a peep at the ocean between hills, a small fertile space forming the nearest ground, and an easy chair and books, is just as much of local enjoyment as a thinking man can desire—I reckon not if under a thatched or a slated roof, to me it is the same thing. A favourite author on my table, in the midst of my bouquets, and I speedily forget how the rest of the world wags. I fancy I am enjoying nature and art together, a consummation of luxury that never palls upon the appetite—a dessert of uncloying sweets.

Madame Roland seems to have felt very strongly the union of mental pleasure with that afforded to the senses by flowers. These pleasures, however, are, like the unjewelled girl at the ball, too simple to be universally felt.

There is something delightful in the use which the eastern poets, particularly the Persian, make of flowers in their poetry. Their allusions are not casual, and in the way of metaphor and simile only; they seem really to hold them in high admiration. I am not aware that the flowers of Persia, except the rose, are more beautiful, or more various than those of other countries. Perhaps England, including her gardens, green-houses, and fields, having introduced a vast variety from every climate, may exhibit a list unrivalled, as a whole, in odour and beauty. Yet flowers are not with us held in such high estimation as among the Orientals, if we are to judge from their poets; for whatever belongs to nature, and is prized nationally, is sure to be prominently introduced into that department of literature which belongs to imagination. Bowers of roses and flowers are perpetually alluded to in the writings of eastern poets. The Turks, and indeed the Orientals in general, have few images of voluptuousness without the richest flowers contributing towards them. The noblest palaces, where gilding, damask, and fine carpeting abound, would be essentially wanting in luxury without flowers. It cannot be from their odour alone that they are thus identified with pleasure; it is from their union of exquisite hues, fragrance, and beautiful forms, that they raise a sentiment of voluptuousness in the mind; for whatever unites these qualities can scarcely do otherwise.

Whoever virtuously despises the opinion, that simple and cheap pleasures, not only good, but in the very best taste, are of no value, because they want a meretricious rarity, will fill their apartments with a succession of our better garden flowers. It has been said that flowers, placed in bedrooms, are not wholesome. This cannot be meant of such as are in a state of vegetation. Plucked and put into water, they quickly decay, and, doubtless, give out a putrescent air; when alive and growing, there need not be any danger apprehended from them, provided fresh air is frequently introduced. For spacious rooms, the better kinds, during warm weather, are those which have a large leaf and bossy flower. Large leaves have a very agreeable effect on the senses; their rich green is grateful to the sight: of this kind, the Hydrangæa is remarkably well adapted for apartments, but it requires plenty of water. Those who have a green-house connected with their dwellings, have the convenience, by management, of changing their plants as the flowers decay; those who have not, and yet have space to afford them light, and occasionally air, may rear most of those kinds under their own roof, which may be applied for ornament in summer. Vases of plaster, modelled from the antique, may be stained any colour most agreeable to the fancy, and, fitted with tin cases to contain the earthen pots of flowers, to prevent the damp from acting on them, will look exceedingly well.

There is a great advantage, in families, in keeping the most pleasing and correct images of every kind of object before the eyes of youth. It causes, almost insensibly, an affinity between the objects so familiarized to them and the symmetry of thought—if I may so express myself—independently of forming a correct taste. The region of fancy will be filled with more correct images; and a distorted or ill-proportioned object will be more immediately perceived by those who have been always accustomed to have the beautiful before them. In this sense, natural flowers are far better than embroidery and the tapestry roses of our starched ancestors.

The infinite variety of roses, including the Guelder rose, the rhododendron, and other plants of similar growth, are fitted for the saloon, but they please best in the library. They should be intermingled with the book-cases, and stands filled with them should be placed wherever practicable. They are a wonderful relief to the student. There is always about them a something that infuses a sensation of placid joy, cheering and refreshing. Perhaps they were first introduced at festivals, in consequence of their possessing this quality. A flower-garden is the scene of pleasurable feelings, of innocence and elegance. The introduction of flowers into our rooms infuses the same sensations, but intermingles them more with our domestic comforts; so that we feel, as it were, in closer contact with them. The succession might be kept up for the greater part of the year; and even in winter, evergreens will supply their places, and, in some respects, contrast well with the season. Many fail in preserving the beauty of plants in their apartments, because they do not give them sufficient light. Some species do well with much less light than others. Light is as necessary to them as air. They should not be too often shifted from one place to another. Those who will take the trouble, may quicken the growth of some plants, so as to have spring-flowers in winter. Thus autumn and spring might be connected; and flowers blooming in the winter of our gloomy climate possess double attraction.

The presence of flowers is a source of beauty to the mind; for the meanest of them is lovely. To any of the floral world, the terms, disproportion and ugliness, are inapplicable. Unbounded in variety, they are all charming to the sight, their race is essentially beautiful. It is imbued with the elements of perfect gratefulness. One flower may appear preferable to another in colour, size, and shape, but in the humblest there is the stamp of elegance. They are all pleasing, all attractive. Those who are distinguished by a fondness for them and their cultivation, are persons of elegant minds. To the fair sex, in particular, they offer a charming study, and the decoration of their rooms with every fresh succession sets off their own attractions; while the attending them harmonizes well with our ideas of female occupation. A lovely girl in a flower-garden is a far preferable object, to the eye, to one in a bath-room. In the midst of the luxuries of a rich vegetation, the female figure is set off better; and the colours of the parterre make out what the painters call a fore and back-ground, that administers admirably to the exhibition of the "fairest flower" of all. How desirable is it that fashion should be kept on the route of true taste, and made to go hand in hand with the simple and natural!

In the flower-garden alcove, books are doubly grateful. As in the library ornamented with flowers they seem to be more enjoyed, so their union there is irresistibly attracting. To enjoy reading under such circumstances most, works of imagination are preferable to abstract subjects. Poetry and romance—"De Vere" and "Pelham"—lighter history—the lively letters of the French school, like those of Sevigne and others—or natural history—these are best adapted to peruse amidst sweets and flowers: in short, any species of writing that does not keep the mind too intently fixed to allow the senses to wander occasionally over the scene around, and catch the beauty of the rich vegetation. To me, the enjoyment derived from the union of books and flowers is of the very highest value among pleasurable sensations.

For my own part, I manage very well without the advantage of a green-house. The evergreens serve me in winter. Then the lilacs come in, followed by the guelder rose and woodbine, the latter trained in a pot upon circular trellis-work. After this there can be no difficulty in choosing, as the open air offers every variety. I arrange all my library and parlour-plants in a room in my dwelling-house, facing the south, having a full portion of light, and a fire-place. I promote the growth of my flowers for the early part of the year by steam-warmth, and having large tubs and boxes of earth, I am at no loss, in my humble conservatory, for flowers of many kinds when our climate offers none. The trouble attending them is all my own, and is one of those employments which never appear laborious. Those who have better conveniences may proceed on a larger scale; but I contrive to keep up a due succession, which, to a floral epicure, is every thing. To be a day in the year without seeing a flower is a novelty to me, and I am persuaded much more might be done with my humble means than I have effected, had I sufficient leisure to attend to the retarding or forcing them. I cover every space in my sitting-rooms with these beautiful fairy things of creation, and take so much delight in the sight of them, that I cannot help recommending to those of limited incomes, like myself, to follow my example, and be their own nurserymen. The rich might easily obtain them without; but what they procure by gold, the individual of small means must obtain by industry. I know there are persons to whom the flowers of paradise would be objects of indifference: but who can imitate, or envy such? They are grovellers, whose coarseness of taste is only fitted for the grossest food of life. The pleasures of flowers and of books are, as Henry IV. observed of his child, "the property of all the world."

THE HUMOURIST.

A MASKED BALL IN THE COUNTRY.

Who can describe the beauty of Fairfields, alike the pride and envy of our neighbourhood? The house commands a view of a delightful valley, yet it is sheltered behind by a range of picturesque undulations, and screened by such a noble wood as you shall not meet with in every day's journey. The park surrounding it is of great extent, yet the eye is not fatigued with searching for its boundaries, for the plantations are arranged with such consummate art as to resemble the happiest efforts of nature: its appearance is rather snug than spacious; and the mind, unoppressed by any idea of the vast opulence of its possessor, revels in the beauty of its scenery, for the peculiar character of the place is simplicity.

Sir William Roseville, as soon as his parliamentary duties permit, retires to its shades with an almost filial affection, since he has lived to perfect the design which his father began, of making Fairfields the most elegant and desirable residence in this or the next county. About the beginning of August he was quietly settled in his retreat, patiently waiting till the 1st of September should bring with it his favourite diversion of shooting, filling up the intervening time by practising his guns and pointers. Not so contented was his lady: frequent rains had made her a prisoner in her own house; to enjoy brooks and groves was impossible; the former were swollen into torrents, and the latter were dripping with the tears of heaven; or, if an occasional gleam of sunshine allured her abroad, she paid the forfeit of temerity by being overtaken by one of those hasty and "pitiless storms" which have defaced the beauties of our island, and circumscribed the comfort of its inhabitants during the past summer. Books and music, two grand resources of the secluded, had been resorted to so often, that, like a good remedy frequently repeated, they had failed of producing the desired effect. Invitations to visit Fairfields had all been declined until the weather should prove more favourable; and Lady Roseville was au desespoir for amusements, when one morning the sun, shining forth without a cloud, and the barometer, rising towards fair, promised better things, and so completely dissipated her ladyship's ennui, that she sat at breakfast looking out on the brilliant scene with that sort of intense delight which is never felt till we have been taught the value of our pleasures by deprivation.

"We must give our annual fete, Sir William," said she suddenly; but Sir William was so deep in the affairs of the East, that he merely raised his eyes from the newspaper which he was reading, and nodded assent. "Yes, we must indeed," continued the lady: "something in the style of that superb thing given by a lovely marchioness last season, would be a novelty here; not that I should choose to disguise myself in an Elizabethan dress; I should rather prefer the costume of a sultana; and you, my love, would make a noble sultan."

"A noble fellow that," said Sir William, still weighing the chances of war between the Turks and Russians.

"Ah, I remember you always admired that Turkish dress in the last work we had on costume," said her ladyship, pleased to find that she had excited her husband's attention at last.

"Dress! ah, I hope they will give the Russians a good dressing," said Sir William.

"The Russians, my love!" said Lady Roseville with surprise; "what on earth could make you think of their dressing? such undressable barbarians!"

"As for their barbarism, Marianne," said the baronet, who is one of those men of solid, but not bright parts, who find it difficult to take in more than one idea at a time, and who was not a little pleased to think he had inveigled his lady into a political conversation—"as for their barbarism, they are much upon a par, Turks and Russians; but I do not like to see such huge, overgrown—"

"Ah, my love, I understand you," interrupted the lady;

"you can't bear the immense Cossack beards and caps—I hope we shall have none at my party!"

"Your party!" echoed Sir William, in unfeigned astonishment—"your party!"

But at that moment the whining of his favourite dogs was heard pleading for their usual morning's walk; and, without waiting for an explanation, their master hurried away to answer their importunities.

"What a dear, good, puzzling man is that!" said Lady Roseville, lifting up her hands. "Well, he has no objection to appearing a la Turque, so that question is settled, and I shall write the orders to Mrs. Trim immediately. And let me see, have I a good store of cards?" she said, opening a superb cabinet—"oh no, not half enough: I must send an immense commission to Mr. Papyrus, and if he does not send me new devices for my invites—something to make a sensation—I shall be very angry."

At this moment a servant entered the room with an envelope, which was eagerly opened.

"Shall the messenger wait, my lady?"

"No, tell him Sir William is out," said Lady Roseville in a tone of vexation, to which she gave free vent as soon as she was left alone. "How provoking! cards from that annoying woman, Mrs. Management, for a party of exactly the same description as I intend to give—pshaw! intended I should say, for the whole plan must be given up—is in short defeated, by the only woman in the world that I really hate. Vulgar wretch! I suppose she has been consulting the almanac for a change of weather, and had her cards ready to distribute on the first dispersion of the clouds. If we go, half the evening will be consumed in listening to the history of how she managed to be in such good time, to say nothing of her housekeeper's forethought in the way of jellies and preserves, which I guess will be recommended as excellent, although they can boast a fortnight's existence."

Thus did her ladyship endeavour to kill the time until she saw Sir William returning from his walk, when she flew to meet him, with the cause of her discomfiture open in her hand.

"See, my dear," she exclaimed, "how dangerous are delays! Here is neighbour Management thwarting all my designs for the amusement of myself and friends at one blow."

Sir William read the invitation without paying any attention to the lady's comments; then, looking up with a most provokingly calm aspect, he asked,

"Do we go, Marianne?"

"Just as you please. If it were not so much trouble for you to make up your mind, I might have forestalled Mrs. Management, and been gay at my own house, instead of swelling that silly creature's triumph."

"Well, then," said Sir William, who had only heard the first part of her ladyship's answer, being completely engrossed with the beauty of his canine favourites, "we had better accept the invitation."

"This is intolerable," said Lady Roseville, as she left her impenetrable spouse: "yet, since it must be so, since I must go, I will astonish the natives with the splendour of our costumes. Sir William's dark eyes will flash with tenfold lustre from beneath a sultan's turban; and besides, there is an apathy, an indolence about him, that will well become the character," she continued, endeavouring, in the dilemma, even to turn what she considered her husband's greatest faults to some account; proving the truth of the old adage, that "necessity is the mother of invention."

A fortnight was scarce sufficient to complete Lady Roseville's preparations for Mrs. Management's fete; at last the dresses arrived. Her ladyship arrayed herself in hers; she looked, as her maid told her, the beautifullest creature in the world, and went to the dining-room in the full conviction that she should surprise Sir William into an ecstasy of admiration. The common topics of the day were, however, discussed, and the dinner half over before he made any observation on his lady's attire, when, accidentally looking at her, he said, in an unusual tone of animation,

"Bless me, Marianne, how indifferently your maid has dressed you to-day! I never saw you looking so ill before."

"Well, this is the most provoking of all!" exclaimed her ladyship, almost crying with vexation. "The pains I have taken to have this dress exactly according to your wishes, and now to be disappointed!"

"My wishes!" said the astonished husband.

"Yes; did not you tell me you preferred the Turkish to any other costume? and have not I got two of the most superb suits both for myself and you?"

"For me!" repeated Sir William, in a long note of amazement.

"To be sure I have; and there is no doubt but you will be reckoned by far the most striking figure at the gala to-morrow. Richardson shall bring it," said she, ringing the bell, "and show it to you."

The baronet stood endeavouring to solve the problem which had been so unexpectedly proposed to him; but being roused from his reverie by the appearance of Richardson, turned from the huge mass of velvet, &c. with which he was loaded, with a look of horror. However, being seriously engaged over an excellent dessert, which with Sir William was a sedative for all care and a balm for all irritation, his lady had not much difficulty in persuading him that he was the veritable "superbe Orosmane," when attired in the dress she had purposed for him. In fact, so much was said about the brilliancy of his eyes and the dignity of his deportment, that, with the indolence of his character and the vanity common to man as well as womankind, he was at length inclined to believe "that the trouble of obliging Marianne was not so very irksome."

The clock struck nine on the eventful evening of the fete, as Sir William Roseville's carriage, containing "two strange-looking people," as the peasants remarked, drove through the luxuriant plantations of Fairfields, and, dashing at a rapid rate through the little village of Longbrook, to avoid observation, turned into the road that led to the residence of Mrs. Management. They had proceeded some distance, when the coachman intimated that it was next to impossible to go on, for the late rains had rendered the road a complete swamp, and the spirited horses would refuse to extricate the carriage if it once got to a dead set. At this moment a loud halloo from behind diverted their attention from this agreeable piece of intelligence.

"Help, help!" cried a deep-toned voice; "my Lord Dashaway's caravan is overturned hard by, and all the inhabitants of the earth are brought low and bespattered with the mud of this delectable quagmire."

The figure who spoke was disguised after the manner of Shakespeare's clowns, and wore on his head a cap and bells, which every motion set a ringing.

Sir William's horses took fright at the noise, and began to plunge and rear.

"For goodness' sake," said Lady Roseville, "give me your cap! We shall all be murdered, my dear," she continued; "do pray go and see what can be done for the poor creatures who are in such a strait."

"That," said the phlegmatic Sir William, "is out of my power; this long robe puts a stop to any other motion than a slow march."

"Pull it off," said his lady.

"Ah, do! my master," said the clown, "and come and help your fellow-creatures through a dirty world!"

After some consideration, and not a little exertion, he allowed himself to be conducted to such a scene as would have been worth a "Jew's eye" to Cruikshank. A gipsy was pouring oil into the wounds of a young quaker, whose head was bleeding profusely from beneath his broad-brimmed hat; a Chinese was administering to the distresses of a belle Parisienne; and a Roman lady was supported in the arms of an English jockey. Shepherdesses were faint to content themselves with the assiduities of a Falstaff; and a Lady Macbeth was to be seen rubbing no visionary spot from the palms of her fair hands. Lady Dashaway, who was seriously hurt, had been the cause of the disaster, by taking the reins from his coachman and driving very injudiciously; while he at present cut a miserable figure, his judge's wig having changed from its original snow-white purity to a party-coloured appearance, somewhat resembling the plumage of the magpie.

"I say, Mr. Wiseacre," he cried, as soon as he saw the gentleman in the clown's dress returned, "if you had had the wit to doff your cap before, we should now have been partaking of the hospitality of Orderly Hall."

"I plead guilty, without taking into the account any of your lordship's errors in judgment," said the clown; and immediately began to ascertain the extent of the mischief.

With the aid of Sir William's muscular arm, he succeeded in placing the ladies out of danger, and messengers were despatched for carriages, which there was but little chance of obtaining. All idea of the "mazy dance" faded into dim perspective; beaux forgot the wit which they intended to sport, and belles their premeditated repartees.

In the midst of their consternation, a carriage was heard passing along the turnpike road.

"Make an appeal to the humanity of the travellers," said Lord Dashaway; and at the same moment the clown called in his deep sonorous voice for assistance, setting forth the pitiable condition of his party, of which his own person formed a pretty strong proof; but the louder he called, the faster the carriage rolled on.

The shadows of night were thickening around them, and the situation of the disabled masqueraders was rendered more deplorable by a fast descending shower. Presently a horseman rode up: it was a servant from Orderly Hall, inquiring if a carriage had been seen on the road to London; and on receiving an affirmative answer, he instantly started off at full speed, saying that Miss Management had taken advantage of the confusion of the evening to elope with a young fellow who had been twice forbidden her mother's well-conducted mansion.

"Did you see any thing of my carriage?" asked Sir William Roseville with unusual quickness; but the rider clapped spurs to his horse, impatient of delay.

"This is some trick," cried Sir William in a rage, whose anger, though not easily roused, was less easily appeased. "What business had you, sir," he said, addressing the clown, "to lead me here, when Lady Roseville so much required my protection?" and he put himself into a boxing attitude.

"I was the only survivor," said the clown with a provoking drawl; "the rest were all kill, and you know I could not live alone."

"If all is as I suspect," said the enraged Sir William, "you will not survive much longer;" and then stalked off in his Turkish boots, the only wreck remaining of his late disguise.

On he went, through thick and thin, till he reached the goal of his wishes, and there found Lady Roseville, yawning on a couch, the image of fatigue and ennui.

The rooms of Orderly Hall, instead of presenting a display of crowded gayety, were but half-filled, and the hostess herself in a state of alarm on account of the disappearance of her eldest hope, which she tried in vain to conceal. The effect of the scene was not a little heightened by the appearance of Sir William, who marched into the room covered with the soil of his late undertaking.

"I'm glad I've found you," he said, taking his wife's hand, "for I suspected I had lost you;" and looked upon her with the same delight that he gazes on his obedient dogs—"I am glad I have found you: but where is the carriage?"

"As safe as I am," said Lady Roseville; and then whispered, "On the road to Gretna."

"And the horses too?" asked Sir William, starting.

"No," said her ladyship; "your bits of blood, like your wife, remain on hand: but really I could not resist the importunities of Julia Management, as she met me at the entrance, to resign my seat to her, since the poor girl told me that all the hacks in the neighbourhood were in requisition to take home Lord Dashaway's wounded regiment."

"And does her mother suspect you?"

"Oh no, I've managed better," said her ladyship, laughing.

"How are we to get home?" asked Sir William.

"Nay, you must contrive that; I have done my part," said the lady, yawning, when she saw that her lord and master did not entirely relish the joke.

However, another long half-hour brought them to the conclusion of the fancy-ball, which had so much excited Lady Roseville's envy: the company separated in that state of pitiable discontent which is sure to succeed an unsuccessful or unenjoyed party of pleasure; and the distracted hostess was too much engrossed with her family cares to know whether Lady Roseville left the house in a chariot or a balloon.

All attempts to overtake the fugitives on the road to Gretna were unavailing; and the young lady was united, not as she expected, to the younger branch of a noble family of Milesian descent, but to the son of an honest manufacturer of Belfast; and to complete the discomfiture of the owner of Orderly Hall, the following paragraph shortly after went the round of the newspapers, ascribed to the pen of the gentleman who intended to have exercised his wit as the clown on the unfortunate evening which had brought so much disappointment:

"The preparations for the ball which recently took place at Orderly Hall were of the most splendid description; the beauty and variety of the decorations, and the taste and elegance of the arrangements—to say nothing of the profusion and excellence of the refreshments—surpassed all expectation: indeed, the entertainment would have gone off with the greatest colat, if the roads to the mansion had been passable; and, in short, if the whole had not been entirely spoiled by mismanagement."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Jail.—President Adams, when he advanced the pertinent assertion, that "the spirit of improvement was abroad upon the earth," was, of course, possessed of sufficient philosophy to know that there are exceptions to a general rule, and he did not consequently include in his proposition "the honourable the corporation of the city of New-York." We do not mean to insinuate that their "Dictionnaire des Gourmands," or their "Glass's Art of Cookery," has not undergone important alterations for the better in their latest and most choice editions, or that their wines and punch are not superior in quality to what their less civilized predecessors dreamt of, much less tasted: no, no; far be it from us to impute to this sagacious and prudent body a halt in its onward march to improvement in whatever relates to that seat and throne of the affections, vulgarly called the stomach. Their J. C. sparkling in the soft sunbeams which play upon the spacious corridors of Bellevue; their exquisite Monongahela, uniting, as the chemists would say, in definite proportions with the refined Havana and golden Seville peal, to form that triple compound, which has been aptly compared to good-natured wit—a very appropriate article for their honours' use, by the way; their prime ribs, which only cost a dollar per pound; their lined capons, stuffed with marjoram and thyme; and their ample puddings, enriched with all the fruits the Mediterranean shores produce: these, and more than these, disprove the charge. It is only to minor objects that they are either indifferent, or else slow in effecting changes foolishly demanded by an intrusive and bold press. They give some thousand tavern licenses; and it is absurdly said, these do harm! that, while they give a revenue of thirty-three thousand dollars, they increase pauperism and crime, and cost the people thrice that amount! Fudge! The honourable the corporation know better. "Remove the jail!" say the people. "We won't!" say the honourable the members of the common council. "We want to save your money. Have we not spent enough for the Paulding monument—the canal celebration—for our glorious dinners and suppers at Bellevue and Blackwell's Island? These were necessary, and could not be avoided. But shall we squander your property uselessly away? tear down a building like the jail, whose venerable antiquity fills every beholder with awe, akin to that the learned traveller experiences when he beholds the monuments of ancient Carthage, and Thebes, and Rome? Shall we dilapidate that splendid edifice, whose walls have so often re-echoed to the groans of the guilty, who have committed the greatest of crimes, incurring debt? Has it not been hallowed by the tread of the great and mighty, and bears it not the traces of their lofty aspirations in many an inspired verse strewed around? Above all, has not a most profound sage—possibly he came from Athens, in Ohio, on the Hocking river!—who has enlightened this mundane sphere with his wise says in the Morning Herald, pronounced the jail to be 'not without architectural beauties.'" "Oh that the wretch had a thousand lives!" And so the honourable the corporation have decided upon retaining the grand majestic edifice, to which the city hall acts as a foil, and upon converting it into a safe receptacle of the records of their own most wise, and most sublime proceedings! The only fault we have to find with them is, that they have determined to cast over this building, "not without architectural beauties!" a coat of plaster imitating marble! Oh, spirit of Horace, look down upon these men; teach them the way to join a fish's tail to the head of a beauty of Alsatia, and their triumph will be complete!

Another Novel.—A new novel, by the author of the "Naval Sketch Book," entitled "Saints and Sailors, or Matrimonial Manœuvres," has just issued from the press of Messrs. J. & J. Harpers, of this city. This work is strongly recommended by the English critics as possessing great interest.

A new Song-book.—Mr. J. Grigg, of Philadelphia, has published a duodecimo volume, entitled the "Southern and Western Songster; being a choice collection of the most fashionable songs, many of which are original." This is the nearest American song-book we have ever seen.

ONE HOUR WITH THEE.

Composed by W. Carnaby, and sung by Mr. Philipps and Mr. Braham, with rapturous applause, at Covent-Garden Theatre, and the great Musical Festivals in England.

This beautiful production—arranged for the Mirror by B. S. Barclay—has never before been published in America.

One hour with thee, when summer's sun - set clo - ses, And day's last blush-es gild the qui - et grove; One hour with thee, to watch the shutting ro - ses, And whis-per in thine ear soft tales of love! All the fond heart has treasured through the day, At evening's dewy close for faithful lips to say. One hour with thee, One hour with thee.

One hour with thee, when day's dull toils are over,
And wearied nature courts the peaceful scene;

One hour with thee, when gentle spirits hover
Around the guarded path, unheard, unseen:
Then, all the vexing cares of busy day

One hour with thee, at eve, can well repay;
One hour with thee, when day's dull toils are over,
One hour with thee, one hour with thee.

ON THE DEATH OF A YOUNG FRIEND.

AND art thou dead? and has the sullen grave
Closed o'er that form of beauty's manliest mould?
And does the cold turf press upon that breast,
Where virtue sat enthroned, where honour, worth,
Where dignity with gentleness combined?
Sweetness with nobleness, and graceful ease
With unassuming modesty?—oh! where
Could these be found combined? where, but in thee!
And art thou dead? so young, so beautiful!
Alas! that death should still delight to snatch
The fairest flowers! for, with fastidious grasp,
He shuns the useless weed and scentless flower;
The bright and beautiful the soonest meet
The withering influence of his deadly touch.
Why is it thus? why are the good, the fair,
The happy, and the loved—why are they aye
The sad and earliest victims of his power?
Why from the miserable wretch, who pines
Beneath the hand of sorrow, and who looks
Eagerly for his coming, as the heart
Which loves looks for the coming of the loved one,
Why from him doth he fly? why on the heart
Wrung with keen anguish, and the fragile form
Wasted by sickness, doth he still delay
To strike? Alas! too oft the withering flower
Must droop upon its stalk, long, long, ere comes
The kindly blast to scatter its pale leaves
Upon their earthly bed! But thou, whom yet

No blight had touched, thou young and lovely one!
Who went down to the grave ere yet a change
Had passed o'er thy young beauty, ere a soil
Had fallen on thy pure and lofty thoughts,
Or dimmed thy spirit bright—was this the cause
That thou wert early snatched from us away?
Wert thou a flower too fair for earth, that thus
Thou wert transplanted to a better sphere?
Yes! we may mourn for thee, as one for whom
No blush our cheeks had stained: thou wert to us
A star, which shed o'er all its gentle rays,
Inspiring hope and gladness; for the light
Of thy young, joyous spirit, shed around
Its own sweet lustre, gladdening the hearts
Of all within its sphere: thy silver tones,
The ear which once had heard, still thirsted for;
And who that e'er beheld thy sunny smiles,
Forgot their gladdening influence? Oh! 'twas sweet
When wearied with this cold and heartless world,
And heart-sick with its hollowness, to turn
To thy young, guileless spirit, to behold
Thy frank and artless nature, which the world,
Contagious, hath not sullied, and to gaze
Upon the sweet serenity which dwelt
In thy fair happy features, and drink in
The strains of clear, entrancing melody,
Which breathed the soul of music from thy voice.
And must thy beauty and thy melody
Lie chilled and hushed for ever? has the grave
Closed o'er that gentle heart, and graceful form?
Is the light quenched of that fair star which shone
So brightly o'er our path? Oh! it is quenched;

And must we wander darkling? It is so!
Yet should our spirits murmur not; thou wert
But lent us for a season, and our hearts
Still feel the influence of thy sojourn here;
"Thou wert too like a dream of heaven" to be
A resident on earth: that heaven which was Thy fittest home, has claimed thee—fare thee well!

WOMAN'S CHARMS.

Woman's smile a charm can give,
A joy that owns no measure;
Woman's love can wo relieve,
Yielding nought but pleasure.
Sweet are the toils which love impels,
There's nought its claims can sever;
And man in willing bondage kneels
At woman's shrine for ever.
Woman's eye a brightness throws
The heart alone discovers;
Woman's lip a treasure shows,
Meant to bless true lovers.
Sweet are the toils which love impels,
There's nought its chain can sever;
And man in willing bondage kneels
At woman's shrine for ever.

MUSIC.

"My soul would drink those echoes;—Oh that I were
"The viewless spirit of a lovely sound,
"A living voice, a breathing harmony,
"A bodiless enjoyment, born and dying
"With the bliest tone which made me!"

WAKE but that strain,
With its deep memory for my heart, my love!—
Stealing like murmurs from the courts above—
O wake again!
Touch thy soft lute
With its sweet breathings, that my soul may hear,
Drinking its echoes with my spirit's ear
Till grief is mute.
Wake, with its glee,
That vision which hath faded in my brain,
Like a star's gleam on the lone, trackless plain
Of the blue sea.
There is a tone
Which comes at evening, in the hush of spring,
With its rich cadence on the breeze's wing—
How quickly gone!
It hath a sound
Which brings my love-hours back, as with a spell,
With its sweet draughts from feeling's shadowed well—
Its Eden-ground.
When the soft sky
Looks blue and star-gemmed in the twilight hour—
How, with its holy and pervading power,
That dream is nigh!
Its holy light
Is like a halo o'er life's heaving wave,
Touched with the glow that young enjoyments have—
Too purely bright!
O, yet again
Touch thy soft lute to music, Marion;
It teems with memory of visions gone—
A holy train!
Thus, as I gaze,
With a dim eye, o'er my departed years,
There is a pleasant luxury in my tears,
Which ne'er decays.
Then, wake for me
The tone which hath such visions linked unto it;
Play long and loud, sweet one! I'm sure you'll do it,

THE CASKET.

FROM BLACKWOOD'S MAGAZINE.

ANCIENT GENTILITY AND MODERN OPULENCE.

I HAD been absent from my home nearly two years; and, having some business to arrange with my banker, I took the advantage of a fine morning to ride to the county-town of C—, from which my residence is distant about ten miles. The sun shone brightly; the air, though cold, was clear and bracing; and I have seldom felt myself in better health or spirits than when I alighted from my horse at the house of Trueman, my banker, and—I may add—my friend. His character is most honourable and upright, and he is generally esteemed in the neighbourhood. When he had carried on business for many years as a mercer and draper, with such success as to acquire opulence, he entered into partnership in the county bank, and is now at the head of the firm. His manners, though not refined, are raised far above vulgarity; his mind is liberal, and his purse is ever open to the claims of distress. His wife is a handsome woman, and agreeable in her deportment and behaviour; and to his family, consisting of a son and two daughters, he has given an excellent education. While his style of living is judiciously consistent with his wealth, he carefully avoids any appearance of parade, and all affectation of splendour.

After I had transacted the business on which I came, and had been satisfied that I had a very considerable balance in my favour, I was taking my leave, but Trueman would by no means allow me to depart so soon.

"You must," said he, "come up stairs, and take some refreshment; our luncheon is on the table; one o'clock is the time; and by that hour I always feel myself tolerably ready for it. We do not dine before five; but I assure you we do not make it so late from any attempt at fashion; for, when we kept a shop, we always dined at one; but, as our bank is kept open until four, it gives me time to settle every thing, and to sit down comfortably to dinner, knowing that business is then concluded for the day, and that I have nothing to do but to enjoy myself with my family."

We now entered the room, in which were his wife and daughters, and partook of the refreshments of a well-stocked table. The smiling faces around me, and the hearty welcome I received, gave zest to every thing; and I felt my heart dilate with pleasure, to see the opulence and comfort that were displayed around me—the rewards of a life of industry and integrity.

After a little general chat, Mrs. Trueman inquired whether I had lately called on my friends the Aspinals.

I replied that I had not had an opportunity of seeing them since my return, but purposed calling on them that morning.

"I wish," said she, "that you would endeavour to find out how we have offended them; for I am sure that they have taken a strong dislike to us. I would wish to show them every mark of respect; for I never can forget, that in the life-time of their father, and when my husband and I kept a shop, they were kind and liberal customers to us; and, when the ladies drove into the town, they would come to our house, and speak to me in the kindest and most affable manner. Twenty years have made a great difference in their situation, as well as in ours. You know that, when their father died, he left them very small fortunes; and, as they quitted the hall when their brother and his wife came to reside at it, they could only afford to take a very small house here, where they live in a very economical manner, with only one female servant. My situation has been much more changed. From the excellent character and unwearied industry of my dear husband, he has been enabled to place me in a rank of life very different from that to which I could formerly have aspired; he can afford to keep several servants, and to give me the comfort of a carriage, without the slightest imprudence, or the least injury to the future prospects of his children; but, if I know myself, I have never presumed at all upon this. I think it due to myself, and my husband, not to be mean or cringing to any one; and, at the same time, I avoid the manifestation of that pride and arrogance which wealth too frequently engenders. I have always behaved with the greatest respect to the unfortunate, and I have particularly shown marked deference to the Misses Aspinal, because they have sunk in the world as I have risen.

Pray, sir, ask them in what we have offended; for they will hardly deign even to return the courtesies of myself or my daughters. We have never wished them to visit us; but last year, when my husband was mayor, we knew that the usual feast would be attended by many of the country families of the first respectability, and I ventured to suggest the expediency of sending tickets to the Misses Aspinal; but they were returned with a verbal message that there must have been some mistake, as they could not possibly have been intended for them. Other trifling circumstances have occurred to convince me that we are unfortunate in giving offence where we only meant to give pleasure, and they now do not speak to us when we meet."

I promised to do my best to discover the cause of their hostility, took my leave, and walked directly to the residence of the Aspinals.

The door was opened to me by their only attendant, a sallow upright damsel of about fifty; she had in better days been the waiting-maid of her ladies at the hall, and, on the reverse of their fortune, had still preferred their service to the chance of seeking a precarious situation elsewhere, and was now acting in the triple capacity of cook, chambermaid, and waiter. She ushered me up stairs to the ladies; their room was very small, and the furniture worse for wear; but the apartment was decorated with a few remnants of former state, brought from their original residence; portraits of sundry relatives hung on the walls, some miniatures and handsome jars ornamented the chimney-piece, and one side of the room was completely filled up by a painting of the ladies themselves, taken when they were children, fat, rosy, and smiling, who were represented in the act of tying, round the neck of a favourite lamb, a garland of flowers, fresh and blooming as themselves.

Most striking was the contrast of the picture to the originals, as they presented themselves at the moment I entered; pale, thin, and melancholy; their countenances exhibited the traits of disappointment and spleen, and a wretched half-starved cat, who reposed on a faded velvet rug, on which were the family arms emblazoned in tarnished gold and coloured chenille, offered a marked dissimilarity to the plump and happy-looking pet of their childhood.

They seemed very glad to see me, for we had always been on friendly terms; and, offering me a seat by the very small fire, at the same time observing, that it was uncommonly warm for the season, they requested me to take some refreshment. I declined it, assuring them that I had already taken as much as I wished.

"Oh!" said Miss Lucretia, "I believe luncheons are completely out of fashion; for the medical men have now ascertained that nearly all our illnesses arise from eating too much and too frequently; but, as we breakfast early, and do not dine before six o'clock, we generally take something in that long interval."

I begged that I might not interrupt them—the bell was rung, and, on Martha's appearance,

"Some refreshment, but Mr. Medley will not take any," was the order given.

The maid quickly re-entered, with a large silver salver, containing two beautiful plates of antique china, on which were placed two small crusts of bread, and a splendid cut glass decanter filled with mere water. This I found was the usual set-out at two o'clock, and I therefore was not sorry that I had previously paid my respects to more substantial fare.

I now said to the ladies, "It is a long time since I have seen you; I have been a great traveller since we last met; I have much to tell you, and shall be glad to hear news of all my friends in C—. Pray inform me how they are all going on; some changes must have taken place in the course of two years, and I have been nearly that time absent."

"Changes, indeed!" replied Miss Aspinall, drawing herself up with an air of great dignity, "we hardly can recognise the neighbourhood for the same that it used to be—we have so many upstarts, so many of low origin newly become rich, that the society is totally different; and I am sorry to say, that those who, from ancient family and good education, ought to know better, actually encourage these mushroom gentry, by accepting invitations to their vulgar parties, and inviting them in return."

"Indeed!" said I, smiling, "but what is the behaviour of the mushroom gentry you speak of? for you know I am so little at home, that I am almost a stranger to the politics of C—. By the way, now we are on the subject of the nouveaux riches, how has my friend Trueman contrived to offend you? I am sure it was not the wish or intention of him or his family to do so; but they seem to think that they have given you some cause of offence undesignedly."

"Trueman," said Miss Lucretia, in a voice amounting almost to a scream, "and his family are our principal objections to the place, and in fact will be the means of our quitting it."

"Let me," said I, "know the particulars, and perhaps I may be so fortunate as to explain matters, and make peace between you."

"Never," said Miss Lucretia; "but you shall hear. You know that the house which we now occupy, and in which we have resided ever since we left the hall, belongs, with several of the adjoining ones, to this Trueman; we took it for the remainder of a long lease, and at a very low rent; this and the other leases have all fallen in within these few months, and to the tenants, in general, Trueman has given notice that he will raise their rents considerably, and expect them to put the houses into perfect repair; but, on our sending our solicitor to know on what terms we were to remain in ours, he said it was not his intention to make any demands on us; on the contrary, he was willing to put the house in repair at his own expense, and to grant us a new lease at the original rent."

"Let me understand you," said I; "do you mean to say that you are offended with him because he has not raised your rent?"

"Certainly," said she, "and I wonder that you do not see the affair in the same light. Is it for Trueman, a creature of yesterday, a man whom we remember coming to the hall to receive the amount of his bill, and glad to take cold meat and ale in the house-keeper's room—is this upstart to presume to confer an obligation on an Aspinall, descended in a right line from a baron who came over with William of Normandy? We are sunk low, it is true, but I trust not so low as to submit to that disgrace."

"My dear lady," said I, "you really see this matter in a wrong point of view. There could be no intention on the part of Mr. Trueman but to do an act of kindness; and, if he failed in the manner, it was want of judgment, not of respect or deference, both which, I know, he feels toward you."

"That is not all," said the other sister; "we could easily bear impertinence, if he showed it toward us, but we cannot allow his presumptuous civilities. He lately received a present of a large turtle, which was dressed at the principal inn here, when he gave a dinner to a large party of men; and, would you believe it? when we were standing near the window, conversing with a titled lady, we perceived a man crossing the street to our house, laden with what we conceived to be a large urn designed for a funeral monument; and Martha instantly came in, saying that Mr. Trueman had sent his respectful compliments, and had taken the liberty of sending us a tureen of the turtle. I had hardly breath left to desire that the man would take it back, and say we never touched any such thing. Another time he sent one of his little girls with a pineapple, which she said her papa had just cut: imagine a pine to us, who have eaten them at the hall made into fritters! they have sent us what they called early cucumbers, at a season in which our servants at the hall might have had them stewed, if they had chosen it. In short, there would be no end to my story, if I should tell you all the ways in which we are mortified and annoyed by them."

"Yes," continued the other sister, "and, what is worst of all, they have contrived to get invited every where; we meet them at the first houses in the place, and every one seems blinded by their riches to the defects of their manners and the lowness of their origin. I was at our milliner's not long since, and saw three Leghorn bonnets of the finest texture, trimmed very elegantly; I asked the price; 'four guineas and a half each,' was the reply of the girl who was attending to my orders. 'Four guineas and a half for a bonnet!' said I, 'it is shameful, and is more than I ever did or ever will give for one.' 'I dare say, madam,' said the girl with a sneer, 'that these bonnets are for Mrs. Trueman and her daughters, and they have pelisses of gros de Naples, the making of which will come to ten guineas each.' Another time, the butcher having neglected our orders because Mrs. Trueman had given some immediately afterward to a higher amount, Martha scolded the boy for making us wait so long, and said, angrily, 'Do you not know the difference between serving the Trueman and the Aspinalls?' 'Yes,' said the fellow with a vulgar grin, 'I think I do, for Mr. Trueman's weekly bills are about five guineas, while your ladies' bills are not above five shillings.' This will just suffice to give you some idea of our annoyances here, and we are very glad that you have called to-day; for, as you have seen most parts of England, you may perhaps assist us with your advice in the choice of a residence. You know our situation; we have but a limited income, and we cannot bear to be obliged to associate with, and indeed submit to persons who, from the mere circumstance of their being wealthy, think that they have a right to place themselves on a par with us. Bath has been suggested to us as a desirable residence: what is your opinion of it?"

"I should think," said I, "that Bath might suit you very well; you will there meet with many ladies similarly situated, and I think I can insure you against any of the annoyances which you have just particularized, inasmuch as I do not think that there is a landlord in Bath who will voluntarily offer to continue you in his house at a low rent, when he could obtain a higher one; and I do not think that you will meet with any one there who will offend you by presents of turtle, pineapples, or early cucumbers."

"I see," said Miss Aspinall, with some emotion, "that you are laughing at us; you cannot enter into our feelings."

"Indeed," said I, "you are mistaken; but I will tell you candidly, that with these feelings you will not be happy any where. Allow me to observe, that you have been to blame; you have shut yourselves up—if I may so express it—in a world of your own, and have not marked the changes that have taken place around you. In a commercial country this must always be the case; and it has been most especially so during the last twenty or thirty years in this. Our ancestors, you know, lived in feudal greatness, and supported numerous vassals, over whom their power was absolute. That power passed away, although our country gentry long retained a very considerable degree of dignity and importance in their neighbourhoods. In our own times, the great increase of commerce, and the improvements in manufactures, have raised hundreds to immense wealth, while different causes have diminished the opulence of the landed proprietors. I remember the time when a country gentleman of ancient lineage would have thought himself degraded by an alliance with the family of a merchant; but I have lived to see these merchants the companions of rank, of title, and even of royalty itself. The merchant held himself above the manufacturer, and the latter looked down on the shopkeeper; but the full tide of commerce rolls rapidly on, and in its course sweeps off wealth from some, and brings it to others; and one rank approaches so nearly to another, that the shades and degrees are scarcely perceptible. You do not view all this with a liberal eye. You ought to rejoice in the prosperity of individuals as much as in that of the country, and to observe, with pleasure, that, by our free constitution, no man is prevented from aspiring to the highest situations, either in the church or the state. Depend upon it, that, where there exists no drawback from dishonourable conduct, or gross vulgarity of manners, wealth will be a passport even into polished society. The time is gone by when the pedigree of a man was inquired into before he could be asked to dinner, and when how many quarterings his coat of arms contained, was a more frequent question than how many servants or horses he kept. Talents, too, is a sufficient introduction now to the very first society; and any one who should inquire into the genealogy of a poet, a novelist, or an able critic, would be as much laughed at as the blockhead who asked whether the Walter Scott, of whom every body spoke, was of the firm of Scott and Mac-taggart of Paisley; or as the man who, when he observed, at a public meeting in Ireland, a lady surrounded by gentlemen, all eager for her notice, asked who she was, and, on being informed that it was the celebrated Miss Edgeworth, exclaimed, 'Celebrated! oh, then, I suppose, she has a very large fortune. Is her money in the funds, or has she landed property?' I will concede so far to your prejudices, Miss Lucretia, as to acknowledge that both these worthies were not of genteel birth or high origin. Education, you will say, will always make a difference in individuals, let their wealth be what it will; and this is true; but recollect, also, that the frequency of a good education has also increased in the same proportion; and the young people who have grown up around us, have received, in consequence of the opulence of their parents, acquirements, accomplishments, and manners, that raise them to an equal footing with any other persons. Let a girl be placed at a good school, and a liberal salary paid with her, and she will be taught as well, and profit as much by instruction, as the daughter of a nobleman; money has enabled her parents to look up to a higher rank in society, and education has qualified her to appear to advantage in it. Do not therefore make yourselves wretched by perpetually recurring to days which may never return, but rather look to what is yet in your power. You may ensure respect from your neighbours by kindness and good will; but it will not be given to arrogance and contempt; they will feel their true position in society, and you cannot push them from it, though you may exclude yourselves, and shut up in solitude, may brood over fancied evils and affronts, until they assume the forms of real misfortune. Let me have the pleasure of being instrumental to a better feeling on your parts; meet the Trueman's at my house, and look on them with unprejudiced eyes; you will find the daughters modest, lady-like, and accomplished."

"They may probably appear so," said Miss Aspinall, "when we shall consider them so far worthy of our attention as to judge coolly of them; but we never have met that family any where voluntarily, and shall not begin now. All that you have said may be very true and very wise; but you have failed in convincing us, and in fact we are too old now to learn new habits and new opinions. I shall certainly advise my sister to decide on a removal to Bath; we shall not then be so surrounded by vulgar opulence, nor be so annoyed by disgusting plenty and good living as we are here. I am told that, in Bath, a little tea is the only refreshment required at their entertainments; and that, with respect to dress, it is considered as an instance of mauvais ton to be expensively attired; I therefore think we shall make up our minds soon to remove thither. The worst of it is, that it is a long journey, and we have been little used to travelling since we left the hall; for, having been always accustomed to four horses, we have not liked to move in an inferior manner."

"In that respect," said I, "you may at least be accommodated in your own way; I can tell you how you may get to Bath with four much finer horses than ever your father had to his carriage."

"But that," said Miss Lucretia, "will be terribly expensive."

"Not at all," said I; "the fare of the stage is by no means unreasonable."

"The stage!" screamed out both the ladies.

"Mr. Medley," said Miss Aspinall, with the colour mounting to her cheeks, and tears in her eyes, "you surely are mad; I would rather walk barefooted every step of the way than disgrace myself by being seen in such a conveyance. Who on earth, do you suppose, would ever visit us in Bath, if we were known to have entered it in such a vehicle?"

"In truth," said I, rising to take leave, "I am unfortunate in my proposals this morning; but I beg permission to observe, that you have not attended to the improvements which have taken place. Stages were formerly heavy unwieldy machines, with a huge basket behind, drawn by four sorry hacks, and filled by a very inferior description of persons. Now, on the contrary, they are well built and handsomely appointed carriages, drawn by some of the finest horses in the kingdom, and the outside passengers are frequently gentlemen, and sometimes men of rank and fashion. But, as I have other visits to make, I shall not at present dwell on this topic."

I then departed, and believe that I have not gained ground in the favour of the ladies by speaking truth to them; for advancing age parts reluctantly with prejudices of any kind, and self-love and self-consequence adhere to us more firmly than any other feelings; and to be beaten out of the last strong hold of pride and imagined importance is not pleasant; nor will the friend meet with much gratitude who opens our eyes, when the result is only, that we shall see our own faults and deficiencies, and the merits and advantages of our neighbours, in a more prominent point of view.

We hurry through life, fearful, as it would seem, of looking back, lest we should be turned, like Lot's wife, into pillars of salt. And, alas! if we did look back, very often we should see nothing but the blackened and smouldering ruins of our vices, the smoking Sodom and Gomorrah of the heart.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THREE SPELLS.

THREE spirits came at his natal hour,
On him to bestow their spells of power.
A sunny brightness was in the air,
And a clear light laugh was echoing there:
'Twas the Spirit of Gladness who first drew nigh—
Bright was the glance of her beaming eye,
And her joyous voice through the clear air rang
Like music, as thus her spell she sang:

"I come, o'er that heart of thine to throw
"A charm to shield thee from care and wo;
"The ills of life over thee shall pass
"As the vapour fitts that is breathed upon glass;
"And the world to thy joyous gaze shall wear
"An aspect for ever bright and fair;
"For my spell shall cast its gladdening hue
"O'er every object that meets thy view:
"All life's romance shall belong to thee,
"And nought of its dark reality:
"The phantom of sorrow shall quickly fly
"From the cheerful glance of thy sunny eye;
"For thy presence shall be as the coming of spring,
"New life to the withered heart to bring:
"The smile of thy lip shall have power to chase
"The gloom of grief from the mourner's face;
"And the heart shall forget its misery,
"While watching thy spirit's buoyancy.
"Be the spell which I give thee never broken—
"Thou art mine for ever—my charm is spoken!"

Scarcely was that bright spirit mute,
When a voice, like the breath of a mellow flute,
On the hushed air rose, so full and clear,
Like silver sounds from another sphere;
'Twas the witching Spirit of Melody,
Her every feature was harmony;
And music was e'en in the echo sweet
Of the lightest tread of her fairy feet.
She sang—and the air grew still as death,
As loth to lose her faintest breath:

"Oh! favoured one! unto thee I bring
"A spell which shall never know withering.
"The spirit of gladness hath shed its grace
"O'er every feature of thy bright face;
"But I come to give to thy voice's tone
"A charm which belongs unto me alone;
"Be its magic thine—my voice shall be heard
"In thy slightest tone, in thy lightest word:
"Music shall ring in thy laughter's tone
"With a clear glad sound, unfelt by none;
"And e'en in thy step's approach shall dwell
"The might and the magic that reign in my spell.
"To thy silvery voice shall belong the art
"To raise an echo in every heart."

She ceased—and a chillness was in the air
When her magical voice ceased to murmur there.
But lastly came the Spirit of Art,
To bind her spell round that youthful heart.
She came with an aspect coldly fair,
You could trace no feeling working there:
And thus she whispered:

"Be mine the spell
"To make thy feelings invisible;
"To mask thy heart from the world's keen gaze;
"And check each look that the soul betrays.
"No eye the thoughts of thy heart shall trace,
"They shall cast no shadow upon thy face,
"But around thee shall dwell a mystery
"To baffle the gazer's scrutiny;
"Yet the heart, which for ever a mask shall wear,
"Shall seem to have nothing hidden there,
"And nature appear to speak in each glance
"Of thy frank and fearless countenance;
"Thine open brow and mien shall express
"All youth's untutored artlessness;
"And the frankness which reigns in thy voice's tone,
"O'er thy looks, and speech, and smile, shall be thrown.
"None e'er shall gaze on thy face, and deem,
"Thy words and looks aught but what they seem;
"For the changes which flit o'er thy cheek and brow
"Shall seem every thought of the heart to avow.
"But they shall but deceive—for no eye shall trace
"Thy thoughts by the gladness or gloom of thy face;
"Yet the mask shall be hid—for it is the pride
"Of art, to appear to have nought to hide.
"Be thy thoughts and feelings inscrutable,
"And my power be thine—I have breathed my spell!"

It is well for us that we are born babes in intellect. Could we understand and reflect upon one half of what most mothers at that time say and do to us, we should draw conclusions in favour of our own importance, which would render us insupportable for years. Happy the boy whose mother is tired of talking nonsense to him before he is old enough to know the sense of it!

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

SUNSET.—Every lover of true poetry must remember the splendid conclusion of Bertram's narrative, in Sir Walter Scott's Rokeby.

"And now my race of terror run,
Mine be the eve of tropic sun!
No pale gradations quench his ray,
No twilight dews his wrath allay;
With disk, like battle target red,
He rushes to his burning bed,
Dyes the wide wave with bloody light,
Then sinks to rest—and all is night."

Beautiful as this is, it would appear that the phenomenon on which it is founded has no existence. The following interesting remarks are extracted from the late Bishop Heber's Travels. It occurs in the diary of his voyage:

"September 18.—This evening we had a most beautiful sunset—the most remarkable recollected by any of the officers or passengers, and I think the most magnificent spectacle I ever saw. Besides the usual beautiful tints of crimson, flame-colour, &c. which the clouds displayed, and which were strongly contrasted with the deep blue of the sea, and the lighter, but equally beautiful blue of the sky, there were in the immediate neighbourhood of the sinking sun, and for some time after his disk had disappeared, large tracks of a pale translucent green, such as I had never seen before except in a prism, and surpassing every effect of paint, or glass, or gem. Every body on board was touched and awed by the glory of the scene, and many observed, that such a spectacle alone was worth the whole voyage from England. One circumstance in the scene struck me as different from all which I had been led to expect in a tropical sunset. I mean, that its progress from light to darkness was much more gradual than most travellers and philosophers have stated. The dip of the sun did not seem more rapid, nor did the duration of the tints on the horizon appear materially less, than on similar occasions in England. Neither did I notice any striking difference in the continuance of the twilight. I pointed out the fact to Major Sackville, who answered that he had long been convinced that the supposed rapidity of sunset and sunrise in India had been exaggerated—that he had always found a good hour between dawn and sunrise, and little less between sunset and total darkness. As, indeed, we are at present within three degrees of the line, we must, a fortiori, have witnessed the precipitancy of the sun, if it really existed any where, in a still greater degree than it can be witnessed in any part of Hindostan."

HOW TO PREPARE FOR A FLOGGING.—George S—, late a lieutenant in the United States army, was one of the most eccentric fellows in the world. When a boy, having incurred the displeasure of his father, the latter called him to an account, and after examining as to the why and wherefore of his misconduct, resolved on applying the rod, now more fashionably called "hickory." But, that the punishment might have the more salutary effect, instead of inflicting it immediately, he gave the culprit time to reflect and chew the bitter cud of repentance, made ten times more bitter by the anticipation of what was to follow. "George," said he, "you may go for the present, but prepare yourself early to-morrow, for the most severe flogging you ever had." George retired, and the next morning, bright and early, appeared before his father to undergo the execution of his sentence. "Take off your coat, George," was the stern command. Off went the coat, and the father, standing with the well-prepared hickory in his hand, observed that his son's back, from one extremity to the other, appeared unusually protuberant. "What have you got on your back?" said he. "My jacket," replied the boy. "Well, what have you got under it?" demanded the father. "A leather apron four double," answered the lad. "A leather apron, have you, indeed! and what's that for?" "Why, pa," said the youngster with a grave countenance, "you told me to prepare for a flogging, and I got as well prepared as I could." The angry father now turned away to hide a laugh, and the boy escaped a flogging by being so well prepared for it.

OBSTINACY AND PERSEVERANCE.—Obstinacy and perseverance, though often confounded, are two very different things; a man may be very obstinate, and yet not persevere. Obstinacy is resistance to truth; perseverance is a continuance in truth or error.

Poetry is to philosophy what the sabbath is to the remainder of the week.

VILLAGE SKETCHES.

AN OLD BACHELOR.

BY MISS MITFORD.

THERE is no effect of the subtle operation of the association of ideas more universal and more curious than the manner in which the most trivial circumstances recall particular persons to our memory. Sometimes these glances of recollection are purely pleasurable. Thus I have a double liking for May-day, as being the birth-day of a dear friend, whose fair idea bursts upon me with the first sunbeam of that glad morning; and I can never hear certain airs of Mozart and Handel without seeming to catch an echo of that sweetest voice in which I first learnt to love them. Pretty often, however, the point of association is less elegant, and occasionally it is tolerably ludicrous. We happened to-day to have for dinner a couple of wild ducks, the first of the season; and as the master of the house, who is so little of an epicure that I am sure he would never while he lived, out of its feathers, know a wild duck from a tame—whilst he, with a little affectation of science, was squeezing the lemon and mixing Cayenne pepper with the gravy, two of us exclaimed in a breath, "Poor Mr. Sidney!" "Ay," rejoined the squeezer of lemons, "poor Sidney! I think he would have allowed that these ducks were done even to half a turn." And then he told the story more elaborately to a young visiter, to whom Mr. Sidney was unknown; how, after eating the best parts of a couple of wild ducks, which all the company pronounced to be the finest and the best dressed wild ducks ever brought to table, that judicious critic in the gastronomic art limited the too sweeping praise, by gravely asserting, that the birds were certainly excellent, and that the cookery would have been excellent also, had they not been roasted half a turn too much. Mr. Sidney has been dead these fifteen years; but no wild ducks have ever appeared on our homely board without recalling that observation. It is his memorable saying; his one good thing.

Mr. Sidney was, as might be conjectured, an epicure; he was also an old bachelor, a clergyman, and senior fellow of — College, a post which he had long filled, being, although only a second son, so well provided for that he could afford to reject living after living in expectation of one favourite rectory, to which he had taken an early fancy from the pleasantness of the situation and the imputed salubrity of the air. Of the latter quality, indeed, he used to give an instance, which, however satisfactory as confirming his prepossession, could hardly have been quite agreeable, as preventing him from gratifying it; namely, the extraordinary and provoking longevity of the incumbent, who, at upwards of ninety, gave no sign of decay, and bade fair to emulate the age of old Parr.

Whilst waiting for the expected living, Mr. Sidney, who disliked a college residence, built himself a very pretty house in our neighbourhood, which he called his home; and where he lived, as much as a love of Bath, and Brighton, and London, and lords, would let him. He counted many noble families amongst his near connexions, and passed a good deal of his time at their country seats—a life for which he was by character and habit peculiarly fitted.

In person he was a tall, stout, gentlemanly man, "about fifty, or by'r lady, inclining to threescore," with fine features, a composed gravity of countenance and demeanour, a bald head most accurately powdered, and a very graceful bow—quite the pattern of an elderly man of fashion. His conversation was in excellent keeping with the calm imperturbability of his countenance, and the sedate gravity of his manner—smooth, dull, common-place, exceedingly safe, and somewhat imposing. He spoke so little, that people really fell into the mistake of imagining that he thought, and the tone of decision with which he would advance some second-hand opinion, was well calculated to confirm the mistake. Gravity was certainly his chief characteristic, and yet it was not a clerical gravity either. He had none of the generic marks of his profession. Although perfectly decorous in life, and word, and thought, no stranger ever took Mr. Sidney for a clergyman. He never did any duty any where, that ever I heard of, except the agreeable duty of saying grace before dinner; and even that was often performed by some lay host, in pure forgetfulness of his guest's ordination. Indeed, but for the direction of his letters, and an eye to — Rectory, I am persuaded that the circumstance might have slipped out of his own recollection.

His quality of old bachelor was more perceptible. There lurked under all his polish, well covered but not concealed, the quiet selfishness, the little whims, the precise habits, the primness and priggishness of that disconsolate condition. His man, Andrews, for instance, valet, groom, and body-servant abroad; butler, cook, caterer, and major-domo at home; tall, portly, powdered and black-coated as his master, and like him in all things but the knowing pig-tail which stuck out horizontally above his shirt-collar, giving a ludicrous dignity to his appearance. Andrews, who, constant as the dial pointed nine, carried up his chocolate and shaving-water, and regular as "the chimneys at midnight," prepared his white-wine whey; who never forgot his gouty shoe in travelling—once for two days he had a slight touch of that gentlemanly disorder—and never gave him the newspaper unaired; to whom could this jewel of a valet, this matchless piece of clock-work belong, but an old bachelor? And his little dog Viper, unparagoned of terriers, black, sleek, sharp, and shrewish; who would beg and sneeze, and fetch and carry like a Christian; eat olives, and sweetmeats, and mustard; drink coffee, and wine, and liqueurs—who but an old bachelor could have taught Viper his multifarious accomplishments?

Little Viper was a most useful person in his way; for although Mr. Sidney was a very creditable acquaintance to meet on the king's highway—your dull man, if he rides well, should never think of dismounting—or even on the level ground of a carpet, in the crowd of a large party; yet when he happened to drop in to take a family dinner—a pretty frequent habit of his when in the country—then Viper's talents were inestimable in relieving the ennui occasioned by that grave piece of gentility, his master, "not only dull in himself, but the cause of dulness in others." Any thing to pass away the heavy hours, till whist or piquet relieved the female world from his intolerable silence.

In other respects these visits were sufficiently perplexing. Every housewife can tell what a formidable guest is an epicure who comes to take pot-luck—how sure it is to be bad luck, especially when the unfortunate hostess lives five miles from a market town. Mr. Sidney always came unseasonably, on washing-day, or Saturday, or the day before a great party. So sure as we had a scrap dinner, so sure came he. My dear mother, who with true benevolence and hospitality cared much for her guest's comfort and nothing for her own pride, used to grieve over his discomfort, and try all that could be done by potted meats and omelettes, and little things tossed up on a sudden to amend the bill of fare. But cookery is an obstinate art, and will have its time—however you may force the component parts, there is no forcing a dinner. Mr. Sidney had the evil habit of arriving just as the last bell rang; and in spite of all the hurry-scurry in the kitchen department, the new niceties and the old homely dishes were sure to disagree. There was a total want of keeping. The kickshaws were half raw, the solids were mere rags; the vegetables were cold, the soup was scalding; no shallots to the rump-steaks; no mushrooms with the broiled chicken; no fish, no oysters, no ice, no pineapple. Poor Mr. Sidney! He must have had a great regard for us to put up with our bad dinners.

Perhaps the chance of a rubber had something to do with his visits to our house. If there be such a thing as a ruling passion, the love of whist was his. Cards were not merely the amusement, but the business of his life. I do not mean as a money-making speculation; for although he belonged to a fashionable club in London, and to every card-meeting of decent gentility within reach of his country-home, he never went beyond a regular moderate stake, and could not be induced to bet, even by the rashest defier of calculation, or the most provoking undervaluer of his play. It always seemed to me that he regarded whist as far too important and scientific a pursuit to be degraded into an affair of gambling. It had in his eyes all the dignity of a study; an acquirement equally gentlemanly and clerical. It was undoubtedly his test of ability. He had the value of a man of family and a man of the world for rank, and wealth, and station, and dignities of all sorts. No human being entertained a higher respect for a king, a prince, a prime minister, a duke, a bishop, or a lord. But these were conventional feelings. His genuine and unfeigned veneration was reserved for him who played a good rubber, a praise he did not easily give. He was a capital player himself, and held all his country competitors, except one, in supreme and undisguised contempt, which they endured to admiration. I wonder they did not send him to Coventry. He was the most disagreeable partner in the world, and nearly as unpleasant an adversary; for he not only enforced the Pythagorean law of science, which makes one hate whist so, but used to distribute quite impartially to every one at table, little disagreeable observations on every card they played. It was not scolding, or grumbling, or fretting; one has a sympathy with those expressions of feeling, and at the worst can scold again; it was a smooth polite commentary on the errors of the party, delivered in the calm tone of undoubted superiority, with which a critic will sometimes take a small poet, or a batch of poets, to task in a review. How the people could bear it!—but the world is a good-natured world, and does not like a man the less for treating it scornfully.

So passed six evenings out of the seven with Mr. Sidney, for it was pretty well known that, on the rare occurrence of his spending a day at home without company, his fac-totum Andrews used to have the honour of being beaten by his master in a snug game at double dummy; but what he did with himself on Sunday occasioned me some speculation. Never in my life did I see him take up a book, although he sometimes talked of Shakspeare and Milton, and Johnson and Burke, in a manner which proved that he had heard of such things; and as to the newspaper, which he did read, that was generally connoed over long before night; besides, he never exhibited spectacles, and I have a notion that he could not read newspaper type at night without them. How he could possibly get through the after-coffee hours on a Sunday, puzzled me long. Chance solved the problem. He came to call on us after church, and agreed to dine and sleep at our house. The moment tea was over, without the slightest apology or attempt at conversation, he drew his chair to the fire, set his feet on the fender, and fell fast asleep in the most comfortable and orderly manner possible. It was evidently a weekly habit. Every sense and limb seemed composed to it. Viper looked up in his face, curled himself round on the hearth rug, and went to sleep too; and Andrews, just as the clock struck twelve, came in to wake him, that he might go to bed. It was clearly an invariable custom; a settled thing.

His house, and grounds were kept in the neatest manner possible. There was something even disagreeable in the excessive nicety, the Dutch preciseness of the shining gravel walks, the smooth shaven turf of the lawn, and the fine-sifted mould of the shrubberies. A few dead leaves or scattered flowers, even a weed or two, any thing to take away from the artificial toy-like look of the place, would have been an improvement. Mr. Sidney, however, did not think so. He actually caused his gardener to remove those littering plants called roses and gum cistus. Other flowers fared little better. No sooner were they in bloom, than he pulled them up, for fear they should drop. In-doors, matters were still worse. The rooms and furniture were very handsome, abounding in the luxurious Turkey carpets, the sofas, easy chairs, and ottomans, which his habits required; and yet I never in my life saw any house which looked less comfortable. Every thing was so constantly in its place, so provokingly in order, so full of naked nicety, so thoroughly old-bachelorish. No work! no books! no music! no flowers! But for those two things of life, Viper and a sparkling fire, one might have thought the place uninhabited. Once a year, indeed, it gave signs of animation, in the shape of a Christmas party. That was Mr. Sidney's shining time. Nothing could exceed the smiling hospitality of the host, or the lavish profusion of the entertainment. It breathed the very spirit of a welcome splendidly liberal; and little Viper frisked and bounded, and Andrews' tail vibrated—I was going to say wagged—with cordiality and pleasure. Andrews, on these occasions, laid aside his "customary black," in favour of a blue coat and a white silk court waistcoat, with a light running pattern of embroidery and silver spangles, assumed to do honour to his master and the company. How much he enjoyed the applause which the wines and the cookery elicited from the gentlemen; and how anxiously he would direct the ladies' attention to a MS. collection of riddles, the compilation of some deceased countess, laid on the drawing-room table for their amusement between dinner and tea! Once, I remember, he carried his attention so far as to produce a gone-by toy, called a bandalore, for the recreation of myself and another little girl, admitted by virtue of the Christmas holidays to this annual festival. Poor Andrews! I am convinced that he considered the entertainment of the visitors quite as much his affair as his master's; and certainly they both succeeded. Never did parties pass more pleasantly. On those evenings Mr. Sidney even forgot to find fault at whist.

At last, toward the end of a severe winter, during which he had suffered much from repeated colds, the rectory of — became vacant, and our worthy neighbour hastened to take possession. The day before his journey, he called on us in the highest spirits, anticipating a renewal of health and youth in this favourite spot, and approaching nearer than I had ever heard him to a jest on the subject of looking out for a wife. Married or single, he made us promise to visit him during the ensuing summer. Alas! long before the summer arrived, our poor friend was dead. He had waited for this living thirty years; he did not enjoy it thirty days.

WRITING DOWN A FACE.—"I once," says a late traveller in Italy, "asked a Neapolitan fisherman to sit for me to paint him. He did not in the least understand the nature of my proposition; but, after some difficulties on his side, and many assurances on mine that I would not hurt him, he consented, and followed me. When I had finished, his astonishment at beholding his portrait was amusing; and, descending with me to the street, I heard him exclaim to his comrades, 'that Signore has written down my face.' So high is their idea of writing, that they can imagine no superior or more lofty name for what appears to them a similar sort of conjuration."

THE DRAMA.

SEVEN YEARS OF THE KING'S THEATRE.

BY JOHN EBERS, MANAGER.

This is the title of an amusing work which has recently been republished in this country. It is not necessary that we should follow Mr. Ebers through his long narrations of his arrangements with singers and dancers, his embassies to Naples and to Paris, his correspondence with Lord Fife and Lord Bruce, his manifold vexations from pretended colds and alleged hoarseness; and, above all, the doleful particulars of his falling receipts and his rising rent. His philosophy triumphed over all these troubles. See how calmly he takes unavoidable evils:

"Could the situation of manager—he says—be divested of the cares and difficulties inherent in it, it would not be devoid of pleasure, in mingling with characters strongly marked, and often highly interesting. But, as it is impossible to reconcile inconsistencies, he who embarks on the sea of management must be content to enjoy such rare moments of calm and sunshine as mingle with the storms to which he is exposed. For myself, I have rarely failed, even when most surrounded with difficulties, to make the most of the pleasant places into which my path has occasionally led, and have found in management, as in the universal business of life, that the best guardian against calamity is a disposition to be happy when in my power, and quietly to acquiesce when misfortune is inevitable."

The troubles of a manager are partly exemplified in the account of a rehearsal.

"This word summons up, to all practically acquainted with its meaning, a scene beyond description. If the performances of a theatre are intended to represent the truth of human nature, a rehearsal is the living reality—the scene where the veil is rent in twain, and all the turmoil laid open to the view, which can be produced by the undisguised operations of vanity, self-love, and jealousy. The fabled crowds who petitioned heaven to allot their parts in life otherwise than fate had cast them, are but a type of the inmates of a theatre behind the scenes, when contending for prominent characters in an opera. Perhaps with the very first performers there is not much of this, as their right to the principal parts cannot be disputed. But dire is the struggle among all below. A part rather better than another is an apple of contention which, to manager, director, and conductor, proves a most bitter fruit. As every person likes to have that character which may best serve, not the general effect of the piece or the interests of the theatre, but his or her own object in making the greatest display possible; and, as non-concession is the permanent rule of the place, the opera is placed in the pleasing predicament of being able neither to get one way nor the other. The prima donna, whose part is settled, attends the rehearsal, and the seconda, being displeased with her own station in the piece, will not go on; and the first lady, indignant at being detained to no purpose, goes away, and the business is detained for the day. If the manager is positive, the lady falls ill. Biagioli, being refused a part she wanted in 'Elisa e Claudio,' took to her bed for two days, in consequence—as she said—of being so afflicted by my decision. The refusal to proceed is the more effectual engine, because it puts all the rest of the company out of humour at their time being occupied needlessly; all complain, and a dialogue goes on, in which every body talks at once; and probably three different languages at least being simultaneously employed by different speakers, the result may be conceivable, but not expressible. The signori protest, the signore exclaim; the choruses are wonderfully in concert in their lamentations; the director commands, intreats, stamps, and swears, with equal success; and in the midst of the Babel, the gentlemen of the orchestra, who wish all the singers at the devil, endeavour to get over the business of the day by playing on without the vocal music. The leader of the orchestra, finding all ineffectual, puts on his hat, and walks away, followed by violins, basses, trombones, and kettle-drums, en masse, and the scene at length concludes as it may, the manager, composer, and director, being left to calculate together on the progress of business."

Mr. Ebers appears to be a tasteful judge of personal beauty, as well as of singing and acting. Of Ronzi de Begnis he seems to be a fervent admirer.

"Who," he exclaims, "does not know her as the model of beauty? Perhaps no performer was ever more enthusiastically admired. Her beauty came on the spectator at once, electric and astonishing. You did not study her, or trace out feature by feature, till you grew warmed into admiration; one look fixed. Her personal perfection took the more sure hold, because it was not of the ordinary stamp. Her features, but not her complexion, were Italian. The characteristic of the latter was a fairness so perfect as to be almost dazzling, the more so, because so palpably set off by the glossy blackness of her hair. Her face was beautiful and full of intelligence, and made almost eloquent by the incessant brilliance of eyes, large, black, and expressive, and in which the playful and the passionate by turns predominated; either expression seemed so natural to them, that it seemed for the time incapable of being displaced by another as suitable and as enchanting. Her mouth was so delightfully formed that she took care never to disfigure it, and whatever she sang, she never forgot this care. Her figure, if a little more slender, would have been perfect; perhaps it was not less pleasing because it inclined to exceed the proportions to which a statuary would have confined its swell. The form, when at rest, did not seem a lively one, but when in action it appeared perfectly buoyant, so full of spirit, so redundant with life. The exquisite outline of her swelling throat, penciled, when she sang, with the blue tinge of its full veins, admitted no parallel; it was rich and full—ineffectual terms to convey an idea of its beauty. But to be thought of justly, she must be seen."

To the wife of Rossini he assigns great professional merit, but not without a deficiency in an important respect.

"This lady had for many years been one of the most celebrated performers on the continent. By birth she was a Spaniard, and had almost become an Italian by adoption. She was herself a composer, and well versed in her science. Early in life she had acquired considerable reputation; a voice of a most charming quality and compass had united with superior personal endowments to give éclat to her performances. She was a wonderful favourite with the king of Naples. Her name was a party word, and the royalists showed their attachment to the monarch by applauding the singer. A gentleman from the country went to the theatre with a friend, a Neapolitan. On coming away, the Englishman asked his friend whether he liked Madame Colbran. 'Like her! I am a royalist,' was the reply. When the revolutionists succeeded, they vented all their spleen against Colbran. Her appearance was the signal of uproar. A vehement member of the party laboured a whole evening in showing his disapprobation, exclaiming at every pause which the violence of his exertions compelled him to make, 'It is our turn now—now we can hiss!'"

The constitutionalists were suppressed, and Colbran regained her station.

"Her figure was stately and commanding, fit for the representation of queens and heroines. In such characters her powers chiefly appeared, but in the pathetic she was deficient. Much of her power she retained on her visit here; but it was said by those who had before been familiar with her singing, that lapse of years—for she was now forty—had perceptibly influenced the tone and scale of her voice. There was something in the tone of her voice, of more powerful effect than I remember to have heard in any other, and her taste was perfect. It was when enamoured of Madame Colbran that Rossini composed many of his best operas, the first soprano part of each being written for her."

Beside doing justice to the excellence of Camporese as an actress and a singer, he extols the goodness of her heart, and relates this anecdote of her:

"An intimate acquaintance waited on her one morning to make a request. In the hospital for the insane at Milan, a man was confined, literally fanatico per musica; he had lost his senses on the failure of an opera, in which the labour of the composer was greater than the excellence of his music. This unfortunate man had, by some accident, heard of Camporese, whose fame filled the city, and immediately conceived a very strong wish to hear her sing. For a while his representations passed unnoticed; he grew ungovernable, and was obliged to be fastened to his bed. In this state, Camporese's friend had beheld him. She was dressing for an evening party, when this representation was made to her. She paused a moment on hearing it; then throwing a cloak over her shoulders, said, 'Come then.' 'Whither?' 'To the hospital.' 'But why? there is no occasion to go now—to-morrow, or the next day.' 'To-morrow—no, indeed, if I can do this poor man good, let me go instantly.' And they went. Being shown into a room, separated from that of the maniac only by a thin wall, Camporese began to sing one of Haydn's melodies. The attendants in the next room observed their patient suddenly become less violent, then composed; at last he burst into tears. The singer now entered, sat down, and sang again. When she had concluded, the poor composer took from under the bed a torn sheet of paper, scored with an air of his own composition, and handed it to her. There were no words, and there was nothing in the music; but Camporese running it over, sang it to some words of Metastasio, with such sweetness that the music seemed excellent. 'Sing it me once more,' said the maniac. She did so, and departed amidst his prayers and the tears of the spectators."

Pasta, whose fame is now so high, was in no great estimation during the earlier part of her career.

"Her progress affords a prominent instance of the effects of study and sedulous cultivation. On her first appearance at the King's theatre, in 1817, little was thought of her talents, and, if not condemned, she was neglected, and suffered to depart at the end of the season without having experienced encouragement. On most performers this negative failure would have operated to extinguish the latent flame of genius and capability. Pasta withdrew, and, retiring to Italy, devoted herself unremittingly to the study of her science, and the improvement of her voice. Her genius is undoubtedly real, for she must have felt it; nothing but the full consciousness of what she might become could have strengthened her to the endurance of the cold disregard with which her commencement had been encountered. Whilst in Italy, an English nobleman who saw her there said, that her exertions were unremitting: 'Other singers,' he said, 'find themselves endowed with a voice, and leave every thing else to chance; this woman leaves nothing to chance, and her success is, therefore, certain.'

"After a lapse of four years thus employed, she made her appearance in France, and the Parisians at once felt and acknowledged her worth; though it was, perhaps, hardly to have been expected that her severe and inartificial representation would have found favour in the eyes of a people so devoted to an arbitrary style of acting and expression."

A star of the last season—Mademoiselle Sontag—seems to have fascinated Mr. Ebers; but it is absurd to confound admiration with worship. When Dr. Robertson said that he was almost ready to worship Dr. Johnson, Boswell properly animadverted on the impropriety of the declaration.

"Wherever Sontag went, the estimation of her beauty and her talent was the same. The sentiment excited toward her in the earlier part of her career was that of astonishment, which was succeeded by unbounded admiration. A crowd of worshippers attended her footsteps, and many were the romantic tales in circulation about her. One of these denoted her as the destined bride of a German prince; another bestowed her on an ambassador at the French court."

A report of more interest was retailed to me; its purport is as follows:

"A few years ago, an attachment subsisted between the beautiful Henriette and a young student of good family and excellent character. His application, learning, and abilities, had gained him the highest estimation at Jena; but his mistress valued him more because he had maintained an unsullied reputation, keeping free from the excesses in which other youths of the university too frequently indulged. In an evil hour, under the excitement proceeding from having obtained some academic honour, the student was induced to indulge beyond his wont in the festivals of the table; and, as one temptation, yielded to, levels the path for another, he was led to play: unaccustomed to games, he rose from the table a loser of five hundred florins. The report quickly spread; but his mistress received the information from a better source—the lover himself wrote to her, with the confession of his error. 'I still love you,' was the reply; 'but you are no longer the same, and we must not meet again. Farewell.'

"An Italian gentleman at Paris, the firmest item of whose creed was that none but Italians could sing well, refused to admit that Sontag—whom he had never heard—could at all equal the singers of Italy. With great difficulty he was induced to hear her. After listening five minutes, he rose to depart. 'But do stay,' said his friend; 'you will be convinced presently.' 'I know it,' said the Italian, 'and therefore I go.'"

When we are viewing the galaxy of vocalism, Signor Velluti ought not to be neglected:

"At Milan he was the idol of the people; he was received con furore, and his fame spread on every side. A Milanese gentleman, who had a rich uncle dangerously ill, was met in the street by a friend, who asked, 'Where are you going?' 'To the Scala, to be sure.' 'How! Your uncle is at the point of death.' 'Yes, but Velluti sings to-night.'"

"At Vienna he was still more flattered; he was crowned, medalised, and recorded in immortal verse. His next remove was to Venice, where, I believe, he sang with Catalani. He sang, at Verona, the cantata, Il vero Omaggio, with wonderful success. Every body applauded except an old Austrian officer, who thought nothing good out of Germany. 'But is not this good?' they said to him. 'Yes, it is good—but I know a man at Vienna who would sing it as loud again!' After going the tour of the principal Italian and German theatres, Velluti arrived at Paris, where the musical taste was not prepared for him. Rossini being at that time engaged at Paris as a director of the opera, Velluti did not enter into his plans; and, having made no engagement there, he came over to England without any invitation, but strongly recommended by Lord Burghersh and other persons of distinction."

LETTER OF ADVICE.

"Enfin, monsieur, un homme aimable
"Voilà pourquoi je ne saurais l'aimer."

You tell me you're promised a lover,
My own Araminta, next week;
Why cannot my fancy discover
The hue of his coat and his cheek?
Alas! if he look like another,
A vicar, a banker, a beau,
Be deaf to your father and mother,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he wears a top-boot in his wooling,
If he comes to you riding a cob,
If he talks of his baking or brewing,
If he puts up his feet on the hob,
If he ever drinks port after dinner,
If his brow or his breeding is low,
If he calls himself "Thompson," or "Skinner,"
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he studies the news in the papers,
While you are preparing the tea,
If he talks of the damps and the vapours,
While moonlight lies soft on the sea,
If he's sleepy while you are capricious,
If he has not a musical "Oh!"
If he does not call Werter delicious,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he ever sets foot in the city,
Among the stockbrokers and Jews,
If he has not a heart full of pity,
If he don't stand six feet in his shoes,
If his lips are not redder than roses,
If his hands are not whiter than snow,
If he has not the model of noses,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

If he speaks of a tax or a duty,
If he does not look grand on his knees,
If he's blind to a landscape of beauty,
Hills, valleys, rocks, waters, and trees,
If he dotes not on desolate towers,
If he likes not to hear the blast blow,
If he knows not the language of flowers,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

He must walk like a god of old story,
Come down from the home of his rest;
He must smile like the sun in his glory,
On the buds he loves ever the best;
And oh, from its ivory portal,
Like music, his soft speech must flow!
If he speak, smile, or walk like a mortal,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

Don't listen to tales of his bounty,
Don't hear what they tell of his birth,
Don't look at his seat in the county,
Don't calculate what he is worth;
But give him a theme to write verse on,
And see if he turns out his toe;
If he's only an excellent person,
My own Araminta, say "No!"

THE HUMORIST.

SERENADING.

I HAVE read that serenading, in Spain, is one of the principal means a lover has to gain admittance both to the presence and heart of his "most adorable." I have often wished to try the same experiment on one of the most beautiful, bright, benignant, blessed women under heaven, with whom, alas, I have the misfortune to be deeply, distractedly, and delightedly in love; now be it known this lady's name is Barbara Baker. How I have tried to gain this damsel's affections I blush to acknowledge; but I fear I have made no more impression than if I had not spoiled so many quires of paper in sonnets, stanzas, impromptus, &c. which have, one and all, been addressed to this divine deceiver; some comparing her to an angel for sweetness of temper, and others to Nero for cruelty; but all would not do; she was impenetrable, and I was a fool.

One day, after having coursed over the first and last verses of a poetic epistle I had written and given her—which my maiden aunt declared to be quite moving—she turned round on her heel, saying, all the poetry I had sent her would turn out to be blank verse. Then I plainly saw poetry was not the thing, as she was ignorant of the difference between blank verse and rhyme. What might vocal eloquence do? I studied a speech which would have melted any other woman's heart, and hastened to her abode. There she sat very innocently, playing with and twisting her curls into a thousand different forms; and a man, ye gods! a man whispering something in her ear, which seemed to embarrass her, and leaving upon her cheek a colour that would have shamed a rose, and made it look more like a lily. I bowed twice ere they saw me: another bend, and they heard a scrape of my foot on the floor, and I begging, hemming, hoping I did not intrude. She twisted her chair rather more to the right, I being on the left side: and he a tall, over-reaching fellow of an officer of the guards, at least six feet high, walked round the room on pretence of examining some pictures of the barbarous girl's painting, and seeing no chance of any conversation as matters now stood, I resolved "to screw my courage to the sticking place," and began thus—

"Madam, I fear I intrude, hem! hem! I beg pardon—but I thought you were alone, or I would not have——"

"Well, sir, you see I am not alone."

"Madam, I see and feel—madam, you are false. Feelings that have taken root in the soul, and nourished, as I thought, by your affection, are blasted in the bud, for which I have to thank your falsehood."

The captain drew near enough to hear this, and giving his sword a most murderous-like twist, exclaimed,

"If you, sir, have any thing to communicate to this lady, I should feel happy if you would transfer it to me:" he stared me impudently in the face, expecting an answer.

I showed my contempt by bowing slightly to Barbara, and left the room. When I arrived at the street-door, I found I had left my hat behind, and gave the servant a shilling to fetch it—returned home, and on placing it on the peg, a curled greasy pink paper dropped, which, on a close examination, I found to be one of my last addresses to her on satin note paper, which had evidently been used instead of candle ornaments.

Weeks rolled on, and still I dared not venture out. I remained alone in my study, the victim of misery.

One day I had been dozing in my arm-chair: I dreamt by a manly exertion I had displaced the captain in the affections of Barbara. I awoke, by the servant entering to announce dinner. Being rather loquacious, I asked him the news.

"Nothing stirring, sir: but Betty, the housemaid at Mrs. Baker's, says, she thinks Captain Hornsby is a very deceitful fellow, and has a wife already."

"Leave the room, John. It must be so; Johnny, thou reasonest well."

My dream and hope of happiness to come, all conspired to make me happy beyond all bounds; the hopes moved heavier than I had ever known them before. I waited in anxious expectation for night, when I should awake Barbara from her blissful dreams by the soft tones of my grandmother's guitar and a lover's voice.

Night came. I wrapt my instrument beneath my coat just as the clock struck eleven, and hastened through cold and snow to the abode of the blessed Barbara. I trusted wholly to my extempore powers of versification, for I did not doubt that love and blissful hope would inspire my soul with song. A light glimmered through the curtains of her bed-room, and at last was extinguished. I took my station beneath the window, and strung my harp to this soft measure:

Hist! hist! awake, love, your lover's below,
Chilled by the cold and a great coat of snow;
Your aunt's sleeping soundly, and will not awake—
O! why wilt thou let me thus shiver and shake?

Hist! hist! awake, love, the watch draweth near,
And doubly I tremble with cold and with fear;
Should I say, love, I'm striking the lyre for you,
I've reason to fear he'd strike me for one too.

Hist! hist! awake, love, for I must depart;
The snow or your coldness have chilled my heart;
Farewell to thee, love, may bliss o'er thee hover,
I return to my home, a snow-clad lover.

I returned to my home, indeed, in a pretty pickle, and went to bed, and the next morning had the rheumatism, and a note from Captain Hornsby, saying he pitied me; but when I wished to disturb the street by my "cater-wauling," I should go a little farther up or down, as there would be less chance of getting a pistol bullet through my brain; and as he had the preceding day been married to Miss Barbara Baker, he should thank me to cease my foolery!

I scorned to answer this letter, and therefore left town immediately, for I could not bear to see Barbara blest with another; though some were base enough to insinuate it was my fear of Captain Hornsby.

MASQUERADES.

"—Liberty unbars her prison-door,
And, like a rushing torrent, out they fly,
And now the grassy cinque have covered o'er,
With boisterous revel-rout and wild uproar;
"A thousand ways in wanton rings they run—
"Heaven shield their short-lived pastimes, I implore!"

Admirable as the above description is of the eagerness with which children quit the loosened bonds of school discipline, and fly to the enjoyment of unrestrained play, it will apply, with equal point, to the conduct of those children of larger growth, who seized the very first moment after the expiration of the law prohibiting masquerades, to rush with impetuous ardour, and high-wrought curiosity, to these long-denied sports. Theatre after theatre has now been crowded to excess with the beauty and the chivalry, the gallantry and the fashion, of this huge city; and strange, and novel, and, in many respects, delightful, has been the metamorphosis which the scenery and the personages have undergone, under the magic influence of the spirit of romance. To age have been restored its long-lost freshness, its black curls and ruddy cheeks, its elastic step and high-bounding frolics; to him who has long been pent up within the narrow precincts of the mercantile warehouse, have been given the freedom, and the noble bearing, and the high port of the knight of the crusades; the shopkeeper has turned king; the simpering miss has sighed herself into a love-sick nymph; and yon portly Bardolph, whose nose has lit him the way this many a live-long night, from late tavern to still later, has ensconced himself behind the grand insignia of Cardinal Woolsey. And see, who comes here? A monk!—what, thou a monk!—thou, who these fifteen years hast regularly rung out the sonorous nasal twang in a right orthodox protestant desk—is it come to this? Mark thy punishment. Here is thy ancient mistress, whose treble voice so oft lifted up thy aspirations on its ethereal flight to heaven—here is she, turned Jewess! And what though she be Rebecca? Wilt thou not treat her as Ivanhoe did, heartlessly and faithlessly? I fear it. Turn ye, and make way for these galliard Spanish knights and ladies fair—see how gayly they dance the joyous bolero—they who, much as they have admired in thought the sunny skies and fair landscapes of the land of Pelayo, have shuddered with horror at the bare recital of her horrible inquisition, her gloomy dungeons, and impenetrable castles. Yet now they are dons and senoras. Strange fantasies! A Turk, too!—an infidel; one who assisted at the barbarous murder of the aged patriarch, who imbrued his hands in the blood of the fair captives of Missilonghi, and who still curls his mustachios with proud disdain as he hears the empty threats of the haughty and defeated Russ. Come, we shall have no appetite for the festival. Away! away!

"To turn to something of more serious method:" The excitement and curiosity natural to these novel entertainments will soon wear away; and we hope that, as good sense and prudence take once more the place awhile allotted to the dominion of idle, though pleasurable fancies, all good citizens, and their fair companions, will agree in the policy of once more prohibiting these expensive, and, when too general, dangerous amusements.

Broadway and Fourth Avenue.—It was our intention to offer no farther observations on this subject, presuming enough had already been said to enlist the public on our side, and satisfy them of the correctness of our views. Wiser heads, and those especially who are entrusted with the management of our municipal concerns, we had hoped would be the cheerful and zealous advocates of a project fraught with deeply interesting consequences to the city. We have frankly avowed, that in the issue of it we had nothing at stake, beyond what is in common with our fellow-citizens at large. But we deem it of too much importance in its various relations to this community, to be allowed to pass off without a few additional remarks, more particularly since having understood it had met with some marked opposition.

It has been suggested to us by a gentleman of respectability and influence, whose views not only coincide with, but are far more comprehensive than our own, that inasmuch as the accomplishment of this desirable plan would probably lead to a concentration of wealth, and splendour, and beauty, greatly exceeding our anticipations; and, considering that Broadway is not less the admiration of strangers than it is justly the pride of the citizens; that, after a junction between it and the avenue shall have been effected—which can now so easily be done, and at so small an expense—the name, which is at once so appropriate and significant, should designate the whole line from the Battery to Harlem river, and that it should be known and distinguished by no other appellation than that of BROADWAY. In this we heartily concur; nor are we without the conviction that the great body of the citizens would give it their cordial assent. The honour, the reputation, and the future grandeur of the city, not less than the convenience and the thousand nameless advantages it would beget, all unite in recommending this subject to the deliberate and sober contemplation of our whole population. We feel persuaded that a little inquiry and reflection would be sufficient to insure their unqualified approbation of the proposition. In truth, it strikes us as being one of those self-evident things which require no argument to illustrate their utility. Whatever may be thought of it, we are free to express our settled belief, that should the scheme miscarry, it will hereafter be a source of deep regret and disappointment, and cannot fail to remain a standing reproach to the common council, and an indelible stigma upon every member who should be instrumental in its rejection. Indeed, it would become the solemn duty of the people to search into the matter: and if so important an improvement should be found to have been defeated through interested or selfish motives, it ought to receive, as it most assuredly would, the severest animadversion. No man who had been base enough to sacrifice the fairest interests of an extensive and growing metropolis, to promote his personal aggrandizement, or to gratify his cupidity, ought ever to be permitted again to enter the hall of the legislative council. Such a transaction would deserve to be published at the corners of the streets, and proclaimed from the house tops.

As respects the link which should connect Broadway with the Fourth Avenue, two reasons, among many others, present themselves, which we think entitled to some weight. It will be seen that a portion of the distance would comprise the old Bowery-road, which would produce no interference with any one; and in order that the owners of lots on the unmeaning and shapeless appendage to Broadway may sustain no loss in their property, part of the street might remain open, and be built upon by those who should wish for a residence there: and if the value of the property bestowed upon the corporation as a bonus for this scandalous deformity, is more than adequate to the fair benefits that ought to result from it, then we hesitate not to say, that the corporation are bound in good faith to make reasonable restitution to its former owners. This is plain logic, and cannot fail to be understood by every man of plain sense. We now take leave of the subject, trusting that our public guardians will be admonished by the numberless evils entailed upon us by means of former errors, and show their wisdom in the adoption of a more enlightened policy.

College of Pharmacy.—The public will be gratified to learn that the apothecaries of this city have united themselves into an association under the above title, for the laudable purpose of improving the sale of drugs, and elevating the character of those engaged therein. We believe that the medical society has the honour of originating the measure, and in a manner so unexceptionable, that it has met with the hearty concurrence of every respectable druggist in town. They have, accordingly, adopted a constitution, and established rules by which all persons ignorant of the nature and properties of drugs and medicines shall, hereafter, be excluded from following the business, to the great risk and detriment of society at large. This subject recommends itself to the attentive consideration and support of the citizens.

The Marriage of Figaro.—Unusual efforts have been made at the Park theatre, of late, to attract full and fashionable audiences, and they have not been unsuccessful. The enterprise and spirit of the manager have been duly appreciated, and, notwithstanding the diverting excitement which has so extensively prevailed in relation to the masquerades, the claims of song and comedy have not been overlooked. Mr. Horn. Mrs. Austin, Madame Feron, and Miss George, have been appearing in the same pieces, and, aided by the usually successful attempts to please of the stock-actors, lent a charm to the performances of this house which is seldom, if ever, surpassed elsewhere. The "Marriage of Figaro" went off with uncommon eclat on Wednesday evening of last week, and confirmed its hold upon the approbation of the public. As an opera, it is without a rival in the English language, being equally fitted to all tastes, whether of box, pit, or gallery; and the master song of Placide, with its eternal "hip, hip, hip" recurring at the close, is sure to unite all in one unanimous and spontaneous burst of deafening applause. Mr. Hilson is, beyond doubt, the only Figaro in the country. A generous and honourable competition has been kept up with spirit between the two queens of song, and the town is still undecided as to which of these charming rivals it shall award the meed of superiority. If inclined at one moment to give its vote in favour of Feron, as she throws out, with astonishing power and effect, the full and disciplined tones of her melodious voice, the sweet and tender pathos of Austin arrests them, and they feel half-desirous of making up for their too great rashness a moment before, by yielding heart and hand to the last. Miss George certainly is a sweet vocalist, and has greatly improved since we saw her last; but we must regret to see her placed in the parts usually filled with such inimitable effect by our old favourite Mrs. Hilson.

Washington City Chronicle.—We owe the editor of this excellent paper an apology for the insertion of his article on Players in a former impression of the Mirror, without the usual credit. It was entirely accidental. The Chronicle is one of the few American weekly papers which we have perused with uniform pleasure, and we take this occasion to recommend it to the notice and patronage of the New-York public.

"Look out upon the stars, my love."—Pinkney's beautiful little production commencing with this line, the reader will be gratified to perceive, has been set to music by Mr. Zeuner, one of the most skilful composers in the country. It will be found, arranged for either one or two voices, on the last page of the present impression.

Sailors and Saints.—Since our last, we have examined the pages of this new novel, and, notwithstanding the praise bestowed upon it by the English critics, find it a coarse, vulgar, and profane work. We hope no modest female will peruse it.

Clinton Square.—The proprietors of land in the upper part of the city, have projected a plan for opening a new square, comprising three hundred and twenty-four lots of ground, between Sixth and Ninth streets, and Avenues A and C, to be called "Clinton Square."

Castle Garden.—This establishment has been leased by the corporation to Mr. Henry March.

Sleep not!—thine image wakes for aye,
Within my watching breast:

Sleep not!—from her, soft sleep should fly,
Who robs all hearts of rest.

Nay, lady, from thy slumbers break,
And make this darkness gay

With looks, whose brightness well might make
Of darker nights a day.

THE BIRD OF PARADISE.

Oh! rest, sweet bird of heaven, awhile—
Oh! rest awhile thy golden wings,
Here, where the fairest flowerets smile,
Here, where the brightest verdure springs.
Around thee flash the sunny beams;
The fragrant zephyr fans thy breast:
Oh, 'tis a place of fairy dreams—
A place of peace and rest.

Then pause awhile; from every vale
The voice of nature bids thee stay:
The bright stream murmurs to the tale,
And calls thee from the skies away;
The violet droops her glittering head,
And holds her cup of morning dew;
And evening learns its tears to shed—
Like sympathy—for you.

Hush, hush, ye gales! nor dare to play
Too rudely with her wings of gold!
No breath of earth, no blush of day,
May o'er heaven's birds their sweets unfold.

* The bird of paradise is said to live upon dew.

Too bright for earth, oh! how thou'rt driven
To drink the floweret's faint perfumes!
And a light wayward beam from heaven
Seems dancing on thy plumes.

Whence comest thou? Say, hast thou seen
That region of unfading flowers,
And all the smiling spots of green
That deck elysium's sunny bowers?
Whence comest thou? Yet stay thy flight,
And linger o'er the expectant floods,
And quit the realms of cloudless light,
For earth's fair plains and woods.

Yet when the angry storms arise,
No longer thou wilt linger here,
But soar to other stormless skies,
Or seek some spirit's starry sphere;
There floating on, like hope's fond dreams,
No gale shall kiss thy stirless breast,
But purer skies and brighter beams
Shall be thy place of rest!

† When the bird of paradise is surprised by a heavy gale, it instantly soars to a higher region, beyond the reach of the tempest: there, in a serene sky, they float at ease on their light flowing feathers, and pursue their journey in security.

SIGHS AND TEARS.

'Mid the silence of that hour
He hath made too dear to me—
With the breeze that seeks his bower,
Sigh of love, I mingle thee.
Should thy fluttering betray thee—
Should he ask thee what thou art—
Say, a sigh! but ah, I pray thee,
Tell him not from whose poor heart!

O'er the silver brooklet bending,
Which I saw him first beside,
With its stream my tears are blending.
By his feet perchance to glide.
Gentle water! should he stay thee,
And demand what swells thee so;
Tell him, tears; but ah! I pray thee,
Say not from whose eyes they flow.

TO A CHILD.

FOND dreamer, in life's bud!—what dancing hues
Of pictured joy delight those cloudless eyes!
Clear as the spring, when soft and crystal dews
Drop, like young tears, from the still evening skies.
Sunshine and summer have no light like thine,
Thou early traveller in this weary vale—
Oh, once such transports and delights were mine,
Ere hope's day faded into twilight pale.

Yet, it is happiness to gaze on thee,
To be a sharer in thy young delight,
To witness thy capricious revelry,
While all around thee is so new and bright:
It brings a gladness to the wearied heart,
Though the clouds gather o'er my pathway now:
Thou hast the power, young charmer, to impart
A light to being, from that sinless brow.

For, bending o'er thee, in my mind I trace
That early joy, whose memory lingers still,
Pure as the beauty of that lovely face,
Sweet as a sunbeam on the breezy hill:
Then my soul wanders, and my thoughts go back
To drink the bliss of that refreshing spring,
As the birds wander on their airy track,
Dancing like flowers upon the zephyr's wing.

There are no shadows in thy morning sky,
Young roamer in the desert!—still for thee
The light of hope is glimmering on high,
Like the morn's pinion o'er a summer sea.
Thine early visions ne'er have found a cloud,
Thy thoughts unsullied by mischance or guile,
And golden fancies, a perpetual crowd,
Light thy young spirit with a magic smile.

Oh that thy gladness might for aye endure,
And the light linger on thy sunny brow;
That thy young heart might ever rest as pure,
And throb as joyously as it doth now!
I would thy spirit might remain as free
As the fresh winds that fan thy waving hair;
That, as life waned, thine innocence and glee
Might shed a lustre o'er the shadows there.

The wish is vanity; for to tease eye
Grief's dimness and its tears are doomed to come;
And o'er the beauty of thy laughing sky
The cloud will gather, with its fold of gloom;
The hues which bless thee will, like morning dew,
Sink in the silence of the night of death;
Thou wilt gaze back, scarce knowing how they flew,
Then sink to slumber, like the zephyr's breath. EVERARD.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

ST. JOHN'S CHAPEL, NEW-YORK.

WITH A VIEW FROM THE PARK.

THIS large and magnificent temple which has recently been materially altered and enlarged in the interior, is situated on the east side of Varick-street, in the fifth ward of the city of New-York, and in front of that spacious and ornamental plot of ground known by the name of Hudson-square, which is bounded by Varick, Laight, Hudson, and Beach streets, and contains about one hundred and seventy-six thousand square feet, and was granted by the corporation of Trinity church, New-York, to the proprietors of the lots on the streets facing on the square, and their heirs forever. The building was erected under the direction of the rector, church-wardens, and vestrymen of Trinity church, and at the expense of that corporation, and is a chapel of said church. Including its recent improvements, the cost has been upwards of two hundred thousand dollars. The corner-stone of this building was laid on the eighth day of September, in the year 1803, by the bishop of the diocese, the Right Reverend Benjamin Moore, D. D., and consecrated to the service of Almighty God on the sixth day of January, in the year 1807, by the same venerable and revered prelate. It is of the Corinthian order, built of stone, having four columns,* three feet four inches each in diameter, embracing sixty-four feet eight inches of the front; the columns rise from a basement of four feet eleven inches in height, supporting an enriched entablature, crowned by an appropriate balustrade, extending along the sides of the building one hundred and thirty-two feet nine inches by seventy-two feet eight inches, including the body and portico that projects from the front. The vertical angle of the pediment is about one hundred and thirty-five degrees, forming a line—only interrupted by the base of the steeple—from the east to the west end of the apex of the roof. The ascent from the street to the portico is by a flight of eight steps in front and at the ends, to a platform twenty-one feet nine inches wide. There are three entrances; the centre door opens into a large octagon vestibule, with folding doors to the body of the church; above which springs the lofty spire, forming an elevation equally striking and beautiful; from the ground it is two hundred and fourteen feet six inches in height, composed of the Ionic, Corinthian, and Composite orders, with appropriate vases on the entablature over each column. The steeple is neatly finished with a copper ball, whose diameters are thirty by thirty-three inches, iron ornaments, and vane richly gilt. The proportions are considered correct, and the appearance is perfectly light and elegant. At the east end of the church there has recently been erected a building corresponding, two stories in height, sufficiently large for the purposes of a vestry-room, and accommodations for the instruction of the Sunday scholars attached to the church. In the cellar beneath is constructed a furnace, lined with fire-brick; being simply erected within an air-chamber, through which the external air passes, and becomes heated by the furnace; it then passes through flues to the church, which, together with two large stoves at the west end, amply warm it. The ground floor of the church has two double and two single ranges of pews, separated by a centre aisle, two side aisles, and a cross aisle at each end, paved with marble, and extending the whole depth of the church, terminating by a platform passing around the chancel, which is of a serpentine form, and elevated three steps; behind and above which are the reading-desk and pulpit. The desk is of the Corinthian order, having a frieze and cornice, supported by four fluted pilasters, with sunken panels intervening, and is entered by a door at the north side. The pulpit rests upon a base, uniting with the end of the church; the front and angles are circular; the frieze and cornice are supported by six fluted columns, surmounted by acroters. The door-way, at the back of the pulpit, is a carved and richly ornamented screen. At each side of the pulpit is a three-quarter column and pilaster, with a full entablature, forming two recesses, and a centre circular-headed space, in which is a niche, intended for some appropriate emblem. By a projection of the wall, an arch is formed over the whole. On this surface, on each side, are two lofty fluted pilasters with their entablatures, the termination of the lofty ceiling resting on the one, and on the other an architrave, in form of an arch, with its members enriched, the key-stone of which forms an ornamental shield, supported at the sides by two cherubs, and having on the centre surface I. H. S.: the whole is crowned by a mitre. On each side of the church—constituting the principal feature—are ranges of five fluted columns, and corresponding pilasters at each end against the walls, with their full entablatures, upon which rests the beautifully arched and highly ornamented ceiling, supported at the same time by brackets or trusses, with architrave, frieze, and cornice, against the side walls, and between the windows, which are seven in number on each side, having green venetian blinds on the south. The front pews in the galleries are mostly square, with slips behind and against the walls. A number of seats are elevated for the accommodation of the Sunday scholars, on each side of the spacious organ occupying the centre of the west end gallery, which is allowed to be a superior instrument. The entrance to the galleries is by two flights of stairs from the side-doors of the portico. The capitals and carvings altogether of the exterior, as well as interior, are of exquisite workmanship, and the whole maintains that simple elegance which is agreeable to the eye, and consistent with true taste. It is considered to be inferior to no building in the United States, either in elegance of workmanship or durability of materials. At the east end there are stone steps and iron gates leading to York-street, and an ornamental iron railing in front encloses the portico. On each side of the church is a space of fifty-three feet, adjoining to which on the north is the rector's—Bishop Hobart's—residence; and on the south side is a handsome range of buildings, which adds much to the appearance of the whole. The builders were Thomas C. Taylor, Isaac M'Comb, Henry Hedley, and Daniel Dominick. H.

* These columns are considered by persons of taste as excellent in workmanship and materials; their intercolumniation is according to the order, and may be said to be equal to any in the United States. They are plain, not fluted.

THE CASKET.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE HISTORY OF A HEART.

JULIA WILMOT was beautiful, beyond all comparison beautiful. I might describe to you her full and finely rounded figure, her swanlike neck, her dazzling complexion, her dark blue eyes, her high clear forehead, her exquisitely curved lips; but the combined skill of the poet, the painter, and the sculptor, would fail to give you an idea of her all-perfect loveliness. When I first beheld her, she was at a ball, standing in the entrance of a recess, which the magic hand of taste had transformed into a magnificent temple; and worthy did she seem to be the priestess of such a shrine. Her age might have been about twenty-five—the period when a beautiful woman is, perhaps, most beautiful; when the varying charms and graceful playfulness of the girl have given place to the expanded loveliness and gentle dignity of womanhood. Her robe of green Genoa velvet was fastened at the waist by a zone of emeralds, displaying the exquisite proportions of her Juno-like figure; her sleeves were drawn up to the shoulder by emerald clasps; chains formed of the same precious stones flashed on her polished neck and snow-like arms; and a tiara of mingled emeralds and pearls sparkled amid her clustering ringlets. A veil of the richest lace, which revealed while it seemed to conceal the perfect contour of her head and neck, completed this singular and magnificent attire. She appeared to be in earnest conversation with a gentleman who stood beside her, and I watched the varying expressions of her countenance, and listened to her sweet and melancholy tones with intense interest. They were speaking of Switzerland. "That country will ever be dear to me," said she, in a thrilling tone; "the happiest hours of my life have been passed there." The gentleman's reply I did not hear, but, as by an involuntary motion her hand struck the chords of a harp which was near her, she said, "No, the heart can enjoy happiness but once, and my hour is past; an accidental touch may produce music from an instrument that is attuned to harmony, but if broken and unstrung, the skill of an angel could not awaken it to melody." At that moment a tall, fine looking man, in naval uniform, approached, and, with the easy, assured air of one certain of a favourable reception, whispered some request. She started at the sound of his voice, and an expression almost of aversion dwelt for an instant upon her fine features; but, resuming that perfect self-command which she could so well exert, she turned to him with one of her sweetest smiles, and presented him her hand. I followed them; and in a few mi-notes she was seated at the piano, playing one of the favourite patriotic airs of the day, with all the apparent glee and gaiety of childhood. I had now leisure to contemplate the celebrated Commodore Mordaunt, who was scarcely less distinguished among the fashionable circles as the betrothed of Julia Wilmot, than as the glorious conqueror of an enemy's fleet. He was a finely-formed man, with a countenance indicative of the frankness and vivacity of a sailor, but wearing, at the same time, that expression which always characterizes those whose pleasures are merely sensual. I was enough of a physiognomist to believe that there must be a fearful difference in their characters, and I almost shuddered as I contrasted his unattractive countenance with the delicate and intellectual beauty of hers.

After having sung several airs, her hand was claimed for the dance, and she glided through its mazes with the same exquisite grace and dignity that distinguished all her ordinary movements; but I heard her sigh heavily as she swept past me. When the dance was finished, she turned toward the recess: "This is my fairy palace," said she, smiling; then, with the air of one who knew her slightest gesture could win applause, she waved her hand to her followers, and, dropping the silken curtain which was suspended over the entrance, disappeared.

In a few minutes we heard the sound of a harp, and in the most brilliant manner she executed some of Mozart's best music; then, suddenly changing the strain, she commenced a wild and beautiful prelude. At length her voice was again heard, not in the rich and commanding tones which had before burst upon our ears, but low and plaintive, like the mournful music which the summer breeze draws from the Æolian harp, swelling gradually upon the ear with deep and melancholy pathos, until even the gay and thoughtless who stood around, turned aside to conceal their tears. The air was that of a simple French song which I had often heard, but the words were, I presume, her own. They were as follows:

I am not what I have been; pain
Has stolen the roses from my cheek;
And never can I know again
The health their hues were wont to speak.

I am not what I have been; care
Has left its footprints on my brow—
What matters it? bright smiles are there,
To hide the gloom that lies below.

I am not what I have been; time
His work of wasting too has done:
My life is in its earliest prime,
But, ah! my heart's glad youth is gone.

I am not what I have been; fate
On me has laid her heaviest doom;
And now in patience I await
Her last, her kindest gift—a tomb.

Suddenly the song ceased—the listeners eagerly hastened to intreat a repetition of such exquisite melody, but, upon raising the curtain, the recess was found vacant; and, after some foolish jests about her sudden disappearance, they returned to the dance. But far other feelings possessed me. In Switzerland my happiest days too had been past, and the air which I had just heard was associated with some of my sweetest recollections. I entered the recess, and, throwing myself on a couch, was soon wrapt in all the mournful luxury of remembrance, when a sound of suppressed sobs aroused me. It seemed to proceed from behind one of the curtains; I started up, and raising it, discovered a narrow and dimly-lighted passage, at the entrance of which, leaning against the pillar which supported the curtain, stood Julia Wilmot, bathed in tears, and almost convulsed with sobs. To hasten toward her and proffer assistance was my first impulse, but she haughtily turned from me, and commanded me to leave her; then, as if recollecting the singularity of her appearance in such a place, and under such circumstances, she said: "Stranger, you have witnessed what I thought no human eye would ever again behold; you have seen Julia Wilmot weep; but, as you value a woman's peace, I conjure you to forget it, or at least never to reveal it. Go, return to the recess; you will find me in the ball-room, but remember, we are yet strangers." She turned quickly away, and her foot striking a low step which was in the passage, she would have fallen but for my assistance; I conducted her to the extremity of the passage, and we parted.

On returning, my attention was caught by a glittering object upon the floor. I found it to be the small but highly finished miniature of a youth in Swiss costume, and, to my great astonishment, recognized the features of one whom I had known intimately when in Paris. In an instant the truth flashed upon my mind. Long after I had lost sight of him, I learned from a mutual friend some of the particulars of his romantic story, and I was now convinced, that in Julia Wilmot I beheld "la belle Americaine," who had so fatally influenced his fate. Filled with the thought of the almost heart-broken wretchedness which I had seen depicted in her beautiful face, I re-entered the ball-room. I found her in the centre of a laughing group, to whom she was relating some ludicrous anecdote, and I was almost inclined to doubt the evidence of my own senses, when I looked upon the bright and gleeful countenance which she now wore. But by the sudden change in her manner, I thought I could perceive that she had just discovered the loss of the picture; I therefore hastened to procure an introduction to her, and taking the earliest opportunity of presenting it, I observed to her, "Miss Wilmot will need no evidence to convince her that her secret is safe with me, when I tell her that the original of this picture was one whom I was proud to rank among the number of my friends." A deep blush overspread her features; she bent on me a keen and searching look, and was about to reply, when Commodore Mordaunt approached with a summons from her mother, and I saw her no more that evening. But our acquaintance did not terminate here. The mutual knowledge which we possessed of many places and persons on the continent, served to create a more than common intimacy between us; and it was from her own lips that I heard the leading facts of the following story:

During the winter of 18—, Julia Wilmot was the reigning belle of Paris. Possessed of a heart filled with all the pure and glowing enthusiasm of youth, and a character no less distinguished for artlessness than energy, united to surpassing beauty and commanding intellect, she was perhaps one of the most fascinating creatures that had ever appeared in the circles of French society. Her beauty and talents were the theme of every tongue, and women of the highest birth and fashion vied with each other in imitating the dress and manners of "la belle Americaine." The heart of a girl of nineteen is seldom proof against such seductions; and her anxious father eagerly seized the earliest opportunity of withdrawing her from the scene of temptation. He had seen, with a parent's pride, the admiration which his darling excited; but he trembled for its effects upon her ardent and inexperienced mind; and he feared lest the polished and graceful manners which she had acquired among the high-born nobility of France, might be more than counterbalanced by the loss of those simple habits and independent feelings which should ever characterize the daughters of a republic. Early in the spring he took up his abode at Vevey, in Switzerland, with the intention of residing there until the period fixed for his return to his native country. Julia had drank deeply from the intoxicating cup of adulation; she had lost much of the charming simplicity of her character; but her taste was yet unsophisticated, and she gazed with wonder and delight on the sublime scenery by which she was surrounded. Her books, her music, or her pencil, were for some time an unfailling source of amusement; and it was not until after the lapse of several weeks that she began to feel the want of society. That want was soon fully supplied. During her residence in Paris, Henri de Neuville had been one of her most assiduous admirers; and to her great surprise, she discovered that the old nobleman, who was almost their only acquaintance in Vevey, was the near connexion of Henri, and that the youth generally passed the summer months at his chateau. Henri de Neuville was the sole remaining branch of one of the oldest families in France, and the heir to immense wealth; but as it was well known that he had been betrothed from childhood to the daughter of a house equally ancient and opulent with his own, his attentions to the young American had excited no alarm, either in the mind of Mr. Wilmot or of the Duc de —. But the vigilant prudence of age was for once deceived by the levity of youth. Henri had long looked with disgust upon a connexion which he knew his affections could never sanction; and his acquaintance with the beautiful republican served only to strengthen his aversion to his involuntary ties. If he had found the charms of Julia Wilmot almost irresistible when he beheld her amid the gay and giddy circles of fashion, he was still less able to look upon her with indifference when they met in the romantic wilds of Switzerland. He now saw her amid the quiet endearments of domestic life, charming as much by her gentleness and sweetness as she was wont to do by her brilliancy and wit. The tones of her finely modulated voice seemed doubly sweet when his ear only listened to the song; and the changes of her expressive countenance were watched with tenfold interest when he knew that he only could awake them. Perhaps in any situation the continued attentions and devoted attachment of Henri might have created a reciprocal feeling in the heart of Julia; and, secluded as she now was from all other society, it is not surprising that she soon learned to love him with all the ardour of which her enthusiastic nature was capable. Yet their mutual affection was felt and understood, rather than expressed. They blindly yielded themselves up to the dominion of the new and delightful feeling which had taken possession of them, without daring to look into the consequences of their rashness. Thus months passed on, the lovers continued to enjoy their present happiness, regardless of the future, when suddenly Mr. Wilmot was awakened from his unsuspecting security by a letter from the Duc de —, reproaching him in the most violent manner for his presumption in aspiring to a connexion with the most ancient family in France, and accusing him of promoting a clandestine intimacy between Henri and his daughter. The indignant old man hastened to demand an explanation from Henri; but what was his surprise, when he learned that Henri had written to his father, renouncing the intended marriage, which had been so long fixed upon, and intreating the duke's consent to his union with "la belle Americaine." The anger of Mr. Wilmot exceeded all bounds when he first learned the extent of the unlooked-for evil. The sturdy republican would have assisted at his daughter's obsequies almost as willingly as he would have given her hand to one of noble birth—to one who would have considered himself entitled to look with contempt on the humble family of the distinguished American. He was a very proud man, proud of his country, proud of his daughter, proud of the talents which had raised him to eminence; and all the bitterness of his nature was aroused by the unmerited insult offered him by the duke. He forbade his daughter to see Henri, and called down a father's curse upon her head if ever she allowed the dictates of duty to be silenced by the voice of love. To describe the misery of the lovers would be a vain attempt. The pride of Julia had been severely wounded by the duke's insolent letter; and she had given her father a solemn promise, that no power on earth should ever induce her to enter the family of the haughty noble; and in the first moments of mortification she had refused her lover the interview which he solicited. Henri flew to Paris, and implored the compassion of his cruel parent; but the duke was inexorable; he ordered Henri to prepare for his marriage in three days; and to insure his obedience, the enraged father imprudently determined to keep him in close confinement till the evening of his intended nuptials. The spirit of Henri was goaded to desperation by such unmerited harshness and insult. The night previous to that which his father had fixed for his marriage, he found means to escape, and hastened with the speed of lightning to Vevey. Unfortunately the first person whom he encountered on his arrival was Mr. Wilmot; and, maddened as he was by the cruelty of his own father, he could not endure the bitter reproaches which were heaped upon him by the father of Julia. Scarcely conscious of what he did, he struck the old man a blow which felled him to the earth. Had the wealth of worlds been his, he would gladly have given it for the power of annihilating that unguarded moment; but his repentance came too late. The injury which the blow had inflicted upon the person of Mr. Wilmot was very slight; but that which his honour had sustained was almost irreparable. Before he recovered from the swoon which had been occasioned by his fall, Henri had been forced from the spot by his friends; and Mr. Wilmot returned home with a soul burning with shame, and with the desire of revenge. Deeply as Julia loved Henri, she was yet far from being insensible to the gross insult which her father had received; and when, with all the frenzy of desperation, Henri ventured to write to her, his repeated letters were returned unopened; and at length with the bitter words of reproach. Thus passed one long miserable day; but at midnight, when Julia had retired to her chamber, to weep those tears which she dared not shed in the presence of her father, she was alarmed by the opening of the low casement; and in an instant Henri stood before her. His eye glared with the wildness of insanity, the flush of fever was on his cheek, and his lips poured forth the incoherent ravings of madness. Before Julia could summon assistance, he rushed toward her, clasped her wildly to his bosom, and while she was yet struggling in his embrace, put a pistol to his head, and fell lifeless at her feet. The report of the pistol alarmed the family; they hastened to the spot, and found the senseless form of Julia extended upon the mangled remains of her unfortunate lover, and stained with the warm blood which flowed from his fatal wound. Medical assistance was immediately procured. Henri was gone for ever; and the wretched Julia recovered from her deathlike swoon only to become the frantic tenant of a sick chamber for many a weary month. After passing nearly two years in this manner, without one lucid interval, she recovered her reason almost as suddenly as she had been deprived of it; but it was almost impossible to ascertain whether her recollection had also returned. The name of Henri never passed her lips; and when, in compliance with the wishes of her parents, she re-entered the world, no one would have imagined that, beneath her gay smiles and costly attire, was concealed a broken heart. But in acquiring this self-command, she had lost all the simplicity of her character. The dissimulation which was at first necessary, became habitual; and they who sought to discover her real feelings and opinions, were obliged to own themselves completely baffled.

Such was the being who, for several years, shone with unrivalled brilliancy in the fashionable circles of our own country. I am not recounting a mere fiction. Few persons can have mingled in the gayeties of New-York, Boston, and Washington, ten years since, without having frequently met this extraordinary woman. To gratify the ambitious feelings which had taken entire possession of her after the destruction of gentler ones, she became the wife of Commodore Mordaunt. Dazzled by the glory which his courage and skill had acquired, she perceived not the defects of his character until it was too late. Possessed of immense wealth, he lavished it with the greatest profusion upon his lovely wife; but it was only that he might be gratified by the admiration which she excited. It was his chief pleasure to follow her steps at a distance, until the charms of her intellectual conversation, her polished manners, and her exquisite music, had attracted a crowd of respectful admirers, and then to break rudely in with some coarse sea-phrase, or harsh rebuke, or vulgar jest, in order to show his power and authority over the creature who, to all other eyes, was "a bright peculiar star." Such was the martyrdom which she endured for several years, and so perfect was her self-command, so imperturbable her apparent tranquillity, that many doubted whether she was capable of feeling the insults which she constantly received. But Julia had long since ceased to live for herself. To be the idol of fashion was now all her aim, to seem placed upon the summit of worldly felicity was her sole object. Even this consolation was denied. The commodore became at length wearied of one whose tastes were so unlike his own; and his gross infidelities finally produced a separation between them. From his immense wealth he allowed her a small stipend, far from being sufficient to supply those extravagant habits which he had himself created; and while the rude sailor was rioting in riches and luxury, the beautiful, the accomplished Julia Wilmot, the pride of courts, the beloved of nobles, the admired of all beholders, was left to drag on a miserable existence in loneliness, and almost in poverty. DOMESTIC ECONOMY.

THE MANAGEMENT OF CHILDREN.

NUMBER I.

MR. MORRIS—There is no item of domestic economy more important, or less accurately understood, than that which constitutes the subject of this letter; nothing by which the comfort and good government of families are more materially promoted or destroyed, and yet which has occupied, and still engages, less of the attention of all classes of society. I am myself a bachelor somewhat advanced in years, and so firmly wedded to the enjoyment of my state of single blessedness—not to mention the extreme difficulty which would in all human probability attend any effort on my part to become a partaker in the pleasures of matrimony and paternity—that it may be considered next to impossible that I shall ever have an opportunity to put in practice, in my own household, the various precepts which my long experience has suggested, and by the observance of which a better state of things might be brought to exist in the various little kingdoms or republics that constitute this mighty city. In consideration of this likelihood, or rather want of likelihood, and also for that my sense of what is due to my fellow-men, will not permit me to go down into the grave without having done what in me lies to promote the welfare of those among whom I have lived, and to whom I am indebted for the greater portion of the pleasures which have been allotted to me in my pilgrimage, I have determined, ere it be too late, to give to the world the results of my experience and my meditations; and I have selected the Mirror for the vehicle of my lucubrations, because its circulation is very extensive, and its readers include a portion of those to whom my precepts will be most valuable, and by whom they must for the most part be put in practice—I mean the ladies. To them, therefore, this letter and those which will follow it are dedicated; and as my object in writing is to enable them to increase their own and their husbands' domestic happiness, I hope that my instructions will be received with such attention as they may deserve, and attended with success to those who follow them.

In the first place, I wish most strongly to impress upon the minds of my maternal readers one fact of vital importance; and that fact is, that it is never too early to begin instructing children in the duties of obedience and good conduct. Tender-hearted mothers have often said to me, when I have hinted to them the probable expediency of adopting some rule or mode of conduct which the exigency of the moment has suggested, "Oh, Mr. Urban, how can you talk of such a thing; why the poor child is but a baby yet, and how can it understand, poor little darling?" and then a kiss or two, by way of epilogue; and this too, when the very baby of which we were speaking was a full-grown urchin of some eighteen months or two years old, and cunning enough to comprehend almost the very nature and course of our discussion, let alone our actions. But I say that children are never too young to be taught and managed; they have memory, though not strong; and reasoning powers, though faint indeed. If a child is in want of any thing, he cries for and gets it; when the desire of that object is again present to his mind, does he not remember that by crying stoutly he accomplished the acquisition once before, and does he not reason within himself, that the same means will be attended with the same effects? Some writer or other—and I honour him for his penetration—has said that children are shrewd observers; they are, indeed, much more close and accurate observers than parents in general have any thought of. They watch looks, and speculate upon them too. If any body will take the trouble to examine attentively the eyes of a child when it is spoken to, he will find them fixed upon the eyes of the person speaking; not entirely because it is enabled more easily to hear and understand what is spoken, although that reason does undoubtedly operate in part; but also that it may gather from the expression of the speaker's countenance, his true intent and meaning; for children might almost be supposed to be endowed by nature with a large portion of incredulity, which induces them to doubt the information that is conveyed to them by the sense of hearing, unless it be accompanied with an air of visible sincerity. Try the experiment— forbid that fine curly-headed boy of yours to tear the book which you have so sagaciously given him to amuse his leisure hours; he stops and looks up in your face—repeat the order with a smile; and if another dilapidated leaf is not the immediate consequence, I have no knowledge of youthful dispositions, or his is one differing strangely from those of his compeers in general. Now this is easily explainable; the boy reasons—and very reasonably too—that you bestowed that book upon him with the express design that he should make such use of it as should seem good unto him; he had not the remotest conception that the possession of his plaything—of the true nature and value of which he is utterly ignorant of course—was to be attended with any restriction, and therefore he proceeded with all diligence to make that use of it which, upon experiment, he found to be at once the easiest and the most entertaining; and in so doing it never occurred to him, even distantly, that he was not engaged in a very ingenious and laudable undertaking. You may easily imagine, then, what a complete and appalling bouleversement of all his preconceived ideas was involved in your command, and how very difficult it must have been for him to comprehend the fact, that all his plans and conceptions were based upon erroneous principles. He looked at you to see what your face said on the occasion—for as yet his ears are not so implicitly confided in as the eyes, in the conveyance of information; they have not been so long in practice—he sees you smile, and of course his doubts and astonishment are banished. Young as he is, he has a remote idea, although incapable of expressing it, of the art of quizzing, or, in other words, of saying one thing and meaning another. He sees that you were practising this art upon him, and very rationally concludes that his original suppositions were correct, and that the more destruction he makes among the leaves, the better you are pleased.

Having established my first principle, I now proceed to lay down my first and most important maxim; "Never suffer an injunction given to a child to be disobeyed." Nothing tends with more inevitable certainty to induce habits of disobedience in children, than the almost universal remissness of parents in this particular. No matter what the command may be, whether it is important or unimportant; nay, even although, on subsequent reflection, you should be convinced that it was rashly or imprudently given, still let it be enforced. We are all the creatures of habit; but children are particularly so, and in them it is of the utmost importance that the habit of obedience, unhesitating, implicit obedience, should be formed and strengthened. Let me not be misunderstood, however. Do not seek to enforce this obedience by threats or blows, for these are both unnecessary and impolitic. Suppose, for example, that a child is sitting on a chair, and fear that it may fall, or some other equally cogent reason, or perhaps mere whim, may induce you to require him to descend. If he hesitates, if he does not instantly comply, do not slap him or speak harshly to him, as I have seen too many mothers do; but go to him, take him down gently but firmly, and if he is old enough to receive impressions through the medium of speech, observe to him, "My child, I told you to come down, and whatever I tell you to do, you must always do, and that instantly," or some other form of words containing the same meaning, and equally in unison with your action. Say and do thus to him, not passionately, but mildly, yet with firmness, and in such wise that he shall see you are in earnest, and you will have done more to secure his future good conduct, and your own comfort, than you would have accomplished by an hour's scolding, or a cruel flagellation. FASHIONABLE AMUSEMENTS.

THE masquerades have lately formed the principal topic of conversation among all classes. The theatres, Mount Pitt circus, and that of Broadway, have all been laid under contribution to supply us with this new species of entertainment. It is rumoured there is to be one of a splendid description in Trumpery Hall, at the particular request of many who were unable to gain entrance to the others; and I assure the town, that the fashionable people of colour hired a magnificent oyster cellar in the upper part of the city, and that several footmen and head waiters at hotels generously volunteered their services as managers and performers of the leading characters. A miserable-looking little journeyman cobbler, who had stolen his master's old black dress, appeared as Hamlet, which he sustained to the admiration of a strapping Ophelia in a red shawl and turban. They went on pretty well till the bewildered lover told his mistress she was a fishmonger, in which business it seemed the lady did dabble a little. Not liking the allusion, however, she supplied him with so many epithets independent of the text, that the love-sick youth, I verily believed, would have "shuffled off her mortal coil," had not Jeremy Diddler stepped opportunely between them, and frightened away their wrath by begging the loan of ten pence. There was a fat King Richard going about bellowing all through the evening for a horse; and a little Rolla, who, with his own additions and alterations, addressed all hands with "My brave associates; partners of my toil," &c. Count Belino played Fancy's Sketch on a trumpet, and General Washington, Napoleon Bonaparte, Bolivar, and Julius Cæsar, had a game of dominos in one corner, to the wonder and delight of all present. "Ah ha," says Bonaparte, "you General Washington, you put down de six?" "Oh, no; Cæsar put down de six; I play de five." "Oh, Bonaparte," exclaimed Cæsar, "I trouble you for de gin." "Tank you, sir," said the emperor: he was ever a polite man. I cannot conjecture how long the merry crowd might have killed care, and disturbed the quiet night, had not some impertinent watchmen broken in upon them, and lodged Hamlet, Romeo, King Richard, Juliet, and Ophelia, with a host of other worthies, kings, princes, and the like, where they had full leisure to mourn the vicissitudes of fortune.

THE MINSTREL'S LAST SONG.

Since childhood's hour,
Song was the natural language of my heart:
Oh! let me pour forth all its thrilling power
Once more, ere I depart.

To that far land
That gave my spirit birth, it hastens now—
How doth it long its pinions to expand,
And soar to heaven's high brow!

How doth it strive
To burst from all its earthly bonds away,
Unheeding all the fearful pangs that rive
Its tenement of clay!

Alas! alas!
Why comes thy gentle image, my sweet wife,
Staying my spirit in the darksome pass
That lies 'twixt death and life?

Thine accents dear,
Awake too much of earthly tenderness;
Life has too many charms when thou art near,
My lonely heart to bless.

Much hast thou borne
Of sorrow and deep suffering, since thy lot
Was joined with mine; yet meekly hast thou worn
Thy chain, and murmured not.

The smile that shone
On thy sweet lip is faded, and the light
That sparkled in thy star-like eyes is gone—
My love has been thy blight.

I would have poured
My life-blood forth like water, but to gain
One hour of joy for thee, my own adored,
Or spare thy heart one pain.

Yet my hand fixed
Within thy gentle breast grief's venom'd sting,
And for thy lip affliction's chalice mixed,
Drawn from my life's dark spring.

Mine eyes are dim,
The dews of death are chill upon my brow,
The frosts of death are stealing o'er each limb,
And the grave calls me now.

Ay, this is death;
For never yet my heart so faintly stirred,
When on my cheek I felt thy balmy breath,
Or thy sweet accents heard.

When I am laid
Within the earth, to the dark worm a prey,
Let not my image from thy memory fade,
Like April clouds, away.

The strain is done—
My swanlike song is ended—let me dwell
Within thy kindest thoughts, my gentle one—
One kiss—sweet love, farewell.

DESTINY.

"For aught that ever I could read,
"Could ever hear by tale or history;
"The course of true love never did run smooth;
"But either it was different in blood,
"Or else misgraffed in respect of years,
"Or else it stood upon the choice of friends;
"Or if there were a sympathy in choice,
"War, death, or sickness, did lay siege to it,
"Making it momentary as a sound,
"Swift as a shadow, short as any dream;
"So quick bright things come to confusion."

THE splendid apartments of Mr. Bertine were crowded with visitors. They were all light, gayety, and beauty. The rich damask curtains hung in heavy crimson folds around the windows. The shaded lamps shed their softly brilliant rays upon the dazzling throng which decorated one of the most elegant houses in the city. Music breathed to the step of angel forms mingling in the graceful dance, and a spirit of happiness seemed as universally diffused as if the children of our fair mother Eve were yet gliding among the careless bowers of Eden. Of the sweet girls who gave witchery to the swift evening, no one was more fascinating than Marion Bertine. Equally calculated to strike the attention of the amateur of beauty, or to awaken the interest of the admirer, she charmed all who came within her sphere. Her reason with the sophist, and reply to the pedant, were amused with her facility in eliciting equal powers, and the responsive feelings in all her words.

As the object of general admiration, she was, of course, usually blockaded by an army of fashionable heroes, such as ever seek to dwell in the light of fair ladies' eyes; content with a stray glance, or a civil, perhaps an accidental smile. Tall gentlemen laid at her shrine their humble offerings of gallantry and wit; and, set off by all the art of fashion, with large whiskers and elegant attitudes, besieged her wherever she went: and others, of lesser dimensions, rustled, glittered, and rattled in her train, with chains, seals, white gloves, and glasses, who could dance, sing, and bow, lead a lady to her piano with studied grace, whispering and smiling at the height of their glory. It was not easy to gather from the young lady's deportment that she was dissatisfied with her subjects, for her face bespoke a mind at ease, and a heart free from the touch of deep feeling; but women are well versed in the art of hiding their thoughts, and, like some painted cloud that conceals beneath its surface the elements of tempest, many a serene countenance is lighted with smiles, while the bosom cherishes anxiety or anguish. A close observer might have detected, in the countenance of Marion, an occasional restlessness, not that of joy, and traced her glances, stolen at long intervals, when most unnoticed, to the figure of one who apparently participated but slightly in the surrounding animation. His seriousness was not without comment. One condemned it as affectation; another ridiculed it as folly. One of his friends, with a view to rally him into better spirits, addressed him laughingly,

"Why, what the deuce is the matter with you, Wilson? Are you sick, or married, that you stalk about as stately as Childre Harold?"

"I am neither sick nor married, Harry, but enjoy myself uncommonly well."

"Then let me introduce you to some Hebe here, whose smiles shall call out your sense, if sense you have. Yonder is one—that tall, beautiful, blue-eyed girl. See how she casts about her those radiant eyes. There is death in every beam. She is merry, too, as a bird. Can you behold all those sweet thoughts of hers escaping so profusely, without a wish to catch some? Come, let me introduce you."

"I thank you, Hal," said his serious companion; "I am not in the mood. I should rather be a looker on."

"But," rejoined he, "direct your eyes to yon other nymph. By all the graces, she is beautiful! Care never came to that brow, nor tears to those eyes, unless pity sometimes moistened them from the fountain of a heart pure as the element of heaven."

"Go, rattle your nonsense into other ears, eloquent Hal," said Wilson, turning away from the unconscious belle, "and leave me the selection of my own divinities."

"Well, one more, Charles. There is Miss Bertine herself. If you scowl on her as you do on my other adorables, you may buy yourself a tub and set up for Diogenes at once. Look at her, Charles. Did you ever see such a smile, and wasted too, by all that's lovely, upon a common fop? There are lips I never looked upon without dreaming of kisses, and a voice, listen, and let its warm tones melt your frozen philosophy into love. She is beautiful as a dream."

"Beautiful, indeed," murmured Charles; but in a tone so low and tremulous, so different from the careless voice with which fashionable young men laud the features of a passing belle, that his companion, surprised, looked up into his face. "I beg your pardon," stammered Charles; "but—"

"Why," interrupted the other, laughing, "there is no occasion to beg my pardon for calling Miss Bertine beautiful."

"I meant—"

"Oh, no matter what you meant. Nature never made a more lovely being, and if, as by your look I surmise, you have thought of her before, walk up to her; she's the very thing for you—rich, handsome, well-educated, amiable: she'll make your fortune, my boy—that is, if you can get her."

"I assure you, sir," said Charles, with even a slight curl of scorn upon his lip, "I have not the least intention or wish that way."

"Glad of it, my friend; for, between you and me, her father is as proud as Lucifer, and just as ambitious. Nothing will suit him less than a hundred thousand, with an ambassador, judge, or colonel; but never mind, there are plenty more as good as she. Yonder's my Charlotte—I would not give her for a hundred Miss Bertines: she sees me—she beckons. You see what an irresistible attraction she has in her smile. Ah, the little jade! Good by, good by,"

and off he dashed after his Charlotte, leaving Charles in a humour of no very agreeable nature.

Wilson was poor and proud. Struggling with the difficulties which ever oppress such a character, had not yet time, he saw himself surrounded by apparently insurmountable obstacles, with a disappointment which shaded all his thoughts. The conflicting emotions of his mind were gradually undermining his constitution, and he abandoned himself to a kind of despondency, which caused him to sicken at hope, as productive of only despair. It was not his fear either to live or die. But this vacillation between life and death, this soft hour of pleasure, succeeded by long ones of misgiving and anguish, poisoned all his comfort, and gave him a tinge of misanthropy totally foreign to his nature. It was under the influence of such impressions that he had met and loved Marion Bertine; loved her against his own wish and resolution; loved her in spite of all his endeavours to the contrary, and with shame at his weakness in yielding pride to passion. His character was one of impulse rather than of reason; and although he had determined to avoid all intercourse with one whom fortune had made so much his superior in wealth, and consequently in the rank of fashion, yet accident, as if some mischievous spirit delighted to frustrate his plans, would constantly fling them into each other's society, and surprise them in delightful but dangerous situations. No communication had passed between them but those nameless and irresistible passages in their familiarity with each other, which are felt like instinct infused into the heart by nature. A mere consciousness—a dream—a doubt, rather than any thing to be recalled and admitted into calculation, was all the evidence either had detected of a mutual attachment. On this evening Charles had observed her closely as circumstances would permit; and as a dark conviction that he was surrounded by men wealthier and happier than himself, induced him to stand aloof from their idle mirth, his pride and impetuous disposition urged him into a conclusion that he held no place in her affection. It caused in his manner towards her an indifference, perhaps a rudeness, which the lady felt and retaliated by a display of spirits more than usually exuberant. He called up all his energy, and with a cheerfulness altogether artificial, paid his attentions to a charming girl, who received them with complacency; and thus the evening passed away in mutual error.

Marion returned to her pillow with a sad conviction that Wilson had never thought of her as a wife, and a consequent resolution to banish him from her mind at every sacrifice; and Charles reconciled, or deemed that he reconciled himself to fate, in yielding his sweet false dream of one whose affections seemed divided among a multiplicity of admirers, and who would look down, nay, who had looked down upon him with contempt.

"Yes," said he, as he strided on, in the darkness of midnight, to his home. "yes, I caught her eyes, and they flashed upon me with scorn, while her smiles were lavished upon the butterflies around her, as if each were destined to be her husband. Wherefore have I fallen into this disgraceful weakness? What am I, that I should intrude my poverty upon her brilliant sphere? If she were poor and wretched, if she needed one to live in obscurity, or die in anguish for her, then should she behold me at her feet; but now, in possession of all that ornaments and sweetens life, with those at her bidding who will lead her the round of fashion and pleasure, why should I disturb her peace, or shape her destiny along a darker or an humbler path? No, sweet girl! be still above me. I will think of you—love you, as I hope you will be loved by others; but see you again—never."

Two or three years made Marion a wife and a mother. As Charles had predicted, a gentleman of immense wealth succeeded, with the aid of her father, in obtaining her hand. It was said she lived contentedly, and found, in the affection of her boy, a joy almost enough to compensate her for all worldly disappointments. Charles, too, in the interests of his business, ceased to experience the anguish which he had once felt, and his passion for the remembered object now lost to his hope, slept quietly in his bosom, except when awakened by some of those accidental associations which link us so mysteriously with the dim world of past scenes and feelings.

While his own character thus went on with little change, his business prospered. He grew more useful to the firm in which he had commenced his commercial labours, and was at length appointed to sail as supercargo to the East Indies, with a probability of remaining there in a lucrative situation several years.

A few days before his departure, his attention was arrested by the distress of a lost child, whose extreme beauty excited much notice. To an inquiry as to his name, the child gave that of the husband of Marion. Charles took the hand of the little wanderer, who looked up to him confidently, and revealed the same features which for years had floated in his imagination, the same speaking forehead and transparent complexion, the same blue eyes through which streamed the light of feeling, and the rosy mouth of nameless sweetness. With a sudden resolution to see once more the mother of this fair boy, he offered to conduct him home, and, in a few moments, he found himself in the parlour of her mansion, and in the presence of the being who, of all others on earth, was dearest to his heart. She recognised him instantly, and whether from the joy of recovering her child, whose absence had occasioned her much alarm, or whether from surprise, or any other feeling, at beholding one who had so long been a stranger to her sight, her face was suddenly suffused with a crimson, which passed as rapidly away, and left her pale as a marble statue.

"I have brought home your boy, madam," said Charles in a low tone, for his eyes were moist, and his voice faltered.

"I am very happy, in this opportunity to meet you once more, Mrs. Sterling."

"You are welcome, Mr. Wilson," said Marion, while her boy climbed into her lap, and hid his face in her bosom. "I have been much frightened—I have not yet recovered from my alarm; but you will excuse my embarrassment, for—" she stopped—cast down her eyes—raised them again filled with tears, and folded the boy in her arms with a feeling for which she found no utterance.

There was something in this silence more expressive than words. The idea that he had been loved flashed upon him with singular force, and called up all the tumultuous crowd of sensations which he had long since deemed overcome. She recovered herself immediately, and spoke in her natural manner.

"You have been quite a stranger, sir. I did not anticipate the pleasure of ever seeing you again."

"It was only accident," replied Charles, "which brought me to your presence; but if an unwelcome guest, I have committed a fault which I cannot repeat, as I leave this country in a few days—perhaps for ever."

He gazed steadily at her as he spoke. The tears again arose into her eyes, and her cheek grew pale again. An irresistible impulse, strengthened with rapture and melancholy at the conviction that he had been mistaken in his previous opinion of her, urged him to take her hand. He pressed it unresisting to his lips, and, thrown off his guard, his agitated feelings found their way in words, from a heart in which, for the moment, the rising tide of passion was swollen to overflow.

"I have loved you, Marion, but we part for ever."

The hand linked in his half confirmed its pressure. It revealed to him the history of her life. She attempted to rise, but he interrupted her.

"One moment more—one moment more. I ask but one single look, to bear with me in my recollection over the loneliness of distant places, and through the gloom of future years. Fate has decreed I shall never see you on earth again; but if, in the revolution of time, you should want a friend, remember me."

Once more he pressed to his lips her passive hand—once more gazed on her—now dearer than she had ever been before—then, starting at the situation into which this singular occurrence had betrayed him, he caught one glance from her thrillingly beautiful eyes, and was the next moment wandering he scarcely knew whither, among the careless and busy multitude that thronged the streets. It all seemed to him like a dream.

It was fifteen years after this incident, that a stately vessel, with her snowy sails spread out like wings, was borne by a fresh breeze into the harbour of New-York. A steamboat was in readiness to convey the passengers on shore, and, as they landed at Whitehall, and rattled away in their respective carriages to the hotels or other places where they intended to reside, a single individual, having consigned his baggage to the care of a porter, walked with a steady pace up Broadway.

It was a fine evening in summer. All the beauty of the city seemed gliding to and fro along the splendid promenade. Carriages and horses dashed by. The boys were playing along the streets, and many sweet faces passed him, all lighted up with health and pleasure, careless of the future, and unconscious of the past. As Charles gazed at, and admired this new generation that had sprung up around him as if by magic, he could not but recall the days long gone by. He still remembered when Miss Bertine, radiant with charms and mirth, moved over these very pavements, the delight of every eye, and the idol of his heart. Strange emotions filled his breast as he approached her dwelling. It looked the same as when he used to walk by it and bless it in his rambles, when the moon was shining, and the large stars twinkling in the shadowy vault of heaven. The same moon was there, and the stars were yet as brilliant, for nature never grows old. Every thing wore the aspect of other years, as if it were but yesterday that he had parted from her, and he were now hastening again, his heart quick beating with hope and joy, to revel in the luxury of being with her. There was a large tree before the door. He remembered the night, just such a cloudless and happy time as the present, when he had leaned against that very tree, and listened to the melting tones of one whose music thrilled through him like a voice from heaven.

"And now," thought he, "years and years have fled; and thousands, once moving in joy and pride through these streets, are gone. I myself am a stranger—unknown—unloved. What may be her fate? Perchance she too has passed away! or, if she remain, it will be to behold me in possession of wealth, alas, how valueless, when not shared with her! How wayward is destiny! My heart prompted me ever, and yet whispers, that with her, any humble cottage would have been a paradise; yet I have wasted my precious life in gloomy solitude, to acquire the heartless petty distinction which wealth confers, and which is the cause of all my disappointment."

He reached the door, and was surprised to find the mansion had been converted into a hotel. How singularly independent of reason are those we call the fine feelings! He owned a pang at the sight of strangers moving carelessly through the rooms where he had long ago enjoyed so many hours of happiness, and there was a sternness in his manner of addressing an old man who seemed to be at home in the transaction of domestic duties.

"Who keeps this hotel, sir?"

"Mr. D—," was the answer.

"How long is it since the building was inhabited by Mr. Bertine?"

"Ten or twelve years, sir. Old Bertine failed, and died long ago. I believe the whole family are dead, or gone off to some distant country. We know nothing of them here."

"He left a daughter, who married a Mr. Sterling. Can you afford me any information of that gentleman?"

"Why, yes," said the man; "there's no harm in speaking, now the poor fellow's dead. He was a hard chap, that Sterling—and unless he was some particular friend of yours, sir, I should call him a great villain."

"Villain, sir! how?—in what way?"

"Why, in the first place, he came here and made a fine show; every body thought him worth a hundred thousand dollars at least. He married old Bertine's daughter, Sarah, or Julia, or Marion—yes, Marion Bertine, as fine a girl as ever trod shoe leather."

"Well, well, sir, the event, quick!"

"Well. He spent her fortune—failed—almost killed his wife with unkindness, and died himself a poor miserable drunkard. His broken-hearted widow lingered a little—but what's the matter, sir? you are sick. Let me give you some wine—help yourself, sir—it's as good old port as you ever drank—fill your glass."

"No—no—no wine," said Charles, in a voice choked with emotion. "Go on—it is nothing."

"Why, that's all, sir."

"But there was a boy?"

"So there was. I had forgotten. Yes, there was a boy—Charles I think they called him."

"Was—was his name Charles? Are you sure that was his name?"

"Why, yes. I am sure it was. He's somewhere about the city now, I guess. I can't tell you where. Pray, sir, help yourself to some wine. I hope I have not—perhaps you are a relation? I am sorry I have spoken so freely."

Wilson rushed from the house. We shall not attempt to define his feelings.

A few days after the preceding conversation, Wilson rose early and wandered forth alone. There are some men who, in the traffic of business, become hardened against the influence of their earlier feelings. Time and circumstances remould their characters, and wear away from their minds the impressions of inexperience and youth. They attach importance to objects only as they relate to their present or future interests, and find nothing of the past to cherish or regret. Others, on the contrary, look back upon the distant scenes of their boyhood, with sensations which become richer and more delightful as they advance in age. The occurrences around them are devoid of every value, when compared with those which have fled away for ever, and they treasure up undisturbed in the depths of their hearts, tastes for pleasures they can no longer enjoy, and affections for objects who have passed irrevocably away. Wilson was of the latter class. Although he had been absent for years, and mingled in remote society, and engaged in adventures which had nothing in them to keep alive his associations, yet, as he went forth on this lovely morning, perhaps his sensations were as lively while dwelling on the incidents of long vanished time, as if he had but recently heard the well-remembered voice he best loved, and felt the gentle pressure of the hand whose touch thrilled through him with a strange rapture which had never been repeated or forgotten. A short walk brought him to a rich grassy meadow, overshadowed by many large trees in full foliage, and used as a place of sepulture. It was yet early, and the silence of the dead was unbroken but by the sound of his own step, and the warblings of a bright bird, that, careless of human wo, sat pluming its golden feathers upon a sunny branch, and filled the air with ever varying and delicious music.

As he walked among the graves of the unknown, and perchance long forgotten beings around, and read inscriptions of names first noticed above their mouldering remains, the fleetness and vanity of life chilled his heart, and pity for the crowd who slumbered beneath his feet, once radiant with hope and health, and, perhaps, beautiful as she over whose tomb he came now to mourn. The direction which he had received soon guided him to the wished for spot. It was in an obscure corner of the meadow, upon a green hill that sloped gently to the morning sun. Long grass, bent down with heavy dew drops, grew upon the turf, beneath which rested one, without whom the clear light, and the fragrant air, and all the charms of life, were to him scarcely preferable to the shadows that hid her own once lovely and beloved image. A plain slab of white marble met his eyes. It bore simply the name of Marion Sterling. As he stopped by the mound which weighed upon the bosom once so fraught with pure and happy affections, his grief mastered the manliness of age and experience, and tears dropped down upon the unconscious grass, unheeded by her for whom they fell. "Dear, dear Marion," broke from his lips.

It was all that found utterance. The rest of his heavy feelings sunk down into the recesses of his heart, buried in silence and too deep for language. A slight noise arrested his attention. He lifted up his eyes towards a youth whose features bore so striking a resemblance to her who then filled his thoughts, that, in the excited state of his imagination, he started with a doubt of their reality. He was, however, recalled to his reason by the voice in which the stranger addressed him.

"You knew my mother, sir?"

"Your mother! Was Mrs. Sterling your mother? Then I speak to Charles Sterling," and he seized his hand and pressed it to his lips.

"That is indeed my name," replied the youth, with some surprise. "May I inquire who it is who seems so much interested in our unfortunate family, and so well acquainted with one whom certainly he never could have seen before?"

"First tell me," asked Wilson, whom this singular coincidence had, in some measure, diverted from his melancholy train of meditations, "do you apply the term unfortunate to your present situation or your past history?"

"To both," said the youth. "My mother's fate seemed equalled in misery only by mine. She died of a broken heart, and I see little more remaining for me. My friends, out of the wreck of our family fortunes, saved only sufficient to complete my education. I have endeavoured in vain to procure occupation here, and shall embark in a week for a distant clime, perhaps never to return. The station to which I am ordered is sickly, and I have a presentiment that I am bidding my native country farewell for ever. It was with these forebodings that I came to visit my mother's grave. Thank heaven, she rests in peace, ignorant of the anguish that agitates my bosom."

"But why so much anguish," inquired Wilson, "in going abroad to seek your fortune in the great world? Thousands have done so, and returned with wealth and honour; but, perhaps you have relations?"

"No, sir; none for whom I have any affection."

"Friends, perhaps?"

"I have a friend—"

He stopped. A slight glow came over his face. It passed away, and left his features pale and firm. Wilson thought he looked strangely like his mother.

"It is foolish to speak of it," he continued; "but I have nothing to conceal. I love, no matter how deeply, one who is rich and above me. It were vain and cruel to make her share my poverty. I shall see her once again, for the last time. But may I know why you interest yourself thus in my behalf?"

"You shall know, indeed. I am under heavy obligations to your mother. My name is Wilson. You may have heard her speak of me—"

"Wilson?" interrupted Sterling, "Charles Wilson? from the East Indies?"

"The same."

"My dear sir," exclaimed Sterling, all his features lighted up with surprise and joy; "indeed I have heard of you. My mother gave me a letter upon her death-bed, charging me, if ever I should meet you, to give it into your own hands. I have this morning accidentally taken it from my drawer, as I was arranging my things for sea. It is here."

Wilson seized it with a reeling brain. It was faintly and tremblingly traced; and contained a small curl of hair, with these words:

"You bade me, when last we parted, if ever I wished a friend, to remember you. The world is changed much since that night when I wounded your feelings at my father's house, by a feigned indifference. It avails little now that I am willing to confess it. My husband is dead—my fortune spent; when you read this, I myself shall be in my grave; there remains, therefore, no reason for me to deny, that from the moment I saw, I loved you. Forgive me—be a friend to my boy—heaven bless you!"

MARION.

It would be superfluous to continue the narrative. Sterling was Wilson's heir.

THE ISLAND OF THE SEAS.

How lonely, beautifully lies,
Amid the waves, that isle of bowers,
O'er which the fearless sea-bird flies,
And eve now opes her starry eyes,
And zephyrs come, with balmy sighs,
To kiss the moonlight-loving flowers!

Behold that oak-tree pillared hill,
Religion's pure cathedral pile;
And hearken how the minstrel rill,
And note of song-bird's tribute bill,
Mingling their mellow music, fill
Its green and solitary aisle!

Oh check the ship's impetuous way,
And steer for yonder leafy isle,
Where, on some hope-redeeming day,
My dark and wintry spirit may,
Like blossoms on th' unblasted spray,
With heaven's own sacred fruitage smile.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

PARK THEATRE.

ALTHOUGH the fine old tragedies and comedies are found too solid and substantial fare for the light and fluttering intellects of the worthy denizens of New-York, yet opera, with its airy and graceful attractions, has found favour in their eyes, and they have flocked in considerable quantities—as times go—to listen to the stream of song that has been nightly poured forth at the Park theatre for this week past. That house, indeed, has been converted into quite an aviary, and an incessant warbling kept up by the pretty singing-birds therein, much to the gratification of the ears, and detriment of the pockets of the lovers of sweet sounds. A greater or more effective union of talent in this department has rarely been witnessed.

Madame Feron possesses nearly all the qualities requisite for a finished singer. Nature has done much for her, and art still more. Her voice, which is of great sweetness and uncommon power, has been brought into a state of perfect discipline; so that, in the endless variety of ornament in which she is apt to indulge, she never disappoints or fails—the means are always adequate to the end, and the most rapid transitions are executed with an ease and facility that are equally surprising and delightful; one is at a loss which to admire most—the surprising power or the delightful skill. She is also one of that rarest of all things, a sensible singer; she generally lays the emphasis on the right word, and never breaks out in any astounding and improper flourishes on an "and," a "the," a "that," or any other insignificant but indispensable monosyllable. Her embellishments are introduced in such a spirit of grace and good taste, and executed with such a becoming regard to the uses of accent and inflexion, as evidently show she regards sense as well as sound to be a component part of good singing. We must not forget to mention another rare virtue of which she is possessed, and that is a distinct articulation. You can generally catch nine-tenths of the words of every song—a piece of information which those who are in the habit of hearing singing will scarcely credit.

Mrs. Austin is a favourite, and deservedly so, with the public. Her voice is of as fine a texture, as sweet, and as flexible as that of Madame F.; but inferior to it in power and compass. She also wants the boldness and originality which distinguish the former lady. Whatever she undertakes, she executes with neatness and precision; but her ornaments are more mechanical, and after hearing her in half-a-dozen songs, we know exactly what she will do, by what she has already done. Madame F. is possessed of such infinite variety, that no conception can be formed of the future by the past.

Miss George has little in common with either of the preceding ladies. Indeed, her style is essentially different, and necessarily so, for her voice is altogether deficient in the power requisite for the execution of complicated and difficult bravuras; nor will it bear the accompaniments of the orchestra, unless sparingly and cautiously managed; they drown it; and it is a voice so charmingly sweet, that it is a pity to lose a note. Like Cordelia's, it is "soft and low," and there is a mellow richness in some of its tones which falls upon the ear like dew upon the flower. Now, in the name of taste, what has Miss G., with such a voice, to do with such songs as the "Dashing white sergeant?" She might, with as much propriety, sing the "Bay of Biscay." And let her not be persuaded to persevere in such songs by the applause and encores of a class of people who go to operas from some undefinable cause, and with whom the loudest noise is ever most agreeable. Even "Bid me discourse," although she executes it very prettily, is not the kind of thing she ought to sing. There is too much music in it, if we may so express ourselves; Miss G.'s voice is music of itself, and it is in airs where the audience can catch its "dying fall," such as "Farewell to my harp," "Had I a heart," "Oh no, we never mention him," or the more lively one of "My bonny lad, I love thee well," that she must eventually rest her claims for excellence.

Mr. Horn is a gentleman with many faults, and many real claims to admiration. His voice is very fine in some of its tones, but not equally good in the upper notes. In such pieces as the "Rose and the lily" he is unrivalled; but in others of a simpler cast we cannot help feeling that he has more science than taste. His acting is unique and original, and it will, we trust, long continue unimitated. In short, he is the worst singing actor we have ever seen, which is saying a bold word. By what unimaginable process he has been drilled into Caspar and Artabanus, we cannot conceive. In every thing else he is indescribable. He is not only like a machine, but like a machine with the springs out of order; he goes with a jerk and a step, and the words come straggling out of his mouth, "here one and there one," without the least reference to the order in which the author has placed them! Some of the love scenes in which he and Mrs. Austin figure, it may safely be said, have never been equalled on any stage. As a composer, Mr. Horn is justly and deservedly celebrated.

C.

* Our correspondent does not seem to be cognizant of the fact, that "Caspar" is a character of Mr. Horn's own conception, and that although written by another expressly for him, it was founded upon his own suggestions; a fact that proves him to possess some small share of dramatic talent at least.—*Ed. THE REVIEW.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE CASTILIAN.

ANOTHER novel!—but we have already lifted up our voice against the multitude of these fictitious productions, with which it is our misfortune, in company with our editorial brethren, to be overwhelmed; it only remains, therefore, for us to fulfil the duty which we owe our readers, by presenting to them the honest result of our reading labours. This novel professes to be the production of a Spaniard, with no less a name than "Don Telesforo de Trueba y Cosio," author of "Gomez Arias," and is extended through four hundred and seventy mortal pages of closely printed duodecimo. Of Don Telesforo de Trueba we know nothing; nor have we, as yet, the honour of any acquaintance with "Gomez Arias," the avant-courier to the Castilian; but, to speak our opinion freely, we are hugely given to suspect, that as to the first, the name is but a nom-de-guerre, and that the worthy Spaniard, if compelled to appear in his own habiliments and character, would be found a genuine son of John Bull, and a legitimate denizen of Grub-street. The book upon which, "with sad civility," we have bestowed six hours of painful labour, bears within itself no evidence of foreign origin; the sentiments and spirit of the thing are exactly similar to those of nineteenth-century of the modern English novels; the language is essentially Anglican; and even the anxiety with which the author has lugged in at every possible opportunity his scraps of Spanish, is to us evidence that his knowledge of the language is superficial, and acquired by study, not by inheritance. The time of the story is the fourteenth century; and the incidents are mostly historical, commencing with the rebellion of Don Henry de Trastamara against his brother Don Pedro, surnamed the Cruel, and terminating with the death of the latter, and the consequent establishment of his illegitimate brother upon the throne. Connected with this leading current of events, is an underplot of the loves and sorrows of the most brave and loyal adherent of Don Pedro and a fair lady, the daughter of a political time-server, by whom their affection is alternately encouraged and opposed, according to the alternate successes of the rival brothers. The subject is admirable, and in the hands of an able writer, would furnish materials for an interesting and valuable romance. The splendid character of the famed Black Prince of England, is not unworthy of Sir Walter Scott's attention; and the exploits of that host of renowned warriors who took part in the civil war between Don Henry and the king, among whom were Duguesclin, Lancaster, Villaines, Chandos, and a host of French and English chivalry, might be wrought up into a novel not inferior even to Ivanhoe.

We are sorry to be compelled to pronounce the work before us a failure. With his materials, the author might have done wonders; but he has done nothing; for whatever interest his book possesses, it is indebted entirely to his subject, and not to him. The historical characters are, indeed, correctly drawn, but that is not his merit; and those which are entirely fictitious, with one or two exceptions—such, for example, as the Zapatero—are tame, and exceedingly common-place. The heroine, in particular, is a marvellously uninteresting animal, besides being but a fac-simile of every Julia, Celestina, Adelitha, and other heroine of romance of the last century. In short, we are rather at a loss to divine what are the merits of "The Castilian;" there is no vivid description either of character or scenery, or of events, unless indeed we should be tempted to except the account of the death of the Zapatero—for the idea of which the author has been indebted to one far more powerful and appalling in the Wanderer of Maturin—and that of the final and fatal contest of the royal brothers, which is probably historical. True, the morality of the tale is unimpeachable; and to very idle readers, it may serve to convey a knowledge of certain portions of this world's history, which they might not choose to take a little trouble to acquire in any other way; but unless to such as these, or to persons particularly in want of better occupation, we cannot honestly recommend this second bantling of the pseudo "Don Telesforo de Trueba y Cosio."

SONNET.

The Wintry Wind is rushing through the trees,
 And tearing, one by one, their leaves away;
 While piteously, unto the heartless breeze,
 They stretch their naked limbs, as they would pray
 That he would spare some old and faithful leaf,
 A sad memorial of the spring-time brief;
 But no—he sweepeth wildly on his path,
 Nor heedeth aught the trees' low-spoken prayer,
 And tyrant-like, in madness and in wrath,
 Scattereth their withered foliage to the air.
 That Wintry Wind—how like it is to death!
 And we—how like the leaves by tempests strown!
 And they, who saddening mourn our spirits flown,
 Sigh like the trees denuded by its breath.

SKETCH OF CHARACTER.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GAUSS.

THIS celebrated German mathematician was born in Brunswick. His father was a poor butcher, and he himself grew up, to all appearance, a mere vagabond, with ragged clothes and a great shock head of hair, until the age of sixteen; when, to the no small amusement of his schoolmaster, as well as his fellow-pupils, he produced a manuscript which he had entitled "An Inquiry into the Nature of Numbers." The treatise was honoured with a cursory review, and being so different from the generally received essays, so entirely original in its manner of treating the subject, and so completely without the sphere of the learned professor's mind; that it was returned with a smiling suggestion, "that he had better study considerably more, and wait a number of years before he offered any of his productions to the public." Gauss, greatly disappointed and irritated, immediately transmitted it to Kastner, then at Gottingen, one of the most eminent mathematicians. He never having before heard the name of Gauss among the literati of the age, in his answer expressed much surprise that he had not been sooner acquainted with so able a writer, and lavished upon the treatise praise so warm and respectful, that the whole country rung with the young tyro's fame. His subsequent rise was rapid. Augustus Ferdinand, Duke of Brunswick, afterwards shot through the eyes at the battle of Jena, took him immediately under his protection, and La Place, in quoting his work, calls him "the divine Gauss." His love of mathematics absorbs almost all his other passions. Long habits of investigation have rendered its abstruse truths, invisible to superior capacities, so familiar to him, that it is said he scarcely respects the acquirements or tolerates the society of those uninitiated into the secrets of his favourite science. A good-natured theologian once asked him, "Pray, sir, do you really believe the moon to be inhabited?" "Certainly, sir," answered Gauss. "Although we can only reason analogically upon the subject, yet I am led confidently to the conclusion that it contains a race of beings, probably intelligent like ourselves." "I wonder," inquired the other, "if it is impossible to have any conversation with them, by which the fact could be established?" "I do not," said Gauss, "conceive it to be impossible, by any means. If we were to sow a large extent of country with plants, which in their growth would produce a triangle, or any other regular figure, of such colours as to reflect the light most powerfully, the inhabitants of the moon would perceive that we were intelligent beings, from the fact that we had drawn a mathematical figure." "Well, but suppose," added the theologian, "they don't understand mathematics." "Why then," said Gauss, slapping his hand angrily upon the table, "why then, let them go to the devil!"

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

American Quarterly Review for March.—This number contains articles of various and interesting import, as a brief enumeration of the subjects will sufficiently testify. Egyptian architecture is the first, and although too erudite in appearance to the general reader, will abundantly reward his curiosity and gratify his taste. The second article is on a political subject of great moment, which occupied the profound and lofty mind of Burke, and is still the fruitful source of discussion—instruction to representatives. Restrepo's history of Colombia furnishes the third article, which will repay perusal. Fourth in order is the law of libel. Fifthly comes history, a rich and beautiful theme—inexhaustible and untiring, and withal very fairly dealt with. The Greek revolution is next—and to it all will refer with pleasure, who are admirers of the land of ancient song and glory, and advocates of its restoration to its ancient splendour and freedom. A medical subject invites us now—treated, however, in a general and rather declamatory style—temperaments. Darby's view of the United States is the eighth article, and presents us with an instructive view of the resources of our country, especially the great west. The ninth is a review of Irving's Conquest of Grenada, on which high praise, not unqualified by impartial strictures, is bestowed. Last is an extended notice of the Memoirs of Dr. Parr—that giant in classical learning, in theology, in political and general knowledge. From this article, which is evidently written by the powerful hand of Mr. Walsh himself, we make the following extract, illustrative of the style, and containing sound and catholic doctrine:

"Convivial meeting is, in fact, the best remedy for those mistakes and asperities into which men are apt to fall, with regard to each other, before mutual knowledge, when they happen to be in opposite or different sects, whether religious, political, scientific, professional, or social. Prejudices and animosities are often carried to the grave, to the vexation of those who cherish them, and the injury of their objects, which the converse of a festive hour would have radically cured, or greatly mitigated. It is a deep error to attach all or chief importance to speculative opinions, or things adscititious, and exterior to the essential mind and being. Pure morals, warm hearts, good tempers, fond or generous sympathies, rich understandings, practical virtue, salutary action, are the real treasures and delights of this world. A cultivated man lives with gratification and dies with solace, in proportion to the liberal affections which he has possessed, the solid good which he has achieved or endeavoured to accomplish, the sound knowledge and sentiment which he has communicated, the beauties of the pages which he has read, the excellencies of nature and art which he has contemplated. As the mind expands or contracts, sinks or rises, according to intellectual intercourse, so does the spirit, according to the natures with which it communes. Live with people who have but few ideas and frivolous habits, and some assimilation is inevitable; associate only with your own fraternity, and bigotry of one kind or other will be the consequence. Opulent and nervous intellect replenishes and invigorates the head, as strong and generous sentiment vivifies and improves the heart, in its external operation. There is a mental and a moral atmosphere to be carefully sought or avoided."

Masquerades.—In our last number we touched, in a light and somewhat indulgent strain, upon this attractive, but, as we thought, dangerous amusement; and we expressed the hope that now, when curiosity had been gratified, and the novelty had ceased its charm, that all good citizens would concur with us in the propriety of putting a stop to it altogether. In this hope we have not been disappointed. A vast majority of those who are lovers of peace, decorum, and public virtue, and whom either passion or interest has not blinded to the truth, unite in condemning the continuance of this exhibition. Not to speak of the extraordinary, wasteful, and, too frequently, improvident expenditure of money, the diversion of the mind from more rational and useful pursuits, the licentious privileges assumed by many under the protection of a fictitious semblance, the offences frequently offered to female modesty, and the intrusion—which, guarded against with whatever care, is still unavoidable—of the most improper companies, are all circumstances attending masquerades, which must obtrude themselves upon the most careless notice. So glaring has been the improprieties observed in more instances than one, that many persons, who were, at first, generous and warm advocates and promoters even of these parties, have, upon mature reflection and enlarged observation, become their decided opponents. Nor are the individuals to whom we now allude mere canters, or over-pious decriers of whatever tends to amuse and enliven the hours of recreation and leisure. They are men of business and of the world, who have the peace and happiness of their families most tenderly at heart; who would preserve the modesty and native innocence of their daughters unsullied by contamination with a motley and lawless herd; and who, moreover, consider the public welfare dependent upon, and identified with, public morals. These cannot be preserved where such unbounded license is allowed to the gayety and frivolity of youth, and to the more designing, and, therefore, fatal depravity of hardened and skilled experience. The temptation to deceive in the one case, and the danger of passive submission in the other, are too great to be overlooked by any parent anxious for his own honour and the purity of those who are to him dearer than life. What language, too, must not occasionally startle the ear and speed a blush to the burning cheek of maiden simplicity! Well then is it for her if her ignorance and sensibility be not duped—well, if she return from the unhallowed scene as spotless in thought and imagination as she went—well for her, if her susceptible heart, unused to the splendour of the romantic and fanciful enchantment, has not been made captive by seductive blandishments, aided by the insinuating graces of manner, the impressive eloquence of passion, and the charms of person artfully enveloped in classic or poetic drapery! Look to it, ye parents, who have not yet weighed this matter deeply; look to it, ye fair, who are induced, by innocent curiosity and rage for pleasure, to enter upon treacherous ground.

It is time that the arm of the law be interposed, lest the infection, flying to the lower orders, as it is already feared it has, develop evils of a magnitude, at the bare conception of which the imagination shudders.

Foreign Republications.—While we bear willing testimony to the unwearied enterprise of the booksellers in this country, in presenting to the American public whatever is most worthy of publication from abroad, and from England more especially, we must, in the spirit of impartiality, find occasional fault with the want of due discrimination in particular instances. They are misled, as we think, by the commendatory remarks of certain popular journals, the interests of whose proprietors it is to give a favourable introduction to all works proceeding from their own presses, or those of their immediate friends. They thereby secure orders from country and foreign correspondents, who are easily duped by the self-assumed tone of confidence in which the critic notices each new book. Another cause of error arises from the difference of national taste prevalent in Great Britain and in this country; which difference, although scarcely worthy of notice on subjects of general literature, is great in relation to pictures of manners and peculiarities of phraseology. Of the last error, no better evidence can be adduced than the little pleasure afforded amongst us by a large number of what has been termed fashionable novels. Wherever these have been unredeemed by vigorous traits of masterly talent, they have been consigned to merited neglect. Nor is the success of Pelham an exception. That work came recommended by far different qualifications. Sailors and Saints is strongly in proof of what we assert. And we must observe, by the way, that it is truly amusing to see the arrogance of the foppish author of this paltry affair, who actually condemns Cooper for not introducing sea-slang into his novels! Did this poor fool not know the rule of criticism which forbids the introduction of technical terms into any literary production?—but, pshaw! talk of old-fashioned criticism to such vile copiers, not of nature, but of nature's daubs! You might as well speak of real port to a fellow who has been accustomed all his life to brandy mixed with red oak bark.

The Family Visitor, and Sunday School Magazine.—The mania for periodicals has extended itself to children, and even their developing tastes must be gratified with regularly recurring offerings from the press. This little work appears monthly, and contains a variety of useful and agreeable matter, which seems to us, however, as far better suited to the parents of Sunday scholars than to the latter themselves, unless they are considerably advanced in attainments.

SECOND VERSE.

Fair forms and faces pass thee by,
Like bright creations of a dream;
And love-lit eyes, when thou art nigh,
With softer splendours beam:
Life's gayest witcheries are round thee;
But now, while mirth and joy surround thee,
Think'st thou of me?

TO *****

ON HIS DEPARTURE FOR EUROPE, FOR THE BENEFIT OF HIS HEALTH.

THOU'RT gone!—the last farewell is past!

The parting pang is o'er!

The dreaded hour has come at last—

We see thy form no more!

But many hearts shall follow thee

With anxious thoughts and fears,

And the fond eye of memory

Look back on vanished years.

Our hearts shall oft past scenes recall,

And think on what thou wert through all.

We think of thee—not with the grief

Which wastes, in loud lament,

Its bitterness, and finds relief

Ere yet its tears are spent;

But with a sadness still and deep,

Enduring and intense,

Which doth not but in secret weep,

Absorbing every sense,

Till every thought is fixed upon

The image of the absent one.

If tears and prayers, to form a spell

Around thee may combine,

From thee each danger to repel,

A charmed life is thine.

Yon dangerous sea, which hath impelled

Full many a gallant prow,

Ne'er flowed beneath a bark which held

One more beloved than thou.

Of many a thought, and many a dream,

And hope, and fear, thou art the theme.

A mother's tears will fall for thee,

A father's fervent prayers

Follow thee o'er the deep dark sea—

Sad vigils must be theirs,

With many a dim foreboding fraught,

Ere thou their sight shalt bless.

Oh! what can image in our thought

A parent's tenderness?—

The love which never can grow cold,

Though earth no more the loved one hold.

Think not, though we are far apart,

Although we see thee not,

Thy noble mind and generous heart

Can ever be forgot:

Memory her vivid spells doth fling

O'er every thing we see;

There's nought around which doth not bring

Some memory of thee:

Upon our hearts the seal is set—

We could not, if we would, forget.

Fond hearts shall tremble anxiously

At every rising gale;

The eye of love grow dim for thee,

The cheek of friendship pale.

Oh! dark were the presentiments,

Which, rising thick and fast,

Threw o'er our hearts their shadows dense

When we looked on thee last.

We will not name them—they shall be

False dreams, unlike reality.

The sunny clime which thou dost seek,

Its boon shall not deny;

Health yet shall brighten on thy cheek,

And light thy speaking eye:

But O thy noble heart and mind!—

Let nought of change be there:

We would not wish one blot to find

Upon a page so fair.

What thought like this can sooth our pain—

The hope to meet thee thus again!

THYRA.

A mother should give her children a superfluity of enthusiasm, that, after they have lost all they will lose on mixing with the world, enough may still remain to prompt and support them through great actions. A cloak should be of three-pile, to keep its gloss in wear.

THE CASKET.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SPEECH-MAKING.

It has been justly observed that the present is a remarkable age, abounding with all manner of advances in science and mechanics, with improvements, both external and internal, in polity, in jurisprudence, and in crime. The much-talked-of march of intellect is indeed no idle boast; the nineteenth century has been the mother of too many sublime discoveries, to justify the assertion that its claims to admiration and respect are but empty pretensions. In England, the great fountain-head of all improvements, the list of wonders swells to an almost innumerable magnitude. There a bridge has been at least in part constructed, by which the former order of things was intended to be reversed throughout, and travellers were to effect a passage beneath instead of above the aqueous obstacle to continued progress; the old-fashioned methods of vehicular conveyance have been scouted and all but banished from ordinary use, and the aspiring genius of the age could not rest satisfied without pressing into its service the elements themselves, when it would move from place to place upon the surface of the earth; steam-carriages and kite-drawn cars have been devised and actually used, and even the wildly-magnificent project of an enormous cylinder, through which erratic mortals should be propelled by the pressure of the atmosphere with a velocity but little inferior to that of cannon balls, has not been without its supporters. In science the wondrous progress of improvement has not been less; the whole theory of mental philosophy, as advanced and advocated by Reid, and Hume, and Stewart, has been opugned, and another substituted in its place by later reasoners; even the mightiest offspring of the mighty mind of Newton, the theory of gravitation, has been assailed, and only not overturned, because the minds of men have been too closely occupied with matters of deeper interest to enable Sir Richard Phillips to obtain a patient and impartial hearing—at least so he says himself. In chemistry, the changes that have taken place are so numerous and so well known as to obviate the necessity of more than a mere reference. In politics, the sages of that enlightened nation have discovered, that when the minds of a portion of the population are excited almost to rebellion by distress and dissatisfaction, force should be resorted to rather than conciliation; that, as an abstract principle, the government of a military leader is likely to prove better than that of a mere civilian, that an overwhelming load of national debt is a great blessing, and that free and unincumbered commerce with other nations is a thing to be deprecated and avoided like the pestilence. Even in crime, the felons of former ages must hide their diminished heads upon a comparison with the brilliant and accomplished rogues of the present day. True, there was once a Barrington, but his name, like a single star, shines in solitary glory amid the dim lustre of his contemporaries. It was reserved for the nineteenth century to exhibit the magnificent and widely-extended frauds of a Fauntleroy and a Stephenson, the murderous atrocity of a Thurtell, and the desperate and daring ingenuity of an Edward Gibbon Wakefield.

In other nations, the wonders of the present century have been found equally worthy of record. France, Germany, and our own more favoured land, have also done their part in exalting and sustaining the splendour of the age in which we live. But of all the magnificent and astonishing improvements of which it has to boast, there is none more striking than the perfection to which the system of speech-making has been brought, whether we consider the admirable nature of the speeches themselves, or the abundance in which they are presented for our admiration. Is a building of more than private dignity to be erected, we have speeches; a canal to be commenced, a speech; the death of any man of more than ordinary mark and likelihood affords a fair occasion for many exquisite addresses; anniversaries of every possible description, whether of births or deaths, of battles, victories, evacuations, coronations, arrivals, and institutions, all must be celebrated by a speech. If a dinner is given to an officer, either civil or military, he makes a speech of enormous length; his entertainers answer by the mouth of some chosen member of their body, and the whole crude mass of nonsense is disseminated by the newspapers, with copious remarks, to the four quarters of the earth. Elections are surpassingly prolific in these never-enough-to-be-admired outpourings of patriotism and humility; although to our shame it must be confessed that, in this particular, we are outdone by our elder brethren of Great Britain; there the polling is accompanied throughout its whole progress by the wise effusions of the candidates and their adherents; and even when the contest is decided, the war of words is still kept up, and the hard-fought battle rages for whole days and weeks, in the form of addresses congratulatory or recriminative; while with us, as yet, the termination of the struggle puts an end at once to all displays of rival oratory.

An idea has been thrown out by Leigh Hunt, from which some judicious hints might perhaps be borrowed, and applied to the subject of this article; it was a proposition submitted to the whole tribe of rimatore for their judicious and deliberate consideration, and intended to effect a saving of much valuable time and still more valuable paper, by recommending to them to forego at once all the superfluous parts of their effusions, that is to say, all except the rhymes. His proposition was founded upon the fact, that of the immense multitude of poems—so called—there are so few of which it is necessary to know any thing more than the terminations of the lines, to be acquainted with the whole object and tenor of the perpetrations themselves. As an evidence of the advantages to be derived from this method of poetizing, Hunt has given, in the work from which we quote, several specimens of his improved plan, in the various kinds of poetry, with prose explanations, or rather comments at full length. The following is a pastoral, which is certainly deserving of praise for its brevity, if it is utterly destitute of any other merit:

dawn	each	fair	me	ray
plains	spoke	mine	too	heat
lawn	beech	hair	free	play
swains	yoke	divine	woo	sweet
tune	fields	shades	adieu	farewell
lays	bowers	darts	flocks	cows
moon	yields	maids	renew	dell
gaze	flowers	hearts	rocks	boughs

It must be obvious to the least discerning reader, that the foregoing rhymes give a sufficiently definite idea of the subject of the pastoral, and, as usual, it opens with an account of two successful rural lovers describing to each other the course and current of their respective passions; they sally forth in the morning, of course happen to fall into the proper place and dialogue; expatiate upon the charms and condescension of their Phyllises; do justice at the same time to the fields and shades; and finish, as usual, by requesting their flocks to keep quiet, while they renew their harmonious contest under the boughs of some expanded tree.

Might not some improvement of this nature be adopted in the construction of addresses? We generally find an infinite sameness pervading the whole tribe, both in idea and expression. An ingenious man, with time to spare upon his hands, might perhaps find a profit in preparing a number of the words and phrases that most frequently occur in the effusions of these every-day orators, such as "patriotism," "love of country," "conscious of my own demerits," "inadequate to the task," "confidence in your kind indulgence," "great occasion," "public testimony," &c. &c.—these might be kept for sale at every grocery and dram-shop, nicely done up in bundles of some three or four hundred each, and when wanted for use, strung together with a number of intermediate words, which, as they would be of but little importance to the sense, might be added by any indifferent person who would be willing to take the trouble, and there is an oration ready to be delivered at a moment's warning.

If this plan should be carried into operation, and be found profitable, it is to be hoped that the claims of the proposer to a portion of the receipts will not be overlooked.

SKETCHES FROM LIFE.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE BACHELOR.

"NAY, dearest Gertrude—"

"Nay me no nays, dear sir," interrupted Gertrude; "I have positively set my heart upon going to this ball, and I know you will not refuse your own Gertrude this one favour—upon her birth-day too. Have you forgotten that I am seventeen to-day?"

"Are you, indeed? Well then, if—"

"There, there—I hate ifs," and playfully closing his mouth with her hand, the beautiful girl fixed her eyes upon his, as if seeking from them the consent refused by the lips. Those dear dark bewitching eyes of hers, I myself have often felt their influence; and as M— gazed upon them, and upon the smile with which hope was wreathing her full lip, a thousand recollections of other days, and other eyes and smiles, so like hers, flashed over him, and, calling himself an old fool, he kissed her fair brow, and bade her prepare for the ball. An old fool, sure enough, to make such a fuss about his daughter's going to a ball! Stop, gentle reader, Gertrude was not his daughter; she was—but—"thereby hangs a tale;" and while our heroine, under the protection of the honourable Mrs. C—n, is enjoying herself at the ball, and Mr. — is sitting in his lonely room, regretting her absence, we will relate the story.

Charles Merton and Henry Allen were companions at the same school in childhood, intimate at the same college in after years, and at the moment when they separated, each to earn for himself a name and a fortune in the great world, in the enthusiasm of youth they vowed to maintain for each other, through all the changes of life, an eternal, unchangeable friendship; and, in spite of many a wise shake of the head, and many a prediction to the contrary from their classmates, the vow was never broken. These predictions were founded on their total dissimilitude of character. Merton, though possessed of no uncommon talents, had passed through college with the highest honour, and at his departure bore with him the esteem and respect of all who knew him. "Charles," said his vene-erable preceptor, as he folded him in a parting embrace, "in your path through life, remain but true to the character you have established here, and you cannot fail to be successful. Be ever as firm and unyielding in your principles, as persevering in your undertakings, and as correct in your deportment, and whatever may be your fate, in yourself you will be happy."

Charles, under a calm exterior, concealed strong and lasting feelings; and as the words fell from the lips of the old man, they were engraven indelibly upon his heart, and he never forgot them. Henry Allen, on the contrary, had received more than nature brilliant and varied talents, sensitive feelings, and a form and face almost without fault. There was no greater favourite among the scholars than Henry Allen: always acting from the impulse of the moment, he was ever ready to join in their youthful follies, and while his rashness often led them deeper into error, his generosity as often screened the timid from blame, even at the risk of being doubly punished himself. But, too unstable to gain more than temporary success in his studies, he frequently had the mortification to see honours, which, at the outset, he was certain of winning, wrested from his grasp by those inferior to him in all but perseverance. These disappointments were not without effect. At such times, his sensitive delicacy reading contempt in every eye, he would yield himself for a time to a moody melancholy, and shun all society save that of his friend Charles, whose unwearied friendship even he could not repel. He gradually became capricious in his temper and fickle in his attachments; and though his company was still courted for his polished and elegant conversation, though his wit still enlivened the festive board, yet his name was seldom mentioned as an honour to the college. While, however, every one loved him in spite of his faults, none was truly his friend but Charles Merton. I can see him even now, as he in his turn came to receive the farewell of the good old man. His fine face pale with emotion, he threw himself into his arms, and in that softening hour receiving with gratitude the kind whispered advice to "imitate his friend Charles," he dashed away the last tears of his boyhood, and stood before us, the proud man. His affectionate farewells in that parting hour, his regrets for past follies, and resolutions of future amendments, regained for him the affection of those youthful hearts; and such is the fascination of look and manner, that, in his absence, the remembrance of them caused his faults to be forgotten in his brilliant qualities; all seriously felt his loss, and few spoke of him but as of the thoughtless and fascinating Henry. Such is fame.

Years passed away. The father of Charles was a wealthy merchant. By his desire, his son had succeeded him in his business, and, by slow but sure means, was acquiring fortune and standing among his fellow-citizens. Henry had studied the law. He was an eloquent and successful pleader, but the drudgery of business was his aversion. He was generous to a fault; consequently, extravagant and thoughtless; and his purse, open to every wily applicant, could seldom answer the demand of a needy creditor. In vain his friends remonstrated with him—it was his nature, he would say, and he could not help it; and Charles saw with regret, that though he might acquire fame, fortune would ever desert him.

Mr. Campbell, the partner of the elder Merton, was the father of an only daughter. At the time Charles first became acquainted with her, she was three years younger than himself—a lively, pretty girl, of fourteen. Thrown frequently into her society, he soon felt for her the affection of a brother; and she, on her part, treated him with the frankness of a sister. He was her beau at all the parties of her young companions, the confidant of her little sorrows, and the participator in her innocent joys. She grew up a beautiful, intelligent, and accomplished woman. With a mind like that of Charles, there was but a step between esteem and love, which my reader will have the goodness to imagine was easily taken, and he imbibed for her a deep and lasting attachment.

When, at the age of twenty-three, he saw himself firmly established in his business, he declared his attachment to her father, who, knowing his worth, sanctioned it with his warmest approbation. With Gertrude his success was less decided; she was artless as a child, and had never thought of him as other than a brother and a friend. "Charles," said she, "my heart is still free; and if, at the end of one year, you still stand as you now do, first in my affections, this hand is yours."

To the hope of a romantic lover, this answer would have been death; but Charles was, if not enraptured, at least contented with it, and saw in her indifference only the proper reserve of woman. Six months passed away, and as he looked forward with joy to the fulfilment of his wishes, he would speak proudly to Gertrude of his prospects, and picture to her the happiness that awaited them; and as she listened to his noble and disinterested sentiments, and received proofs of his pure affection, she began to think of herself as his future wife, and, as such, received the congratulations of her friends in becoming silence. But Gertrude did not love Charles with the passionate ardour of woman, and she was fated to discover her mistake. Pity that she could not have for ever remained in ignorance of it. Had she but once have plighted her vows to him at the holy altar, the feelings of a wife would have rendered her heart invulnerable to the shafts of the mischievous urchin, and she might, even now, have been a happy woman. Ah! why is woman thus for ever the victim of her own devoted, self-sacrificing heart? Poor Charles, too secure in his own happiness, was destined to be himself the destroyer of it for ever. Whether it was merely chance, or whether unconsciously, fearing the power of Henry's fascinations, he had been the means of preventing it, we will not determine; but it had so happened, that Henry and Gertrude had never met. But one beautiful evening, on his way to Mr. Campbell's, Charles met Henry, and asked him to join him in his purposed visit. On their way, he unfolded to him his future prospects, spoke of the mental and personal charms of his beloved, and jokingly invited him to attend at his wedding that day six months.

They entered the room where Gertrude was seated alone. She rose to welcome them, and as Charles introduced his friend, involuntarily glanced from one to the other, as if contrasting their appearance. It was an unfavourable moment for poor Charles. He had already begun to repent of his ill-judged confidence; and as he watched her speaking looks, his face became pale with anxiety, and his uneasiness gave an embarrassment to his manner, very different from his usual self-possession. But Henry bowed gracefully to the blooming girl, and expressed his hopes of a future acquaintance, with all the ease and elegance of a man of fashion. He found Gertrude, as he had expected, a very pretty, genteel girl; but when, in conversing with her, he saw her whole countenance illumined with intelligence—when he caught the soft melting glances of her dark eyes, and heard the low sweet tones of her voice, he thought her the most beautiful woman he had ever seen, and, ere the close of that eventful evening, he had whispered to himself that Charles was too cold, too unimpassioned, to deserve so rare a blessing, and he could not help thinking how differently he would have loved her.

(To be concluded in our next.)

THE FINE ARTS.

THE PANORAMA OF GENEVA.

We noticed the new exhibition at the Rotunda a few days ago. The Panorama building in Chambers-street, which has been ornamented within a few months with the pictures of Athens and Mexico, now offers a beautiful transcript of the scene presented to one who chooses a favourable spot on Lake Lemman, near to the city of Geneva, where the eye embraces the variety of fine and beautiful objects that present themselves in all directions. The scenery of that vicinity, so widely and so justly famed, may perhaps be better understood and appreciated after one glance at this picture, than after reading all the descriptions ever written of it. The spectator is surrounded with water, which the artist has enlivened by introducing a number of boats of different sizes, near enough to exhibit to advantage the picturesque costumes of the peasantry from several of the neighbouring cantons. Garden-walls are seen on one side, overhung with foliage, the lake spreads out to a great distance in front, with its varied and cultivated shore on the right, ornamented with numerous country houses, and backed by fine ridges of mountains, the most distant of which is Mount Blanc and its well known fellow peaks, covered with snow, at a distance of about fifty miles. The city of Geneva is seen on two sides of the panorama, overtopped in some places by other mountains; and the clearness and brilliancy of the sky, with the smoothness and transparency of the water, present the various features of the scene in a highly favourable view, while they produce the impressions of a fine day in a delightful season of the year.

THE CENSOR.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE PRESS.

MR. MORRIS—If we examine the complexion and character of the great majority of the diurnal and other journals of the United States, we shall find them strikingly deficient on the score of useful instruction. They will be found to be made up in a great measure of accounts of murders and executions, of piracies, of attempts at arson, burglaries, pilferings, assaults and batteries, counterfeitings, swindlings, abductions, kidnappings, petty frauds, horse-racing, trotting-matches, vulgar anecdotes, and a tiresome tissue of other depravities and follies, many of them so contemptible as to be utterly unworthy of notice. It is impossible to trace the influence of these things on the public feelings and habits; for no one can "paint the finest features of the mind." But, by the help of the imagination and a little sober reflection, we perceive numberless mischiefs to be their natural offspring. They serve to corrupt and pervert the moral propensities and views, and to introduce a certain looseness, not to say licentiousness, of manners and sentiments through almost every channel of society. Not a few of the gazettes are devoted to the dissemination of obscenity, falsehoods, and slanders, and of the harsh asperities of vindictive political aspirants or their wretched instruments. Those subjects which have an important bearing on the great leading interests of the community, which are calculated to open the door to valuable improvements, to the acquisition and extension of useful knowledge, to general edification and the refinement of manners, are almost wholly lost sight of. But we find no deficiency in schemes which are designed to pamper the foul spirit of avarice, to deceive and strip the unsuspecting, and to enable the cunning harpy to take advantage of his less skilful neighbour. That insatiable lust for distinction, which can only be gratified by means of wealth or power, has every where, and in all classes,* obtained such an ascendancy, that rectitude and honour seem to be discarded, and the "means are sanctified by the end." This, however, is the less to be wondered at, when it is known that men, who would fain be thought the meek and pure disciples of the Christian religion, are eagerly seeking for opportunities to enrich themselves, or to get the emoluments of office, little regarding the evils that may be brought upon others, however cruel or unjust in their operations. This has become too much the ruling passion of our countrymen. So confirmed is this habit, that it would appear to be alarmingly portentous; for we are already suspected of being a nation of sharpers.

But I return to the subject of the gazettes, those fountains from which incessantly flow streams of such diversified character, that it is difficult to speak of them as they deserve without losing sight of decorum. If they convey intelligence in an expeditious and cheap form, and make known to distant readers the policy of nations and the issues of battles; if, through this medium, men are made better acquainted with their natural and political rights; if they learn who are to be their rulers, and who are dismissed from office; they also learn all the wily tricks of party, and are constantly the dupes of designing knaves. Instead of studying what might otherwise be useful, they are led astray either by the pestiferous drenchings of political quacks, or are amused by a detail of the trifling and corrupting facts which daily meet our eye, and which, in a multitude of cases, are as derogatory to editors and printers as they are offensive to people of correct moral perceptions. To these allegations, I maintain, there are but few exceptions.† We here find no light thrown upon the sciences, no aid given to the arts, no benefits conferred upon

* We beg leave to dissent from this wholesale charge of our intelligent and respectable correspondent; for though it may apply to many, we still insist upon numerous honourable exceptions; and with regard to what foreigners may suspect of us as a nation, our answer is in a line from Shakspeare,

"Suspicion always haunts the guilty mind."

† We must again dissent, and could name many gazettes whose columns daily teem with useful and solid information; but do not choose to make comparisons which might be deemed invidious. But, after all, they who live by catering for the public, must furnish such viands only as the multitude are willing to pay for. The fault, therefore, in a great measure, rests with the public, and not with the editors of the daily journals. As popular taste advances, we have no doubt but corresponding improvements will keep pace with it.

agriculture, nor any prop to genius. The whole bears a resemblance to mountebank exhibitions, which serve only to call forth the "vacant laugh," or to produce the still more "vacant stare." Some of our own city gazettes are shamefully deficient in their duty respecting suggestions that relate to public improvements, unless it be a project of magnitude; and even then, however important it may be, it is often left to slumber in obscurity, after having been barely touched upon. There is no limit to the field that lies open to every industrious labourer, provided there is a disposition to promote those schemes which deeply concern the best interests of the citizens. Much has been done, but much more remains to be accomplished; and since no individual can lay claim to all knowledge, every man is called upon to contribute his mite to the general stock. It is the peculiar province of editors to scrutinize into such matters, and to afford all the aid their presses can furnish in relation to those topics which involve the character, the embellishment, and the future grandeur of the city. If they are wanting in their duty, they are without excuse; and that they are open to the imputation of gross neglect and carelessness, I believe will not be denied. We fix this charge, on the ground, that columns of their papers are frequently, nay, almost daily, filled with accounts of transactions of a very trifling nature, whilst things of the utmost consequence are passed by unheeded. The reputation of some of the journals in the Union is a disgrace to our country and to republican government; and a regard to the public morals, the public tranquillity, and to the preservation of our free institutions, calls aloud for a thorough reformation.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE KROUTS.

MR. MORRIS—Several of my Knickerbocker friends having expressed their satisfaction on seeing one of our occasional odes appear in your valuable paper, I take the liberty to trouble you with another; which, though a mere parody, may not be unacceptable to many of your readers. On the celebration of our next anniversary, I shall beg your acceptance of a ticket." W.

KROUTS, who have so often fed,
Here, on cabbage white and red,
Welcome now, the board is spread
For our revelry!

Now's the day, and now's the hour,
See our royal chief devour
Sausage, goose, and cabbage sour,
Scorning rivalry!

Who would be to care a slave?
Who, at such a feast, be grave?
Who refuse to chant a slave?
Let him quickly flee!

Who for cabbage, king, and law,
Knife and fork will freely draw,
Till there's nought but bones to gnaw,
Let him do like me!

By the fiends of care and pain,
By blue-devils in the brain,
We will eat and quaff champagne,
Till the demons flee!

Lay the kROUT and smoked-geese low,
Let the wine in torrents flow,
Till the cheeks with rapture glow—
'Tis our king's decree.

Load your plates above the rim,
Fill your glasses to the brim,
Think what honours wait on him
Who the prize receives!

'Tis a race of bright renown,
'Tis to win a princely crown,
'Tis to wear a regal gown
Made of cabbage-leaves.

KROUTS, then play your manly parts,
With the puddings, pies, and tarts;
Cabbage heads have generous hearts,
Let them bound with glee.

'Tis a custom we revere,
'Tis a feast to Dutchmen dear—
Knickerbockers, every year,
Keep the jubilee.

* We thank our correspondent for his kind intention, but beg leave to decline the proposed civility; for, although a lineal descendant of the Knickerbockers, yet, strange to say, our kROUT is our aversion. In addition to this, we are an active member of the cold water society, and would respectfully recommend to send the ticket to our tailor who is known to be very fond of cabbage.—Ed. N. Y. Mir.

THE STAGE.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE DRAMA.

WE would fain say a few words on this almost obsolete subject, before its glories are utterly forgotten. The days of Shakspeare are past! Time has been when such a man's plays were performed in this city, and with considerable applause too; but it is a long, long time ago. Since that period, the spirit of the age has changed; and on those boards where "Richard plotted and Othello raved," heartless infidelity and noisy ribaldry have held their triumphant revels. The foolish grandfathers and grandmothers of the present generation would have preferred the philosophy of Hamlet to that of a female lecturer, or the clumsy attempts at wit of a Shakspeare or Sheridan to the exquisite sallies and brilliant impromptus of a masquerade; but their sapient descendants know better. Like little Isaac Mendoza, they are "keen, very keen," and are not any longer to be taken in by the pretensions of such antiquated authors. True, the "lectures" are "numbered with the things o'erpast," but the intellectual amusement of masquerades has sprung up in their place, and spread like an epidemic over every quarter of the town—

"All the city is a masquerade,
"And all the men and women merely—"

but we leave the blank to be supplied by those who have more charity for such patch-work follies than ourselves. The disease first commenced at the Park, and from thence branched out in all directions, infecting the inhabitants of every street with a "midsummer madness," until its further progress was checked at once by the east and north rivers, who thus in a manner impudently usurped the rights and privileges of our active legislature, in whom the sole power of checking disorders is wisely invested, and by whom it is judiciously and efficiently exercised. To the northeast, the mania, having a greater range, and gathering force as it flew, raged with uncommon virulence, so that the horses at Mount Pitt circus were fain to abdicate their stage and stables, and the fashionables in that vicinity assembled thereon, and commenced masquerading forthwith. Meanwhile the aristocracy and democracy of the "east end of the town," and the regions thereunto adjoining, fired with a spirit of laudable emulation, rivalled each other in the splendour and elegance of their "fancy balls." Considerable dispute has arisen to which of those parties the palm of superiority ought to be assigned. Both have strong claims. The assemblies of the aristocracy were the more select—those of the democracy the more liberal. In the former, nothing darker than olive, or half-caste, were admitted; the latter were "broad and general as the casing air," and country and colour formed no ground of objection.

In fact, things are coming to a strange pass in this city. All is either fiery zeal, open infidelity, or headlong dissipation. In a short time there will be no such thing as mild and moderate religion or rational amusement left. Amongst the latter we have ever ranked the theatre, when applied to its proper uses, as first and foremost. We have looked upon it as a place where the best possible things are represented in the best possible manner—as a moving picture-gallery of the past, and a speaking panorama of the present—where all that is great, glorious, and spirit-stirring in history and in song, and all that is lively, witty, and humorous in real life, has been portrayed and condensed by genius to form an evening's amusement. Now what a piece of egotism is man, when, rather than spend a dollar to witness "the hair-breadth 'scapes and moving incidents" of the stage, he will give five to tread that stage himself, in a weak attempt to sustain some assumed character, of which he has as much conception as the character has of him! Could any thing be more flat and vapid than some of our late masquerades, where all was noise and nonsense, or worse than nonsense—laboured attempts at wit; where men left off what they were, in a vain effort to be what they could not be, and attempted to sustain their parts by "Taffeta phrases, silken terms precise,

"Three-piled hyperboles, spruce affectation,
"Figures pedantical," &c.

And how many, for the last month, have spent their mornings, in order to prepare for the evening's effort, in concocting conundrums, pondering over premeditated impromptu puns, studying jest-books, or any other way to

"Pick up wit as pigeons peas,
"And utter it again when heaven please."

We trust that the very excess of the folly will, in a short time, work its own cure. More anon. C.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE MANAGEMENT OF CHILDREN.

BY SYLVANUS URBAN, ESQ.

NUMBER II.

THE second of my list of maxims is also one of extreme importance, and requires to be observed with unremitting diligence; for the consequences of its non-observance are sure to be exceedingly unpleasant. It is this: "Never break your word with a youngling." No matter what it is you have promised to him, whether reward or punishment, privation or gratification, when the time or contingency arrives, keep your promise. If you have enjoined upon him performance or non-performance of a certain act, and intimated punishment in case of disobedience, be not moved from the fulfilment of your undertaking either by forgetfulness or indifference, or by his cries and intreaties. It seems cruel to resist his impassioned pleadings, but it will be good in the end both for you and him; for him, because he will learn to be more careful how he transgresses in future; for you, because you will be spared both the displeasure excited by his misconduct, and the pain of inflicting the punishment which that misconduct has merited.

Above all, by keeping your word with him invariably and strictly, you avoid the sin of lying yourself, and the tremendous consequences of setting him a lying example. If once you fail in observing and keeping the faith which you have pledged, he will naturally expect that you will fail again, and thus learn to disregard your injunctions, and, what is worse, to disregard veracity; he will justify his own departures from the unswerving line of truth by your example. I have had much experience with children, although a bachelor, for I am blessed with a goodly list of brothers, sisters, cousins, aunts, and uncles, who diligently observe the great command of the holy evangelists. My little nephews and nieces obey me more promptly and with far fewer symptoms of reluctance than they exhibit under the commands of their parents, and simply because they have found by experience that, when I speak to them, my requisitions are not safely to be treated as mere idle words; that I will be obeyed, and when I am not, that the promised punishment is sure to be forthcoming. Yet they love me, for I am not given to issuing unreasonable orders; I strive not to be capricious with them, and they know that, when they have done well, my approbation follows as certainly as my displeasure when they have done ill; that rewards are as easily to be won from me as punishment. In short, they know exactly how to calculate upon my conduct towards them.

Another important maxim is "Be consistent in your management of the little people." Be careful to avoid as much as possible forbidding at one time, what you enjoin or even allow at another; for, little though you may think it, children remember these things. I know an excellent lady who is very fond of her young ones—and they are very young—but is variable, and somewhat fiery in her temper, and has but little practical skill in management—and her house is almost a purgatory to herself, her husband and her visitors. If she is in a good humour, or feels lazily inclined, she will overlook a hundred things in her children, which, although not very serious, still ought not to be allowed to pass unnoticed, and for which, the very next day, perhaps, if the mood is changed, she will scold them, scream at them, and box their ears. In the morning, she will issue a proclamation, and if it is not complied with, the cheeks of the unhappy urchin are sure to suffer, and that most unmercifully. In the afternoon the same mandate is promulgated, unheeded, and no notice is taken of the transgression. The necessary consequence of this system is, that her domicile is a perpetual den of uproar and confusion. To-day the brats are noisy and mischievous, from pure exuberance of animal spirits, and mamma being in a kindly humour, says nothing to the contrary; to-morrow they are noisy and mischievous as before, but the state of things is changed with the ruling power, and per consequence they are rated, slapped, and stormed at; and then come shrieks, and screams, and howls, swelled eyes, and tear-streaked faces; and, worse than all, their tempers are ruined by this sad mismanagement.

I was saying something a few lines back, touching the sin of lying; and that reminded me of another evil practice, in parents and others, towards these juvenile members of society, which ought to be carefully avoided—for it tends to make them liars: it is the trick of requiring reasons from them for many things which they do and say. In nine cases out of ten, they have no reasons to give, and are ashamed to own it; they act and speak from impulse, from the mere desire of acting and speaking, not like adults, from reflection and set purpose. How absurd then it is in us, to require them to come to judgment before our matured intellects, for every idle expression! But it is worse than absurd; it teaches them to lie; rather than undergo the shame of confessing that they have spoken thoughtlessly and without a reason, they will invent one. They will tell us they said or did so and so, because so and so; when, in fact, the cause which they assign has nothing in the world to do with the act or saying with which they have connected it, and had not even occurred to their imaginations until they were called on for it.

But Wordsworth has given a lecture upon this matter, better than any I can give, which—as many of my readers have probably not seen it—I will here insert:

I have a boy of five years old,
His face is fair and fresh to see,
His limbs are cast in beauty's mould,
And dearly he loves me.

One morn we strolled on our dry walk,
Our quiet home all full in view,
And held such intermitted talk
As we are wont to do.

My thoughts on former pleasures ran;
I thought of Kilve's delightful shore,
Our pleasant home when spring began,
A long, long year before.

A day it was when I could bear
To think, and think, and think again;
With so much happiness to spare,
I could not feel a pain.

My boy was by my side, so slim
And graceful in his rustic dress!
And oftentimes I talked to him
In very idleness.

The young lambs ran a pretty race;
The morning sun shone bright and warm:
"Kilve," said I, "was a pleasant place,
"And so is Liswyn farm."

"My little boy, which like you more,"
I said, and took him by the arm—
"Our home by Kilve's delightful shore,
"Or here at Liswyn farm?"

"And tell me, had you rather be,"
I said, and held him by the arm,
"At Kilve's smooth shore by the green sea,
"Or here at Liswyn farm?"

In careless mood he looked at me,
While still I held him by the arm,
And said, "At Kilve I'd rather be,
Than here at Liswyn farm."

"Now, little Edward, say why so;
"My little Edward, tell me why?"
"I cannot tell, I do not know."
"Why, this is strange," said I.

"For, here are woods, and green hills warm:
"There surely must some reason be
"Why you would change sweet Liswyn farm
"For Kilve by the green sea."

At this, my boy hung down his head,
He blushed with shame, nor made reply;
And five times to the child I said,
"Why, Edward, tell me why?"

His head he raised—there was in sight—
It caught his eye, he saw it plain—
Upon the house-top, glittering bright,
A broad and gilded vane.

Then did the boy his tongue unlock,
And thus to me he made reply:
"At Kilve there was no weather-cock,
"And that's the reason why."

Oh dearest, dearest boy! my heart
For better lore would seldom yearn,
Could I but teach the hundredth part
Of what from thee I learn.

FROM THE ANWARI SOHEILI.

Each atom in the earth, and each atom in the sky,
To their kindred atoms ever with fond affection fly.
Like habits look to like, in morals as in food;
The wicked court the wicked; men of virtue love the good;
The pure of heart and mind none but the purest wine can please,
Whilst wretches of base soul will be contented with the lees.
So men of sense to men of sense with true attraction run,
And one fop draws unto him all the fops beneath the sun.

REPOSITORY.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE HISTORY OF A FELON.

A VERY pretty group was assembled one evening in December, around the cheerful fire of Mr. Leonard Waldoover; the time was about five o'clock; a tea-table with its appendages was placed before the fire, at just sufficient distance to allow those who were to sit around it to enjoy the grateful warmth, yet not too near to forbid an easy passage between; a lady of some forty years of age or thereabouts occupied a low rocking-chair in one corner, and a placid gentlemanly-looking man of fifty had established his arm-chair in the other; these were Mr. Waldoover and his wife; a boy of ten was standing at the table and reading with an air of profound abstraction in the "New-York Mirror;" an elder brother was conversing with the father, and at the very moment in which the scene is opened to us, the door of the apartment opened, and a lovely girl of nineteen entered. Mr. Waldoover was a merchant of high standing and considerable wealth; his wife a finished lady, in mind, manners, and education; and this is all which we think necessary to be told respecting them.

"Lucy, my daughter," said Mrs. Waldoover, "why have you ordered tea so early? are you going out to-night?"

"Yes, ma, I am engaged to go to the theatre to-night."

"The theatre, my love?" said the father, "you go too often to the theatre, Lucy; I wish you would stay at home this evening if you can, for I expect an old friend to see me, and I have promised him some fine music from your guitar."

"Oh, pa, I cannot play for you to-night, for I promised to go and see Der Freischutz with the honourable Theophilus Charles Bingham."

"Oh, very well then," said the obedient parent, and thus ended the brief dialogue; and now leaving our friends to take their tea, and receive the honourable Theophilus Charles Bingham, we will, with our reader's permission, inquire a little into the history of the individual whose name appears to have such potency.

Mr. Jacob Benjamin was an extremely interesting young gentleman of four-and-twenty years of age, and was indebted for his existence to an amiable lady who kept a clothing establishment, videlicet, a shop-shop, in Rag-Fair, London. Mr. Jacob was considered rather androme by his youthful companions, the black-eyed and beetle-browed hours of Tower-Hill and the Minorities; and in good truth they were not entirely mistaken in their opinion of his personal attractions. His stature was precisely five feet three and a quarter inches, and his figure would have been remarkably well proportioned, but for a slight yet too perceptible tendency to corpulence, and a corresponding tenuity in the nether limbs; these last were also guilty of an undue deviation from the perpendicular, from the knee downwards and outwards, suggesting in the mind of the beholder an involuntary idea of antipathy between the pedal terminations, which seemed to prompt them to keep as far distant from each other as possible. His face was in form oval, and in complexion olive; his mouth wide, and his teeth white; his eyes black, small and sparkling, and his nose aquiline and Hebrew. By his friends he was called an elegant creature, although the expression of his physiognomy was rather too strongly indicative of cunning and a certain tact in the making of a bargain, to be generally pleasing on a first view. It cannot be said that his education or early habits of life had been such as were calculated to make him shine in general society, for the first had been only what he was enabled to pick up by his own unassisted efforts, and as to the latter, the less that is said about them the better it will probably be for his interests, for, truth to tell, they will not bear a very close investigation. Of the attainments of Mr. Jacob Benjamin in the walks of literature, his chronicler cannot speak in the language of strong encomium. His time had been in general too exclusively occupied in the acquisition of half-pence during his early years, to allow him to devote many hours to that of knowledge; and since the passage of that non-descript period, which intervenes between boy and manhood, the care of supporting a mother and two sisters, which had devolved upon him since the absence of his father, who some years before had gone to travel at the expense of the country, by the recommendation of a learned judge, had left him no leisure to bestow upon any thing but his calling. That calling was both ancient and honourable, being a species of collectorship, differing however in its objects from all collectorships connected with the custom-house department. Not to keep the reader in suspense, Mr. Jacob Benjamins was a member of that useful and entertaining body of citizens generally denominated old-clothes-men, and it was currently reported in his praise that a deeper, more sonorous, or more captivating voice was not heard in any street of London, nor was there to be found a member of the corps peripatetic to which he belonged, whose sagacity in spying out a customer, or whose savoir-faire in the conduct of a bargain could be justly said to excel, if indeed they might equal his. At the time of the commencement of this biographical sketch, Mr. Jacob Benjamins had pursued his honest avocation with varied, but, on the whole, respectable success, during a period of three years, having entered upon it together with his manhood, and but for one or two little failings inherent in his disposition, might have continued to perambulate the streets of that far-famed metropolis, diligently gathering friends, pence and cast-off garments to the present moment; but another fate was in store for him. And here we must take the liberty of a slight digression, to lift up our voices against the progress of knowledge, which being accompanied by a proportionate decrease of principle, bids fair to turn this poor world topsy-turvy. If there is, as was well remarked by one of our civic worthies, now deceased—if there is a thorough-going knave in existence, it is that rogue Chymistry, who is perpetually affording facilities to the dishonest for the gulling of their unsophisticated neighbours. The scoundrel can imitate or disguise every thing. He can transform glass into diamonds, rubies, and emeralds, so that none but a jeweller, who is in five cases out of ten as great a scamp as himself, can detect them.

He can make admirable champagne out of execrable cider; and, what is not a little remarkable, it will not kill a man so soon as corrosive sublimate; he can manufacture good flour of spoiled gypsum; gas out of cotton seed, and money out of the cotton; he can change a bank-note for one pound into a bank note for ten; and a shilling into a sovereign; in short, he can poison, bamboozle, cheat and defraud mankind in every thing, and nobody the wiser.

He it was that gave the first impulse to the unfortunate Jacob Benjamins in the Road to Ruin; and it must now be our business to relate the distressing particulars.

It has been already intimated that the moral character of Mr. Jacob Benjamins fell short of absolute perfection in sundry little items; these were, a peculiar sensibility to the charms of "the last best work;" a taste for pleasure generally; and an inordinate consciousness of the value of money, both abstractedly per se, and as an instrument in the attainment of various little gratifications, to the which his soul did much incline, to wit, balls, masquerades, the shilling gallery at Astley's, and devilled turkeys. He was, as has been said, a favourite among the ladies; but this flattering feature in his history was less to be ascribed to any personal merits, than to the liberality with which he was in the habit of dispensing various little attentions among his fair friends of the female gender, which attentions were generally manifested in the shape of invitations to the pleasant resorts for which his own predilections were so active. His fascinating face and figure were well known to the door-keepers at the minor theatres, and at Astley's; and by them he was seldom seen alone; each arm supported some blooming black-eyed houri from the remote east, either Ailie-street, or Smithfield-place, or the greasy purlieus of White Chapel. When his nights were not thus engaged, the Rainbow claimed his presence; Fleet-street Rainbow, where oysters, Welch-rabbits, devils and segars, do reign supreme. To support this lavish nightly expenditure, our hero had but the profits of his daily walks, which, though large, were yet insufficient. The fact is, master Jacob Benjamins was rapidly wending his way to that general bourne of spendthrifts, bankruptcy; and in an evil hour, he picked up an acquaintance, whose career had been like his own in early life, and who now supplied those wants, which he had found honest industry inadequate to meet, by dishonest means. This new friend, Mr. Isaac Solomons, or, as he was commonly called, Ikey Solomons, had dabbled in chymistry and mineralogy; at least he was practically acquainted with the properties and value of different metals, and with the art of giving to some the appearance of others. In short, his profession was that of a coinier; and by way of relaxation and variety, he sometimes superintended an engraving establishment, where bank-notes were fabricated without the concurrence of his majesty's government. This villain had for some time kept an eye upon our juvenile Jacob, rightly supposing, from his course of life, that the time must ultimately come when larger supplies of money would be needed, and that need become so strong as to banish all idle scruples respecting their acquisition. That time did soon arrive, and so sore was its pressure, that the bait was swallowed with even far more readiness than the tempter had believed possible. It is not necessary that we should follow our neophyte through his career; it is enough to say, that for a time all things went smoothly with him; Ikey Solomons was a proficient in his art, the factitious sovereigns and bank-notes passed off without suspicion, and master Jacob Benjamins was more gallant, and more assiduous than ever in his attendance at Astley's and the Rainbow. But all this was too pleasant to last for ever; the thief-takers and Bow-street queers began to look sharply at our adventurer, and at last a warrant was actually issued for his apprehension. Twelve hours more, and the fate of Mr. Benjamins had been sealed; but luckily for his Jewish neck, a woman interfered and saved him. Among the numberless beauties who had shared his attentions and his generosity, was one whom nature had but slightly favoured with her gifts; a freckled, sandy-headed, meagre damsel, with dull gray-gooseberry eyes, and a nose that defied all description; but she was a clever, good-natured creature, and an heiress. Her father was an officer, and one of the most formidable of that formidable phalanx—the terror of all the rogues of London. It was currently rumoured that the old man was worth ten thousand pounds, and that his only daughter would inherit all his wealth. Ugly as she was, this rumour had procured her many suitors, but among them all was none toward whom her own gentle heart yearned so fondly as to the quondam hero of Rag-Fair—the gay and gallant Jacob Benjamins. By accident she gained the knowledge of the warrant, and vowing to save her beloved swain, she hastened to seek him out and communicate to him the alarming intelligence. By great good fortune, the first direction which she took proved successful; and, breathless with haste and terror, she gasped forth her warning, urged him to immediate flight, and with an aching bosom bade him farewell. What was now to be done was the next question; a moment's delay might prove fatal, and yet the sinews of flight were wanting. Jacob had been unusually lavish of late, and with a rueful countenance he examined his almost exhausted pocket-book; it contained but one poor counterfeit five pound note. At this juncture his anxieties were suspended by the opportune arrival of his fellow-labourer in the fields of iniquity, Ikey Solomons, to whom the emergency of his situation was forthwith communicated.

"Indeed!" said Ikey; "has it come so soon? I expected this, but not just yet; but it cannot now be helped; I must hasten my preparations. Listen, Jacob; I have for some time past foreseen that this trouble would, sooner or later, arrive, and I have not neglected the necessary arrangements; you must fly to America; a ship is at this moment waiting in the river for a wind, and will sail in all probability to-day; you must go on board instantly."

"But," said the neophyte, "I have no money, and—"
"That is cared for," interrupted his mentor. "In this pocket-book are bank-notes and bills of exchange to the amount of five thousand pounds, the savings of ten years of assiduous industry; you must take them, and on your arrival in New-York, invest the money in some safe institution in my name; I shall speedily follow, for the climate is growing rather too hot for me too; so begone, and watch my arrival in the land of liberty; no fear of thief-takers there, my boy. Good-by; you have no time to lose."

The project was carried into successful execution; our friend Jacob arrived safely in the United States, resolving, however, like an honest man, to have no farther communication with the accomplished Mr. Solomons; to avoid whom he immediately set off for Philadelphia, Baltimore, and New-Orleans, keeping himself very quiet, and passing under an assumed name.

Our limits will not allow us to trace his wanderings in detail, suffice it to say, that, four years after his arrival in America, he was a resident of one of our chief cities, much improved in manners by travel and study—for, to do him justice, he had employed the time to profit—relieved from all anxiety respecting the advent of his quondam associate—who, by the latest advices, had been transported to Botany Bay for life—and flourishing, the very glass of fashion and cynosure of ladies' eyes, as the Hon. Theophilus Charles Bingham, nephew of an English earl, and pos-essor of wealth illimitable. It is discreditable to our countrymen and women to admit that they were most egregiously humbugged by this scoundrelly adventurer; but it is a melancholy fact, that, shallow as were his pretensions, and easy of detection, they were received as unexceptionable; and by the aid of a monstrous pair of whiskers, a splendid wardrobe, a curricule, and half-a-dozen horses, and above all, of a matchless stock of impudence, the pseudo-honourable was welcomed as became his fictitious rank in the highest circles, and courted as one worthy of all admiration. His presence was deemed an indispensable item at all the ultra fashionable dinners, suppers, balls and soirees; his dicta were acknowledged as unerring rules in all matters of bon ton; his hand was thought a prize which the first-rate belles did not disdain to angle for. Happy the damsel whom he condescended to visit; thrice happy she whom he vouchsafed to honour with his company at the theatre; but happy beyond all others the envied fair one who was permitted to obtain a seat in his dashing curricule.

For the honour of our country this did not endure for ever; and lucky was it for Miss Lucy Walldover—who, by the way, was not by any means a silly girl, or deserving of the fate which he had destined for her—that his detection came to pass before the scheme which he was prosecuting against her peace and her father's bank-stock had arrived at its destined consummation.

We left this young lady hastening the process of taking tea, in order to be in time to accompany the admired Theophilus to the theatre. The social meal was finished, and the hour of departure came, but not the expected honorable; another hour passed, and still no tidings of the noble gentleman; dreadful was the alarm of the young lady, and great the wonderment of all besides; but still he came not; Lucy saw no play that night.

The next day brought the cause of this strange negligence. The Honourable Theophilus Charles Bingham was a prisoner in the city prison; he had been detected in selling false jewels, in passing forged checks, and in cheating at play; and his game was up. The whole city was in a hub-bub; some still believed him an innocent and injured man, but their incredulity was of short duration; a monstrous system of swindling was gradually developed, in which he had been the chief agent; his early history, in course of time, became known; and in less than four months after that memorable night with which this story opened, the Honourable T. C. Bingham, alias Jacob Benjamins, was busily engaged in learning to make shoes in the state prison.

THE REVIEW.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

EDGE-HILL,

OR THE

FAMILY OF THE FITZROYALS.

BY A VIRGINIAN.

It is somewhat late to notice this work, but the fault is not in us, and we feel almost tempted to bestow a censure upon the author for his tardiness in placing before us a report so palatable. We took it up as a matter of duty, and expected to lay it aside with no other feeling than that of self-congratulation at the accomplishment of an irksome task. We were very much mistaken in our anticipations. The book is a very sensible, clever, and spirited article, and bears strong testimony in favour of the talents of the "Virginian," for such is the only intelligence the author has vouchsafed to give respecting his "local habitation and his name." He need not be ashamed of his handiwork, however; for it does him credit. We have but little space to bestow upon him now, and that little we think we cannot put to better use than the giving him a piece of sound advice, which, for our own sake, as well as his, we hope he will follow most religiously. Our homily is comprised in one brief sentence, "Beware of imitation." The plot and characters of Edge-hill smack something too much of Cooper. The old Fitzroyal, young Fitzroyal, Mont-eagle, Ludwell, Ruth, and Harriet Wilton of the one, bear a marvellous resemblance to the Colonel Howard, Griffiths, Kit Dillon, Barnstable, Cecilia, and Katherine Plowden of the other; but verb. sap.—we have done.

The best criterion of enlarged minds, next to the performance of great actions, is their comprehension.

VILLAGE TALES.

LOQUACITY.

BY MISS MARY RUSSELL MITFORD.

THE lords of the creation, who are generally—to do them justice—tenacious enough of their distinctive and peculiar faculties and powers, have yet by common consent made over to the females the single gift of loquacity. Every man thinks and says that every woman talks more than he: it is the creed of the whole sex—the debates and law reports notwithstanding. And every masculine eye that has scanned my title has already, I doubt not, looked for an errata, suspecting a mistake in the gender; but it is their misconception, not my mistake. I do not—heaven forbid!—intend to impugn or abrogate our female privilege; I do not dispute that we do excel, generally speaking, in the use of the tongue; I only mean to assert that one gentleman does exist—whom I have the pleasure of knowing intimately—who stands pre-eminent and unrivalled in the art of talking; unmatched and unapproached by man, woman, or child. I should be at a loss where to seek a competitor to contend with him in a race of words, and I should be still more puzzled to find one that can match him in wit, pleasantry, or good humour.

My friend is usually called Harry L.; for, though a man of substance, a lord of land, a magistrate, a field-officer of militia, nobody ever dreamed of calling him mister or major, or by any such derogatory title—he is and will be all his life plain Harry, the name of universal good-will. He is indeed the pleasantest fellow that lives. His talk—one can hardly call it conversation, as that would seem to imply another interlocutor, something like reciprocity—is an incessant flow of good things, like Congreve's comedies without a replying speaker, or Joe Miller laid into one; and its perpetual stream is not lost and dispersed by diffusion, but runs in one constant channel, playing and sparkling like a fountain, the delight and ornament of our good town.

Harry L. is a perfect example of provincial reputation, of local fame. There is not an urchin in the town that has not heard of him, nor an old woman that does not chuckle by anticipation at his approach. The citizens are as proud of him as the citizens of Antwerp were of the Chapeau de Paille, and they have the advantage of the luckless Flemings, in the certainty that their boast is not to be purchased. Harry, like the Flemish Beauty, is native to the spot; for he was born at B., educated at B., married at B.—though, as his beautiful wife brought him a good estate in a distant part of the country, there seemed at that epoch of his history some danger of his being lost to our ancient borough; but he is a social and gregarious animal; so he leaves his pretty place in Devonshire to take care of itself, and lives here in the midst of a hive. His tastes are not at all rural. He is no sportsman, no farmer, no lover of strong exercise. When at B., his walks are quite regular; from his own house, on one side of the town, to a gossip-shop called “literary” on the other, where he talks and reads newspapers, and others read newspapers and listen; thence he proceeds to another house of news, similar in kind, though differing in name, in an opposite quarter, where he and his hearers undergo the same process, and then he returns home, forming a pretty exact triangle of about half a mile. This is his daily exercise, or rather his daily walk; of exercise he takes abundance, not only in talking—though that is nearly as good to open the chest as the dumb-bells—but in a general restlessness and fidgetiness of person, the result of his ardent and nervous temperament, which can hardly endure repose of mind or body. He neither gives rest nor takes it. His company is, indeed, in one sense—only one—fatiguing. Listening to him tires you like a journey. You laugh till you are forced to lie down. The medical gentlemen of the place are aware of this, and are accustomed to exhort delicate patients to abstain from Harry's society, just as they caution them against temptations in point of amusement or of diet—pleasant, but dangerous. Cholerick gentlemen should always avoid him, and such as love to have the last word; for, though never provoked himself, I cannot deny that he is occasionally tolerably provoking—in politics especially—and he is an ultra-liberal, quotes Cobbett, and goes rather too far—in politics he loves to put his antagonist in a fume, and generally succeeds, though it is nearly the only subject on which he ever listens to an answer—chiefly, I believe, for the sake of a reply, which is commonly some trenchant repartee, that cuts off the poor answer's head like a razor. Very determined speakers would also do well to eschew his company—though in general I never met with any talker to whom other talkers were so ready to give way; perhaps because he keeps them in such incessant laughter, that they are not conscious of their silence. To himself the number of his listeners is altogether unimportant. His speech flows not from vanity or lust of praise, but from sheer necessity; the reservoir is full, and runs over. When he has no one else to talk to, he can be content with his own company, and talks to himself, being beyond a doubt greater in soliloquy than any man off the stage. Where he is not known, this habit sometimes occasions considerable consternation and very ridiculous mistakes. He has been taken alternately for an actor, a poet, a man in love, and a man beside himself. Once in particular, at Windsor, he greatly alarmed a philanthropic sentinel, by holding forth at his usual rate whilst pacing the terrace alone; and but for the opportune arrival of his party, and their assurances that it was only “the gentleman's way,” there was some danger that the benevolent soldier might have been tempted to desert his post to take care of him. Even after this explanation, he gazed with a doubtful eye at our friend, who was haranguing himself in great style, sighed and shook his head, and finally implored us to look well after him till he should be safe off the terrace. “You see, madam,” observed the philanthropist in scarlet, “it is an awkward place for any body troubled with vagaries. Suppose the poor soul should take a fancy to jump over the wall?”

In his externals he is a well-looking gentleman of forty, or thereabouts; rather thin and rather pale, but with no appearance of ill-health, nor any other peculiarity, except the remarkable circumstance of the lashes of one eye being white, which gives a singular non-resemblance to his organs of vision. Every one perceives the want of uniformity, and few detect the cause. Some suspect him of what farriers call a wall-eye; some think he squints. He himself talks familiarly of his two eyes, the black and the white, and used to liken them to those of our fine Persian cat—now, alas! no more—who had, in common with his feline countrymen, one blue as a sapphire, the other yellow as a topaz. The dissimilarity certainly rather spoils his beauty, but greatly improves his wit—I mean the sense of his wit in others. It arrests attention, and predisposes to laughter; is an outward and visible sign of the comical. No common man has two such eyes. They are made for fun.

In his occupations and pleasures Harry is pretty much like other provincial gentlemen; loves a rubber, and jests all through, at aces, kings, queens, and knaves, bad cards and good, at winning and losing, scolding and praise; loves a play, at which he out-talks the actors whilst on the stage—to say nothing of the advantage he has over them in the intervals between the acts—loves music, as a good accompaniment to his grand solo—loves a contested election above all. That is his real element—that din and uproar, and riot and confusion! To ride that whirlwind and direct that storm is his triumph of triumphs! He would make a great sensation in parliament himself, and a pleasant one.—By the way, he was once in danger of being turned out of the gallery for setting all around him in a roar.—Think what a fine thing it would be for the members to have mirth introduced into the body of the house! to be sure of an honest, hearty, good-humoured laugh during the session! Besides, Harry is an admirable speaker, in every sense of the word. Jest is indeed his forte, because he wills it so to be; and therefore, because he chooses to play jigs and country-dances on a noble organ, even some of his stanchest admirers think he can play nothing else. There is no quality of which men so much grudge the reputation as versatility of talent. Because he is so humorous, they will hardly allow him to be eloquent; and, because he is so very witty, find it difficult to account him wise. But let him go where he has not that mischievous fame, or let him bridle his jests and rein in his humour only for one short hour, and he will pass for a most reverend orator—logical, pathetic, and vigorous above all. But how can I wish him to cease jesting even for an hour? Who would exchange the genial fame of good-humoured wit for the stern reputation of wisdom? Who would choose to be Socrates, if with a wish he could be Harry L.?

People of little religion are always noisy. He who has not the love of God and man filling his breast, is like an empty wagon coming violently down a hill; it makes a great noise because there is nothing in it.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Temperance Society.—It is probably known to most of our readers, that a number of gentlemen in this city, of great respectability, have entered into a voluntary association to discourage, by example and precept, the habitual use of ardent spirits even in moderate quantities. The motives which have avowedly led to this institution are of the purest and most benevolent character, and its successful influence, if properly and modestly exercised, is likely to be attended with the most beneficial and gratifying results. Intemperance is a crying evil in many parts of our land, felling, with its deadly stroke, the mightiest intellects and most powerful frames; rending asunder the ties of domestic happiness, and introducing everywhere anarchy, disorder, and an utter disregard of all laws, human and divine. The most towering genius, once touched by its withering and benumbing power, dwindles down, and decays into the most helpless imbecility. Affections the most amiable, morals the most pure and expansive, become soured and debased, and finally brutalized. Decorum is outraged, the peace of society is broken, and the love of kindred, natural to man, and as necessary to his moral and social, as air and food are to his physical being, is turned into gall and bitter hate. Wife, children, friends—all are alike the subjects of vituperation and violence; and fortunate will it be if they are not the victims of an unbridled and demoniac passion. What is the end of all this? If, for some rash and thoughtless act, the law overtake not the slave of intemperance, the drunken mania awaits him, to convulse him in its horrible grasp, and consign him, palsied in mind and body, to an untimely and unlamented grave. In the language of the report of the managers of the society, “What consternation pervades the city at the sight of a mad dog! The legislature of the state, a few years ago, voted a liberal reward for the disclosure of a doubtful remedy against hydrophobia. The existence of a solitary case of this formidable disease fills our whole community with terror; and how do the evils of hydrophobia compare with those of intemperate drinking? Is the disease more terrible, or does it lead to a more horrid death, than delirium tremens? Let those answer who have treated both. Ten drunken maniacs were, a short time since, received into our hospital at Bellevue, in a single week—a greater number than have died in our city of hydrophobia in fifty years.” The report further states, and very truly, that “Intemperance is filling our almshouse with paupers, our hospitals with patients, our asylums with madmen, our penitentiaries with criminals, and our streets with vagrants.” Such, undoubtedly, is the evil, and so great is its amount. What then, is the remedy? Total abstinence, say the society. Of the efficacy of this application no one will be found to doubt. Of its practicable acceptance in all cases, very many will. Men may have some member of their body deformed, or which does them injury, and lopping it off is a sovereign cure; but will they consent? That's the question. And we leave it to the society to determine it, sincerely and devoutly hoping that their labours may be crowned with success in the laudable attempt they are making for the improvement of their fellow beings. Some will be found who question their motives; some who will doubt the efficiency or general applicability of the means of prevention they propose; others who will condemn their drawing oppressive and useless lines of distinction in society; and others again, who will, with no small share of plausibility, decry all attempts at voluntary associations to promote desired changes, as calculated to raise a few into notice and distinction, and throw over them the mantle of pre-eminent virtue and sanctity; but all will approve of the object aimed at, and rejoice in its accomplishment.

The North American Review for April.—We always look forward with pleasing anticipations to the appearance of each successive number of this long-established and justly popular review. Modest and unassuming in its tone, impartial and correct in its opinions, and chaste and unexceptionable in its style, it has recommended itself to the favour of the public in this country, and the approbation of the enlightened litterateurs in Europe. It has been charged with a deficiency of that sparkling spirit which gives zest and animation to its trimestrial contemporaries of London and Edinburgh. Let the charge be admitted, it will be found that in proportion to the amount of flash wanting, is the extent of froth and flippancy also absent. In lieu of these superficial charms, calculated to catch the applause of the injudicious, it possesses a tone of sound morality, political sagacity, and pure taste in letters, for which we may often look in vain in its more pretending and bold rivals. It is now twenty-six years since this journal was established, and the continued support with which it has been favoured, is a decisive argument in favour of its high claims, and a no less decisive proof of the liberality and enlightened state of the people of this country. New rivals have sprung up at home, under the most formidable auspices; but we cannot believe that the North American Review will ever be deprived of its extensive patronage so long as it continues to be conducted on the principles which have hitherto governed its editors. The present editor, Mr. Sparks, is abroad, engaged on the interesting mission of collating documents illustrative of the life of our great Washington; he is said, however, not to be inattentive to the concerns of the review. The present number contains thirteen articles, of which the most interesting are, College Education, Ancient and Modern History, Pollock's Course of Time, Civilization and Conversion of the Indians, Pelham, the Louisiana Treaty, Webster's Dictionary, Elementary Instruction, Clerical Manners and Habits, &c. The remarks on college education are peculiarly interesting, pregnant with information on the systems of instruction pursued and proper to be adopted in this country, as applicable to the wants and modifications of society. The compliment paid to Mr. Brougham, for his zeal and active efforts to improve the education of the lower classes, is well merited and well expressed. Classical education is treated of in a spirit of great liberality and candour, and its advantages enforced with pertinent and unanswerable argument. The whole number will amply repay attention.

Waverley Novels.—The literary public will be gratified to learn that Sir Walter Scott is on the eve of publishing a new and complete edition of these popular works, revised in the most careful manner by himself, and rendered more valuable by the addition of descriptive and historical details. In an advertisement published in the English papers, he has pledged himself to this task, and has also promised to make no material alterations in the threads of the narrative, or the identity of the individual characters. Redundancies of expression, feeble or superfluous passages, such as the haste incident to the great demand for each successive novel did not allow him to correct at the period of original publication, will be expunged. It is also proposed to illustrate some of the most interesting scenes with appropriate engravings by the very first masters, so that the edition will altogether be the most complete and beautiful one which has yet made its appearance. We hope that sufficient encouragement will be held out to some of our enterprising booksellers to reprint it in this country, in a style commensurate with the permanent and high character of the work.

The Critic, by William Leggett, Esq.—We are glad to perceive that the enterprising editor of this literary miscellany will be enabled, by the success which has hitherto crowned his labours, to commence a second volume. This is, in itself, a distinction for a literary journal in the city of New-York, and gives promise of a goodly life. The Critic is admitted, on all hands, to be a well conducted and spirited work, and has, with some few exceptions, to which it is not necessary now to recur, pronounced its opinions with equal fairness, justice, and elegance. It has our best wishes for its success, and if encouraged as it should be by students and scholars generally, will undoubtedly prove a valuable resource to its persevering and intelligent editor.

Mrs. Barbauld's Hymns, No. 1.—Miss Elizabeth Oram, the editor of this little tract, has, with a most praiseworthy industry, arranged, analyzed, and explained the beautiful hymns composed by Mrs. Barbauld, with a view to awaken devotional feelings in the minds of children as early as possible; and she intends continuing her efforts in future numbers. The hymns are divided into such portions as may be easily retained in the memory, and then explained by questions and answers appended; all ideas are defined, and such other subjects introduced as may develop the infant faculties of the mind, and direct them to proper objects. We cannot commend this work in terms sufficiently strong, to the heads of all families and schools. Its success, we trust, will be commensurate with the value and merit of the design.

The Irish Shield and Monthly Milesian.—This is the title of a new journal lately commenced in this city by Mr. George Pepper, with the commendable object of diffusing among his countrymen a correct knowledge of the history, topography, literature, and politics of unfortunate, and hitherto oppressed Ireland. A more appropriate time for the success of such a work, ably conducted, could not have been selected. The zeal of Irishmen in favour of the recovery of the rights of their brethren at home—withheld during so long a period of suffering—has never been so great as at present; and the prospect of success held forth by the last advices, will give no ordinary zest to whatever relates to the subject of Catholic emancipation. In the success of the cause none feel more warmly interested than ourselves; and as a means of promoting it, we cheerfully recommend the Irish Shield to the general patronage of all who sympathize in the sufferings, and anticipate with pleasure the regeneration, of one of the fairest portions of the globe.

Dissections.—Few subjects have engaged the public mind to a greater extent than that of dissections of the human body, as necessary to the improvement of anatomical and medical knowledge. The deficiency existing in the laws of this country, as of most others, and owing to a false notion or prejudice entertained on the subject by the populace, has undoubtedly led to the atrocities referred to in the following article from the London Atlas. In its conclusions we cordially agree:

"We give, in our present number, full details of the atrocious case of Burke, the murderer, who, for the price given by the anatomists for the bodies of his victims, deliberately murdered several isolated and wretched fellow-creatures. The commentaries of the daily papers, which run into absurd theories upon the constitution of crime, and the aptitude of emigrant Irishmen to commit it, we do not give, because we cannot pander to that vicious appetite which gloats upon scenes of a disgusting and revolting nature. We have but one object in publishing this case so amply; it is not to feed idle curiosity, or to nourish that debasing taste for horrors, which can convert passing villainies into the startling periods of romance—our object is to lay before the country one of those unanswerable appeals, which, more than a thousand arguments, calls loudly for some legislative protection for the science of anatomy. If Burke's terrible history has not the effect of producing a legitimate remedy for this evil, if it does not force from parliament some legal means of providing subjects for dissection, then science may despair, and murder will again become the refuge of the abandoned and the unconscious agent of the student and the lecturer."

Pauperism.—After relieving the urgent necessities of the needy, feeding them when hungry, clothing them when naked, and supplying them with fuel when shivering and perishing with cold, the next duty of the good citizen is to prevent, as far as in his power lies, a recurrence of the evil, and to enable the objects of his charity to assist him in this useful effort. Now that the rigour of the season has abated, and the severe snow-storm yielded its benumbing and withering influence to the more genial showers of early spring, this duty becomes imperative, and calls loudly on the good people of this city to strain every moral and intellectual nerve for the adoption of an effective plan, by which the heart-rending and distressing scenes of the past season may no more be renewed amongst us. To fulfil the objects of benevolence, it is not sufficient that we exercise an indiscriminate charity. We should beware lest we hold out a lure and a temptation to the idle and the dissolute to indulge their vicious propensities, in the firm assurance that, when the day of woe arrives, their cries and supplications will be listened to and granted. Means should be devised to reform the habits of the poor, to inspire their minds with a becoming ambition and love of independence, to stimulate them to industry, and deter them from the pursuit of vicious indulgences. Employment may easily be furnished, by an institution formed for the purpose, to all those who are, by some unforeseen or unfortunate cause, put out of the way of procuring a livelihood. And habits of continued industry will enable them to supply their wants, and those of their dependent families. The aged, the helpless, and the sick, are, under all circumstances, to be provided for and relieved; but the young, and the robust, and the healthy, are to be subjected to discipline and scrutiny. The same amount which has been so generously, freely, and almost instantaneously bestowed by the public upon objects of actual distress, would be almost sufficient to carry such a plan into effect; and its disposition in this manner would, in all probability, render a recurrence of demands on the public purse less and less necessary.

A second means of preventing pauperism, and its host of attendant evils, is the withdrawing of temptation by public authority and license, from the lower classes, who often squander their hard-earned wages on the support of those nuisances—the dram-shops. Judge Edwards very pertinently observes, in one of his late charges to a criminal sentenced to death, and whose guilt was the consequence of intoxication, that, "if it is a crime to tempt, as well as to be tempted, how can those hope to escape moral retribution who hold forth lures to intemperance, and, by assisting to overthrow the reason of the vicious, prepare them for the work of iniquity?" We call, then, upon those citizens who are compelled to follow the trade of selling liquor by retail, to look upon the awful responsibilities which they incur whenever they administer to the intemperate appetites of the lowest among their fellow-men, the drunkard by profession. Many of the grocers are respectable men, and to such our appeal is worse than useless, as they would, equally with ourselves, frown upon any attempt to introduce vicious examples into their establishments. It is to the smaller store-keepers, who occupy public corners of easy access to the multitude, and who, led away by the love of gain, too frequently overlook their true and permanent interest, and bury conscientious scruples in a golden oblivion. The day of retribution will arrive, and heavy must it fall on some. Are not those somewhat to blame who authorize such misconduct, and who calmly and indifferently view the dreadful advancement of crime and beggary in this city?

The Jail again.—Can it be possible? Are we indeed to witness so great a sacrifice of self-willed obstinacy on the part of those who have so long opposed the demolition of this building, "not without architectural beauties?" Is it indeed to be razed to the ground? We hope so, for the honour of the city. There is a proposition, as the daily papers inform us, before the common council, to extend Cross-street to Chatham, and to build up the addition with fine three story houses, &c. It is also contemplated to extend the city-hall—to brush away the "five points" from the map of New-York, and erect a bridewell on its site. Happy and appropriate change! These questions, be it remembered, are all under discussion as yet, and many a glass of champagne, and cup of young hyson, must be quaffed, before any decision—that is—any wise or prudent decision, can be had upon the subject. This is right. It were, indeed, a strange departure from the good old customs of the lordly and sage burgomasters—who, in times of yore, wielded the destinies, and disposed of the gable-ends of New-Amsterdam, and who smoked, we forget how many hundred pipes before they passed any resolution, just as our legislatures require a bill to be read so many times before it is passed, in order that there may be no mistake about its having been read—if our common council were in too great haste—say in six meetings—to dispose of questions so intimately connected with the prosperity of the present and future generation, as the demolition of the jail, the opening of Cross-street, or the extension of the iron-railing round the Park!

Archibald Gracie, Esq.—The death of this distinguished merchant is calculated to awaken the most lively regrets, and melancholy retrospections. Possessed of an acute and intelligent mind, an expansive and benevolent heart, an integrity the most unshaken, and a knowledge of commerce seldom paralleled, and equal to the most arduous and extensive enterprises, it was the lot of Mr. Gracie to see a house built up by his own industry and perseverance, engaged in the most distant relations, and elevated to a pitch of respectability unsurpassed in this country, levelled to the ground, through the inevitable agency of lamentable causes, over which neither prudence, nor sagacity, nor the most ample resources, could exercise control. It is gratifying to find that the same respect and veneration for his character which had added lustre to the days of his golden prosperity, continued to shed their cheering influence over his old age, and that, amidst the trying reverses, "honour, obedience, troops of friends," followed him unto the day of his death, and until the last sad rites had been paid unto his lamented remains.

Fire in Augusta.—The particulars of the awful conflagration in Augusta have appeared in the papers, and it is to be hoped they will produce a proper impression on the well known generosity of our citizens. While so many foreign and doubtful claims are eagerly listened to and satisfied, let us not forget that charity begins at home, and that our fellow-citizens are also entitled to a share of our munificence.

ARRANGED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, WITH ACCOMPANIMENTS FOR THE PIANO FORTE.

THE SUN THAT LIGHTS THE ROSES.

BRILLIANT.

Though dimple cheeks may give de-light Where ri-val beauties blos-som, Though bal-my lips to love in-vite, To ec-sta-cy the bo-som; Yet sof-ter than yon summer's sky Each blushing tint dis-closes: Give me the lus-tre-beaming eye, The sun that lights the ro-ses, The sun that lights the ro-ses, the sun that lights the ro-ses; Give me the lus-tre-beam-ing eye, The sun that lights the ro-ses.

The voice of love is soft and clear,
Exciting fond emotion;

How sweet it sounds upon the ear,
Like music on the ocean!

Yet dearer far to lover's sight
The eye that truth discloses,

Surpassing, with its splendour bright,
"The sun that lights the roses!"

TO JULIETTE.

"Thou lovedst me
Too much, as I loved thee."

We met in youth,
When its first light was in thy kindling eye,
When Love's wing glittered in the azure sky,
In holiest truth.

We met—to dream—
While a brief spell was o'er existence flung,
When hope was brightest early hours among—
O'er being's stream.

I have looked back
On the deep glory of that hallowed time,
On the rich gladness of our morning-prime—
A flowery track.

Oh, young delight
Shed a sweet vision on the enchanted brain,
Too pure for life, too blest to come again
With pictures bright.

Yet—still its ray
Lingers in memory, like the dying sun,
Ere its deep gold, from twilight's cloud of dun,
Hath passed away.

And in my heart
The influence of that early dream remains,
As the snow-mountains on the Italian plains
Sun-gleams impart.

Though it hath gone,
Though the rapt feelings of that early scene
Are as their blessing ne'er for me had been—
Spring-warblers, flown!

Yet, yet my soul
Turns through life's faded hours, fond one! to thee;
Sharer of joy, partaker of the glee
O'er youth that stole.

Let me gaze on—
Turning time's leaves, as of a pleasant book,
O'er which 'tis rapture and delight to look,
Though not mine own—

Its pictured sky,
Hallowed with music, glittering with wings,
Of young hope's gay and many-coloured things,
Brightening on high:

The smile—the kiss—
The rosy mouth, where vows in balm came forth,
Like the spring's voice, which melts the frozen north,
Breathing of bliss:

These linger yet,
With chastened light, to memory's pensive eye,
Which backward glances to love's early sky,
Whose sun hath set.

TO THYRZA.

"Oh mayst thou ever be what now thou art,
Nor unbecome the promise of thy spring;
"As fair in form, as warm, yet pure in heart;
"Love's image upon earth, without his wing;
"And guileless beyond hope's imagining!"

Thou hast passed, like spring, to a brighter glow,
As the summer-tide of thy young dreams flow;
Or a bud that breaks into perfect bloom,
When the young year leaps from its wintry tomb.
There's a softer light in that kindling eye,
Like the tranquil hue of an autumn sky,
When the rainbow is pictured on sober trees,
And the reaper's song is upon the breeze.

Thou art gliding on, like a thrilling song,
As it floats June's eloquent leaves among,
When the boughs, and leaves, and flowers are stirred
By the winds which gladden the bounding bird;
And thy heart is light as the field of air,
Thy hope's young bower is still as fair
As when life's first spring to thy sight was given,
And thy rapt soul joyed in the hues of heaven.

There is not a care in thy sinless breast,
Nor a pang to sadden thy couch of rest;
And thy rose-leaf cheek on its pillow lies,
With slumber's seal on thy soft-closed eyes—
And the white lids droop, like the spotless fold
Of a spring-cloud over the sky unrolled;
While a gale has paused from its pathway fair,
To rest in the waves of thy clustering hair.

I have wandered back to that early day
When I first beheld thee, 'mid flowers, at play;
'Twas a rich May morn, in a meadow scene,
Where a blue stream sang to its banks of green;
The light of joy was upon thy brow,
And thy young cheek flushed like the rose's glow;
Thou wert roaming there in thy first bright years,
A stranger to sorrow, a novice in tears.

Yet the spring can glow but a little day,
Ere its gales and its flowers will pass away;
Though her birds rich offerings of music bring,
Yet they flit away on the truant wing;
Though the summer comes with its ripening glee,
With its leaves and streamlets glancing free,
Yet they yield to the autumn and winter blast—
So death to all blossoms will stand at last! EVERARD.

THE SILENT LYRE.

Sweet spirit! if the lyre be mute
Thou, dying, didst to me resign,
'Tis that my feelings will not suit
The chords that rung in joy to thine.
For never shall thy notes of gladness
Degenerate into sounds of sadness.

Or if, at eve's soft hour, again
I take it from the willow tree,
It is to try that witching strain,
Inspired by love and sung by thee;
That strain still brightening, and revealing
The bosom's holiest shrine of feeling.

But no—as thou, my hope, art gone;
For all is lost in losing thee—
Songless as those of Babylon,
I'll leave it on that willow tree.
For better are the chords forsaken
Thy magic fingers cannot waken.

TO A BUTTERFLY.

BY WORDSWORTH.

Stay near me—do not take thy flight;
A little longer stay in sight:
Much converse do I find in thee,
Historian of my infancy!
Float near me; do not yet depart:
Dead times revive in thee:
Thou bring'st, gay creature as thou art,
A solemn image to my heart,
My father's family!
Oh! pleasant, pleasant were the days,
The time, when, in our childish plays,
My sister Emmeline and I
Together chased the butterfly!
A very hunter did I rush
Upon the prey, with leaps and springs
I followed on from brake to bush;
But she, God love her! feared to brush
The dust from off its wings.

PART I.

"Know, then, that there are met and sworn in secret
"A band of brethren, valiant hearts and true,
"Men who have proved all fortunes, and have long
"Grieved over that of Venice, and have right
"To do so."

INDEPENDENT of the claim which the unbroken residence of his family for generations in the same parish had given him, the fame of Ned Neville, as a provider of "entertainment for man and horse," had travelled a circle of some miles, and attracted the Sunday politicians and pleasure-going folks of the neighbourhood to his caravansera. It was the only one in the village, being too popular for competition: rival after rival drooped and perished when once within the upas boundary of his hereditary popularity; and yet he was humble and accommodating to a proverb. Unlike the majority of his joyous profession, Ned never transacted his business by proxy; he was always at his bar, attended in person to his customers, and distributed to them his beer and his joke together. From the lip of any other his joke had probably passed unobserved, but every one of Ned's melted into the beverage, like Cleopatra's pearl, enhancing its value and enriching its flavour. This effect is explained by stating that when, on Sundays and holidays, the parishioners waited the arrival of their officiating clergyman—some grouped against the chapel-wall, and others leaning on the green hedges, from which a multitude of primroses lifted up their golden heads—no person was distinguished by him with an earlier shake of the hand than Ned, dressed as he was in his blue coat, red waistcoat, and bright buckskin small clothes, to which it is but justice to add the light blue stockings, that projected from each other the more effectively to display the silver buckles at their base. This piece of vanity was a particular favourite with him; but we must observe, that the leg was his only ostentatious limb, and that this vanity dreamed away the ordinary days of the week on the same shelf with the buckles, for they too were holiday costume.

It would be difficult to find a more industrious and harder-working class of people than the peasantry of the south of Ireland; hence probably their long observed and still existing habit of spending the Sunday in physical as well as spiritual exercise. Some, at the termination of their devotions, rendezvous outside the chapel-gate, and while away the day in dry conversation; others prefer to irrigate their's at some ale-house, whose proprietor, observing on the severity of spring labours, complains there are not sufficient Sundays in the year. Many leave the road to wager a leap across some field-foss, and many remain to have a game at bowls. For all, however, Sunday is like that bird of the east which spends its existence between heaven and earth, just sufficiently elevated to feel all the sunshine of the skies, and sufficiently low to enjoy all the fragrance of the flowers.

It was Sunday, and Ned Neville's bar-room, fresh from its hebdomadal cleansing, was in comfortable readiness for the accommodation of his visitors. The day, which had been hazy and disagreeable, closed in an evening of much clearness and beauty; the sun had gone down, "gleaming in purple and gold," and from the opposite quarter of the sky the moon sent her faint and timid light along Saint George's Channel. As the evening darkened, her beam grew brighter, and at length rising over "the common mountain," swept away its huge shadow from the little avenue that led to the already crowded dwelling of Ned Neville. Indeed, so very numerous were the visitors, that the village-school was emptied of its forms by the preceptor for their accommodation; and they were motley as numerous; of all ages, sizes and sexes. In one corner, some professional match-maker—for here matrimonial connexions are discussed, the merits of both parties canvassed, and the final arrangement made by hired agency—was eulogizing the comeliness and usefulness of the blushing maid, and replying to the arguments of the opposite—though not opposing—counsel, while the parents, with a battalion of friends, waited the decision, and scarcely ventured to ask or offer an additional fraction to appease his scruples. At another end, a crowd of young and old listened with various emotions, while the village barber, with progressive commentary, read, from some well-preserved newspaper, the successes or disasters of the rebel army, or in turn heard, from some fearless fellow who had joined it, the increase of its numbers, the importance of that increase, the probable projects of its leaders, and the national benefits of their success.

While various groups were thus variously engaged, Ned Neville, attracted to his door by the clatter of hoofs, was discharging the duties of host and groom to a stranger who wished for refreshment and repose. Before he entered, however, he saw that his horse had been comfortably stabled, and then returned with Ned. The latter, with the characteristic quality of his countrymen, proffered the stranger the warmest of his corners and the best of his food; but he declined the latter, and preferred the society of the assembled crowd to the comfort of the former. Had the stranger entered the room alone, he would have probably sat unobserved; but his host bustled in before him, and, with a desire to confer some honourable distinction, placed him beside the schoolmaster, who was decidedly the most learned and respectable man there. The large beer-vessel that stood on the table, and from which all invariably drank, was instantly presented to him, and he cordially drank to all around. He joined in their conversation, leaned to their opinions, spoke flatteringly of the insurrection, applauded the noble spirit of its originators, and hoped the people would not desert them. All in turn lauded the familiar kindness of the stranger, and heard him from a fresh flaggon drink to the national cause.

"Come, Russell," said the schoolmaster, the conversation becoming less lively, "let us have that song you composed, 'twill match this gentleman here right well—throw it out to us." And Russell, after a few preliminary modulations, testified, in a song, of which the following is a pretty correct translation, that the disturber had not been either idle or unsuccessful among the villagers:

SONG.

Your banner is bright as the sun in your fountains,
Proudly and bravely the war-beacon shines,
To call from your valleys, your shores and your mountains,
The pride of your fathers, the strength of your lines.
Heard ye the thunder's might—
Saw ye the billows' flight—
Saw ye the lightning when night hath no star?
Louder and thicker,
And fiercer and quicker,
The hosts of the foe come up to the war.
As speak of a king with his purple and sceptre,
His crown and his conquest, his pomp and his power:
Our land has obeyed one; how long have we wept her:
The lovely, the lonely, the perishing flower!
Oh! had our falchion's length
Half of its olden strength,
Bold were the Saxon would breast its career:
How would his thousands then
Shriek from our battled men,
Hope in our bosom and strength in our spear!
Come, sons of the strong ones, ye fighters for freedom,
And catch from their ashes one spark of their fire;
Bring out your people—we've heroes to lead them,
In freedom to breathe, or in glory expire.
Soon shall the Saxon hear
Erin's wild mountaineer
Triumph and pride to his fathers proclaim;
Soon shall the mountain's cry
Echo to earth and sky,
"Britain shall blast not the flower of our fame."

The applause that succeeded was an assent to its opinions, and before they separated, an administered oath had gathered a considerable portion into the insurrectionary-fold. Among those who had thus bravely but uncalculatingly resolved to join in the perilous enterprise of that period, was a young man, who, from the respectability of his family connexions, and his supposed influence among the peasantry of this neighbourhood, was considered a valuable acquisition. As his subsequent fortunes are prominently interwoven with this narrative, a succinct relation of the circumstances that led to this resolution may not be uninteresting.

But few years had elapsed since the father of Charles Desmond was in comparative affluence, and the enjoyment of such domestic happiness as the regret occasioned by the recent death of his wife, but somewhat alleviated by the virtues of an only son, permitted him. A speculation, however, in the contraband trade, which is still, even by men of repute, carried on with various result among the bold and perilous creeks along the Irish coast, eventuated in the seizure of a valuable cargo. The gambler will hazard another cast to recover his loss; so did Desmond, but with no better fortune—his capital was gone, his credit destroyed, and the hopes of years blasted for ever. In vain did he endeavour to stem the torrent of destruction; in vain did he place a fairer prospective before the eye of Charles, and prop his heart with a hope which he too well knew to be illusory. Misfortune followed misfortune as wave follows wave, and a rapid decline, which, from the moment that removed him from his place of independence, was sapping his constitution, terminated a life of but few years.

Charles was now left "lord of himself—that heritage of woe." His age had not yet exceeded its minority, but still he felt with a deep and dangerous sensibility his solitude and destitution. The former he had hitherto sought and loved for its glens and groves, where nature seldom listened to any other than the music of her own voice; but now he sought and loved it as an asylum from the communion of a world which his observations had supposed and his recent reverses had concluded to be "but a worthless world to win or lose." Here, in the bosom of his native glen, Charles spent the interval between the death of his father and the night of political revelry, to which we have just alluded. This interval might be about two years; during which time his ascetic habits, unyielding to the solicitations of the one or two acquaintances whom he casually met, had made his name a subject of frequent commentary in the village. The aged shook their heads with a most prophetic emphasis, and ascribed his disregard of the world to a confirmed misanthropy; and the young regretted that such a feeling should have deprived their circle of its fondest and lightest heart.

About this time—the parental vigilance of the government having placed the county under military protection—various excesses were committed. Complaint was treason—suspicion was evidence—the scales were dashed from the hands of justice, and her sword was crimsoned with the blood of innocence; property was disregarded; beauty was dishonoured; and manhood was immolated. As these outrages were more frequently repeated with the growing excitement of the times, their consequences became more extensively felt, and they whom innocence could not, and law would not protect, willingly embraced the opportunity afforded by the arrival of the stranger we have mentioned, to seek redress or revenge in the revolutionary ranks. The mind of Charles Desmond was sensitive, and the surrounding and increasing disasters being, as he inferred, rather the effect of cabinet intrigue than popular disaffection, awakened in him that spirit of noble resentment which, in other days, armed the hand of Brutus against Cæsar, and in ours strengthened the virtuous Washington to pluck its richest jewel from the British diadem. Charles, though weighed down by the pressure of his own misfortunes, could not witness those of his country with the cold-blooded indifference of her oppressors; he sought an interview with the itinerant leader, and thenceforth linked his future fortunes with those of that country. His native valley was no longer trodden by Charles Desmond; the world had received him into its treacherous vortex. He felt as yet dispirited and dissatisfied at his sudden transition from calm to tumult; but the continual changes of purpose and situation, produced by the fluctuating interests of the cause, together with the society and fearlessness of more experienced spirits, soon quieted his mind, and losing the timidity of the child when he first fluds himself upon the ocean, he soon became the playmate of danger.

The system of the disaffected was at this time in full and powerful action; the torch had been applied to the inflammable material of the Irish mind—the mind that never looks at danger through a magnifying-glass. Not a city, town, or village, was unregistered as the seat of supplementary operations, and plain and mountain trembled under the march of advancing volunteers. The continued severity of British legislation was preached to them from lips touched with the fire of inspiration, by men whom the chain had maddened, and a deep-rooted sense of suffering had endowed, in a peculiar degree, with the spirit of conviction. Under the influence of these frequent appeals to their feelings, and to those objects which the eloquence of Ireland so pre-eminently controls—their passions—the multitude became fierce, but they were weak; fearless, but they were undisciplined. Yet were they willing to sacrifice every thing to escape from political death, and to bequeath to their children the blessings of national regeneration. In the society of the leaders Charles had now so deeply imbibed those principles which professed a desire of universal enfranchisement, that the smouldering relics of his earlier fears were completely extinguished. The chivalric idea of being instrumental in achieving the redemption of his country filled him with delight, and so enamoured did he become of the spellword,

“Liberty,” that he would have enrolled himself under any standard on which he could behold,

“Unfurl’d,
“Those words of sunshine—Freedom to the world.”

A field for the practical demonstration of his courage was not long wanted. Flushed and invigorated by their recent victory at Wexford, the “rebel” troops had determined to attack and possess themselves of the town of New-Ross. Previous to the commencement of operations a council was convened, to which Charles had been summoned. He at this time resided at some distance from the appointed rendezvous, and the weather, hitherto so very fair, became suddenly unfit for travelling, lightnings and thunders flashed and roared as though they exulted over the consummation of all things; but his desire to act his part without imputation, on a matter which was likely, as the event has proved it, to be of vast importance to the cause of his exertions, laughed at difficulty. In the thunder’s roar he heard but the voice of his country’s vengeance, and in the lightning’s flash beheld the banner that led him to the ranks of her redeemers. To pursue the success of their arms was the result of the council, and the “rebel” army was led upon the town of New-Ross on the morning of the fifth of June. A surrender was demanded by them, but the reply was the murder of their envoy, Furlong. This was decisive; the “rebels” crowded upon the town, and silencing a smart opposition, drove in the piquets and outposts of the royal forces. They then entered, and the cavalry, who committed dreadful havoc among them, were soon obliged to retire before the vigorous and fearless attack of the pikemen.

That portion of the Irish troops which Charles Desmond, as captain, commanded, advanced with a steady and intrepid step toward the main guard, whence the royalists opened a mortal artillery fire against them, under which they fell like corn under the blade of the reaper. Still they poured onward, inspirited by his active exertions; but with such murdering effect did the cannon-shot sweep the street, that each succeeding rank may be said to have fallen on the remains of the first company. As Charles advanced and beheld the increasing pile of carnage, the flush produced by the heat of action and weather forsook his cheek. He seemed for a moment to hesitate; but the time for calculation was past; death raved before, and thousands, whom another moment’s indecision might have robbed of the chance of victory and life, poured on behind. The first were the inevitable consequences of a retreat; the latter, the at least possible result of a fearless and well-directed attack.

Sudden as the change produced by enchantment, his wonted self-possession resumed its ascendancy. “Forward, my boys!” he cried, with a voice audible above the roar of the defence. “Remember Wexford and Walpole, Ireland and victory!” The thunder of a thousand voices replied, and the rattle of their musketry offered up an ample sacrifice to the manes of their dead. Charles cheered them on with his voice, and darting like lightning along the ranks, filled every heart with the electric spirit of his valorous example; and as his column advanced to the mortal barrier of the dead and dying, took his place at its head, exclaiming, “The eyes of the world are on you, bondage or freedom is in your hands—fire!” and as he uttered the last word, he fell!

FRENCH PERIODICALS.—The circulation of newspapers in France since the peace has increased at least two-fold; and in some of the provinces the number of political and scientific journals is in the proportion of five to one of what it used to be. An official return is preparing of all the periodical works now published in France, with the numbers which they circulate. It is supposed that this is doing for the purpose of ascertaining the amount which a small additional tax upon them would produce to the government.

SKETCHES FROM LIFE.

THE BACHELOR.

(Concluded.)

THE consequence of these reflections is evident. Henry gave himself up to love, with scarcely an idea that he was building his own happiness on the wreck of his friend’s. Daily did he visit Gertrude, unprohibited by his generous friend, who determined not to assert his rights until the end of the year. Gertrude found in Henry many accomplishments, of which she had lamented the want in Charles: his flute could accompany her piano, his pencil could correct her drawings, and his manly voice accompanied hers in a chord of melting sweetness through all the melody of her favourite songs. She began to know the difference in her feelings towards Charles and him. She was glad to see the one, but she anxiously looked for the other. She could gaze without embarrassment in the face of Charles; but if, by chance, she encountered the impassioned gaze of Henry, it went to her very soul. In short, at the end of the year, Charles, the noble-minded Charles, after a long and arduous struggle with himself, voluntarily resigned his claims to Gertrude, and generously obtained the consent of all parties to the union of his two friends; and, after witnessing it with a firm eye but almost broken heart, he bestowed upon them a blessing, and accepting the offer of a friend, set sail for India, to forget in other pursuits the being who had mingled in the dreams of his early love, with a radiance which now faded for ever.

At the end of ten years he returned, rich in worldly goods, but colder and more reserved than ever. A well-looking bachelor of thirty-four, he might still have entered the lists of Hymen; but his only object was to discover his friend. He learned from inquiry, that Mr. Campbell had died shortly after the marriage of his daughter, leaving her a handsome fortune; that Mr. and Mrs. Allen, after an extravagant life of about five years, had retired into the country; that he had died within the last six months, insolvent; and that she was living with an aunt of hers, in utter poverty. Almost overwhelmed with this intelligence, but still desiring to make Gertrude his wife, he sought her out; but found her in a state which precluded hope. Through all their misfortunes, they had remained fondly attached to each other; and the death of her beloved husband, joined to constant anxiety, had thrown her into a deep decline, and poor Charles saw that she had not long to live. She expressed great pleasure at seeing him, as great, she said, as she could enjoy in this world; and placing her child in his arms, bade him transfer to it the affection he had borne to her. Merton received the deposit with a holy joy; and he had the satisfaction to know that, through his means, the last moments of his beloved Gertrude had been rendered happy.

We need not say that this child was our own little Gertrude, the heroine of the ball; but it becomes necessary to explain why he was so reluctant to let her go. It must be remembered that Merton was an old bachelor, and bachelors are sometimes apt to forget that they are on the wrong side of forty. He had, for the last seven or eight years, been living in a world of his own. Employed in educating his little charge, as he watched her opening graces, he had imagined himself again the boy of eighteen, and his Gertrude the Gertrude of his early youth. She loved her guardian with an idolizing fondness; she had never mixed with the world; and in educating her as a wife for himself, he fondly thought he was securing her happiness and his own. And what did Gertrude think? Why, to tell the truth, she had never thought much about it. Living secluded, she was as artless as a child, though possessed of the information and accomplishments of a well-educated woman. But by this time the ball is over, and she has returned to her guardian, who, as he listens to her animated account of the adventures of the evening, forgets his fears that some fascinating Henry had again snatched her from him. He bade her good night with a lightened heart, telling her that he was about to depart on a journey, and that he should probably be gone a month. Requesting that she would stay at home as much as possible during his absence, as she had no protector but the good old housekeeper, he again wished her good night, and they separated.

It is four weeks after the ball, and Merton not yet returned. Gertrude is alone in her favourite study. The setting sun shines full upon her window, but, absorbed in thought, she heeds not his rays. Her little bird is warbling his sweetest notes to gain her attention, but her ear is deaf to his melody. The door opens—'tis Merton himself; but she sees him not. He has entered unannounced, that he might surprise his loved ward. Surprised himself at her appearance, he stands for a moment to observe her. She is seated at her desk, her head leaning upon her hand, her dark ringlets carelessly thrown back, and her eyes fixed on vacancy. Advancing nearer to her, she hears his step, looks at him, and, almost shrinking from his proffered embrace, bursts into tears.

"How is this, my precious child? Only one little month absent, and on my return to find you so changed!"

Alas! poor Gertrude! she was indeed changed. She had learned to think, to reason, and to feel: she had studied her own heart, and found in its deep and newly discovered passions stores of misery for the future as well as the present. Forcing a smile through her tears, she would have excused her grief to her guardian; but, with all her acquired knowledge, she had not yet learned deceit, and gently soothing her agitation, Merton easily drew from the blushing girl a full confession of the events of his absence. At the fatal ball she had been introduced to a Mr. Sandford. Pleased with her artless conversation and manners, he had danced with her several times; and, at parting, had begged permission to call on her at her own house. It was granted; and he soon availed himself of it. He was handsome and intelligent. The only son of an opulent father, he had been early introduced into the first circles, and was soon welcomed as an ornament to any company. He had mixed much in the society of ladies, but, fastidious in his choice, his heart had till now remained free. He visited Gertrude frequently for three weeks. In every interview he found her more engaging. He had at first been captivated by her sweet smiles, the sportive vein of wit flowing through her conversation, and the unstudied grace of her movements. But when he fathomed the hidden depths of her character, the purity of her principles, and the naïveté of her disposition, as he hung over her at the piano, listened to her sweet voice, and watched the varied and beautiful changes of her innocent countenance, he felt that Gertrude was destined to be his wife, and the very day of Merton's return he had made her an offer of his heart and hand. She heard him in silence, but his words struck deep into her heart, and awaking from her unconscious dream of bliss, she felt that that heart was gone for ever. Sandford, chilled by the reception of this abrupt disclosure, hurriedly entreated her to tell him if he had interpreted hastily the evident pleasure with which she had received his attentions. "No, dearest Edward, 'tis I alone am wrong. Thoughtless and inconsiderate girl, I have injured the peace of one from whom fate has separated me for ever." The heart-struck Sandford, telling her she should hear from him again, seized his hat and rushed from her presence, and the young Gertrude hopelessly felt that her doom of misery was about to be accomplished.

As Merton listened to this simple story, interrupted as it was by sighs and tears, he felt for a moment at a loss how to act: then, as the thought of past miseries rushed over him, forgetting for a time his generous character, he determined to bid defiance to fate, and make himself happy in the possession of Gertrude. Drawing her closer to him, he rapidly related to her the events of his past life. He told her of the sacrifice of his happiness at the shrine of friendship for her father, bade her remember the dying words of her mother, and drew from the bewildered and romantic girl a promise to be his wife on that day week. He resolved to see Sandford himself, as Gertrude dreaded that an interview with him would be fatal to her determination.

A day or two passed away. She nobly exerted herself to be cheerful; but Merton was restless and unhappy. "Am I," repeated he to himself, "am I right to sacrifice thus this innocent girl for my own pleasure? Should I not be happier to act generously towards her and her estimable lover?" There was a hard struggle between his love for himself and his love for Gertrude. We shall see his decision.

The day of the wedding at last arrived. The company are assembled in the parlour; the Rev. Mr. S. is in attendance, and the bride, splendidly dressed, is waiting in her private study, to be led by the bridegroom to the holy altar. A step is heard on the stairs. Shuddering, she covers her face with her hands, to hide the paleness of her agitated features. "Gertrude," said a soft voice. She raises her eyes. Is it an illusion or reality? Her lover, her adored Edward, is kneeling at her feet. "My own Gertrude, your guardian has told me all. He has nobly resigned you to me, and your voice alone is wanting to confirm my happiness." Need we repeat the answer?

Some years have elapsed since the marriage of the happy pair. Their mansion is situated in a pleasant but retired part of the city. The sweet, playful Gertrude is transformed into the elegant woman. Mr. Sandford is respected and esteemed as a good citizen, an affectionate husband, and judicious parent; and the good old Merton, seated in his comfortable easy-chair, with a little Charles Merton on one knee and a curly-headed Gertrude pulling his grey locks on the other, often declares he is the happiest old bachelor in existence, has the best children in the world, and laughingly vows that the Gertrude of the third generation shall certainly be his wife, and never shall attend a ball till she is Mrs. Merton. CASTLES IN THE AIR.

"Illusions!" exclaims the philosopher—"Illusions!"—yes; but without them I should feel nothing of life but its misery."

THERE exist in the world a certain set of sober-minded beings, who profess it as their opinion, that those thoughts which proceed from illusion or fancy ought to be banished from our minds; that time is foolishly and unprofitably consumed in thinking of impossibilities. They dislike or despise poetry, as it is frequently composed of fictions, and represents things which are not in the ordinary course of nature. Some of these, who profess to admire nothing but reality, or a representation of it, carry their prejudices to a ludicrous extent: for example, some of them will admire a staring likeness of the last lady mayoress and family more than the finest composition of Raphael. "We are not interested," say they, "in looking at features which we know never existed, in a group of ideal personages; but there is an evident reality in the delineation of her ladyship; we see something resembling what is frequently before our eyes, and we are therefore pleased with it." These people will study with unwearied patience the incontrovertible facts of Cocker's Arithmetic, and abhor the beautiful fictions of the Fairy Queen; in short, matter-of-fact is their idol—fiction, romance, or poetry, the objects of their scorn. A fanciful disposition of mind may be disadvantageous; but it may be doubted whether we should not be, as it were, wearied by the continual succession of realities, were it not for the occasional relief of fancy or illusion, whose ideal pleasures are at all times at hand to assist us when we are overcome with the real cares of life. By these illusions I mean those incoherent ideas of future happiness or greatness, which frequently occur to every one, and if I mistake not, even to those who profess to despise the workings of imagination; ideas which, on reasoning, we might feel could not be realised without some most material change in ourselves and circumstances—a sort of waking dreams, commonly designated by the name of "Castles in the Air." These freaks of fancy prevail in a less or greater degree in every one, from the madman, in whom they are strongest, down to the idiot, in whom their influence is hardly perceptible. In the madman they have overcome his intellect and entirely blinded his reasoning faculties, so that he fancies that he has lost his head, and runs about in search of it, or that he is transformed into a tea-pot, and is afraid of being broken. Next to him comes the poet: he seems to be the boundary which limits sanity; beyond him is madness; for small is the barrier which divides insanity from inspiration. His imagination is more vivid than that of other men, but it has not quite overcome his reason. After these follow the general mass of mankind, who are all, in their several stations, subject to these waking dreams. What would become of the lover if he were denied some moments in which he might picture to himself a sort of acme of happiness, which, upon reflection, he would feel was unattainable? Where would be the happy hours of a young author, if he were not led on by his fancy to dreams of imaginary second editions, which, on a return to his senses, and a perusal of the productions of his pen, would quickly vanish into air? How wretched would be the solitary hours to a younger son of a remote branch, if he were denied the pleasing occupation of picturing to himself the pleasure he would feel in possessing the wealth and rank of a distinguished nobleman, should he, by the extinction of only fourteen awkwardly intervening heirs, arrive at the summit of his hopes! The petty clerk of an office, ceasing awhile from the toil and drudgery of his desk, revolves his plans for saving the nation and advancing his family, should he be made secretary of state. The gambling groom, when he has lost his last penny and broken his dice-box against the table of the servants' hall, retires to meditate on the dash he will cut when he wins a prize in the lottery and becomes a country squire. To these illusions are the minds of men continually prone; and at no time more so, than when, by any accident, they are left for a short time in solitude. Our thoughts then receive a selfish cast; they are directed toward ourselves and our prospects in life; and it is at this time we delight to weave those spider-webs of fancy, which the bustle of the real world quickly sweeps away.

I am far from being one of those persons who think, or profess to think, that there is little in real life worthy of their attention; that common things are below their notice, and that their only pleasures are to be found in the ideal world of their imagination. Those who hold these sentiments, run into the opposite extreme from the set I before described. They say—for I always am inclined to doubt that they think so—that as solitude is the parent of that world of fiction, they infinitely prefer the sight of mountains, the roar of a cataract, or the gloom of a forest, to the acquaintance with man, his ways, manners, and conversation; they profess that they could live retired from life, and feed upon the joys of romance and imagination. I would not advise them to try their plan: they would only destroy a pleasing illusion, and convince themselves that they were wrong. Yet, for my part—though I am not one of these would-be anchorites—I am fond of indulging myself at times in building castles in the air, and consequently of the occasional solitude which produces them. Were I deprived of these illusions, I should feel as if I had lost an intimate companion, who was always at hand to raise my spirits and to comfort me under every misfortune.

The ancient poets tell us, that of the contents of Pandora's box, every thing escaped except Hope, which remained at the bottom to console mankind. Now I am disposed to keep up the allegory, and to suppose these illusions to constitute the box itself in which this universal comforter Hope was contained. Indeed, as the box seemed necessary, in order that its contents should be retained, so these illusions appear to me to be necessary for the preservation of Hope, which is surrounded by, and, as it were, contained within them. Had it not been for them, it would, with the rest of the contents, have escaped, and left the mind of man without a consolation in misfortune.

I must confess I pity those who have no pleasure in these illusions, and who tell you that when this

"Fancy's fairy frostwork melts away," they are more discontented than they were before, and feel that they have only been playing Tantalus with happiness. This, in my opinion, argues a most inveterate determination—perhaps not an uncommon propensity—to be discontented; together with an ingratitude to the moments which have afforded us pleasure; an ingratitude which deserves the self-inflicted punishment it often receives, of never enjoying any at all. A contented mind will encourage these imaginary pleasures, at whatever time they appear; will snatch the delight of them, be it but for a moment; and, when these magic fascinations are fled, will return to the dreary scene of reality with cheerfulness, thankful for what it has enjoyed, and prepared for whatever it is about to suffer.

ON AND UPON.

We have two words which we use indifferently; on and upon. It appears to me that those who study elegance, by which I always mean precision and correctness, may show it here. I would say upon a tower; on the same principle, I would say on a march. There would, indeed, be no harm in saying on a tower; but there would be an impropriety in saying upon a march; for up, whether we are attentive or inattentive, whether we have been a thousand times wrong, or never, means somewhat high, somewhat to which we ascend. I should speak correctly if I said, "Dr. Johnson flew upon me;" incorrectly, if I said, "he fell upon me." Custom is a rule for every thing but contradiction.

A rugged countenance often conceals the warmest heart; as the richest pearl sleeps in the roughest shell.

A PORTION OF THE AUTOBIOGRAPHY OF
MR. PAUL PRY.

I AM not aware that it has fallen to the lot of any other man in his pilgrimage through this weary and sinful, and best-of-all-possible worlds, to be afflicted as I have been, and am; if there is another such unhappy being, I know how to commiserate his calamitous situation. I am not conscious of any peculiarity in myself, either of character or circumstance, which should necessarily create the miseries of which it is my hard fortune to be the recipient and sufferer. So far as I can discover, I am like my fellow-men in all important particulars; if there is any thing idiosyncratic about me, it is the presence of a greater portion of that divine quality, which, if all men were devoid of, science would cease to flourish, learning become extinct, argument a dead letter, disputation a non-entity, and ignorance, more lamentable and hopeless than that which overshadowed the much-talked-of and unhappy "middle ages," reign once more in dreary despotism over this flourishing, and the other enlightened, hemisphere; I mean the thirst of knowledge; the restless and insatiable desire of information upon all known and unknown subjects: of this, indeed, I am a large possessor. My ancestors—and for it I owe and yield to them my eternal gratitude—were kind enough to transmit to me so munificent, or at least so satisfactory a portion of the temporal goods of life, in the shape of lands and houses, bank-stocks and mortgages, bonds, promissory notes, and cash, that I have never been under the necessity of directing my bodily or mental energies to the acquisition of that indispensable ingredient in man's happiness—the wherewithal to live; and, consequently, I have enjoyed an uninterrupted leisure of more years than I care to mention, for the attainment of mental wealth; and I may say, without boasting, that the opportunity has not been thrown away. Knowledge of every description has been sought after, and not always unsuccessfully; but the studies which have chiefly engaged my most profound attention, and have been pursued with the keenest relish, have been those which would enable me to understand and investigate the actions, affairs, and purposes of my fellow-men. For many years I have sedulously attended, with an inquiring spirit, to the concerns of my fellow-beings, wheresoever my place of abode has been; for it must be understood that my residence in any one place is seldom of any great duration. I must confess that the disinterested and benevolent tenor of my conduct has not escaped misconstruction, and even censure. I have been, alas! but too often accused of curiosity and impertinence; of being a busy and officious intermeddler with things that concerned me not; and my very name has been generalized into a common appellation for persons of that description. How unjustly these most injurious aspersions have been heaped upon one so well disposed, and so anxious to do good-natured actions, as myself, it is of no avail for me to protest; I can but console myself with the reflection that such has been the case in all ages; the small number of the good have ever had to bear the hard thoughts of the many evil. Socrates, as I have heard, was thus afflicted. The unswerving integrity of King Aristides could not save him from the popular clamour: Coriolanus, the Trojan general, was banished: and, in later times, the names of Galileo and Lord Hastings, of Dr. Francia and William Penn, and of our own ex-minister Mr. Huskisson, might be cited. With those illustrious individuals I have not the vanity to place myself upon an equality; but my lot has been, and is, like theirs.

In England, my native country, I have been hunted from town to town, and from county to county; in despair, I fled to the northern portion of the empire, but soon found there was no refuge for me in that inhospitable and inaccessible region: where the pursuits of every man were wrapped up in inscrutable mystery, and the utmost efforts of my ingenuity were unavailable to hunt them out: the fortnight that I passed in Edinburgh was one of unqualified misery; for every attempt that I made to acquire information was foiled, and I could not live where even the most unimportant circumstances were kept secret with such unremitting circumspection. The continually unsatisfied aspirations of my heart, and the everlasting state of mental torment in which I lived, were too much for me; I grew thin, and I verily believe that another month of such agitating suspense and disappointment would have brought me to the grave. Who could exist among a race, in the midst of whom fourteen mortal days and nights were insufficient to discover a single secret?

To save my life, I hastened to the sister kingdom; and there my case was even worse; not that, as with the people of that northern land of mystery and caution, their thoughts and deeds were veiled from sight with jealous care; it was the very reverse of all this that constituted my objections to the blundering, straight-forward, open-hearted, and open-mouthed natives of St. Patrick's favoured island. My passion has, by long indulgence, acquired a species of refinement that can find no value in that which is attained with too little difficulty. The discovery of a secret is to me a bonne bouche of the most exquisite relish; but what man, possessed of the least perception of the sublime in gastronomy, would not prefer an apple from the topmost bough, and which had been gathered at the risk of his own neck, to another, although equally juicy, ripe, and mellow, that lay ignobly easy of acquisition, upon the earth beneath the tree on which it grew? Or where is the lover whose passion is not augmented by the very difficulties that seem to spring up, as if spontaneously, upon the path wherein his hopes and wishes run, and whose ardour would not cool if, on the sudden, all those obstacles should be removed? For my own part, that mystery was worth nothing, which all the world might know; and I could not bear to live among the Irishmen, whose whole concerns were as transparent as their own Emerald, and who were always ready to blab out all their own and their neighbours' secrets, without affording the slightest opportunity for a close and delightful cross-examination. I struggled along with them for six full weeks; but human patience could endure no longer. Once, and once only, during my residence in Dublin, was my forlorn and joy-forsaken path crossed by a glimpse of hope. I had, by the merest accident in the world, obtained the clue to what I thought a real secret. I remember well the effect produced on me by the joy, the rapture I may say, which this discovery inspired. I could not sleep a wink the night after, so intently were my thoughts engaged in devising plans to bring the incipient treasure to full and perfect maturity. With the morning's sun I rose, sleepless, but joyful and refreshed. Alas for the incertitude of human affairs! The mighty egg, over which I had brooded with such fond anticipations, turned out a mere empty bubble. The individual most deeply implicated in my imagined grand discovery had himself, with even more than national perverseness of disposition, revealed the whole affair, as if for my especial discomfiture; and the flattering expectations which I had entertained of a glorious opportunity for the exercise of my peculiar powers of investigation were crushed in the very bud, when I went down to breakfast, by hearing the whole subject, in all its particulars, discussed by a jovial party of twenty-seven, together with nine dozen of eggs, and an unascertained number of rounds of toast, hot rolls, beefsteaks, and cups of coffee. This was enough, and, oh! by far too much; I hastened on board the Liverpool steamer, engaged my passage in the packet Canada, and, in four weeks and six days after, found myself a stranger in the city of New-York, the commercial metropolis of the United States of North America.

The first three weeks after my arrival were productive of gratification in an eminent degree; for to whatsoever quarter I turned my steps or eyes, I encountered innumerable opportunities for the indulgence of my darling propensity. I scoured with hasty feet the streets, the churches and other public buildings; exhausted, with innumerable questions, the patience, as well as the stock of knowledge, of the venerable lady who exhibits the city-hall, the chief lion of the western London; scraped acquaintance with several extremely interesting convicts in the state-prison and penitentiary; attended numerous trials in the Guildhall, or court of sessions; learned the history of the amiable and enlightened judge who presides at the sittings of that illustrious and dignified tribunal; ascertained that the spire of St. John's was less lofty than that of St. Paul's, by fourteen feet and eleven inches; fished up a small infinitude of curious family secrets; visited all the exhibitions, including the learned dogs and Punch and Judy; paid seven and sixpence, New-York currency, for a French fancy instand, which I broke in a china shop at the corner of Reed-street and Broadway; was twice taken up by watchmen as a burglar, for trying to peep in, late at night, at suspicious-looking windows; and narrowly escaped being kicked out of the navy-yard at Brooklyn, for being too minute and inquisitive in my conversation with a sentry. But, in process of time, the novelty of my situation wore away, and I began to feel a craving for new scenes, and further fields of investigation. I had heard of the knowledge-seeking disposition of the Yankees before I ever thought it would be my lot to sojourn with them; and, since my arrival, I had learned that the appellation which I, in common with my countrymen, had been accustomed to bestow upon the whole people of the republic, was, in fact, the rightful property of only one portion of its population; and my imagination teemed with delightful images of pleasure to be found in the intercourse with a people of congenial character: a summer was to be devoted to a leisurely and rambling journey through the six eastern states; but, before setting out on that expedition, I determined to make an excursion to the far-famed cataract of Niagara; and, if possible, to pry into, and bring to light, the mystery of the abduction of a Mr. Morgan, with which, at the time of my arrival, the newspapers and the tongues of men and women were exclusively occupied.

I took a birth, accordingly, on board the steamer North America, which plies between New-York and Albany; packed up my valise, bought a new umbrella that cost me twelve and sixpence—the man asked fourteen shillings, but I beat him down—and paid my bill at the hotel. But misfortune attended me at the very outset, for I lost my passage and my passage-money too, for that day, by dropping in for a few minutes on my way to the steamboat wharf, to see how a friend of mine was getting on, an ingenious and amiable gentleman, who keeps a little lodging-house in Cedar-street; and he had something very mysterious to tell me about one of his neighbours on the opposite side of the street, which I could not go away and leave unheard. My departure was, consequently, delayed until the next morning, and then, determined not to be again disappointed, I hurried on board an hour before the final ringing of the bell. My time, however, was not thrown away; for in the interval I gathered a large fund of curious information from the steward, respecting his duties, the average number of passengers, and the quantity of provisions generally laid in for each voyage. He grew very shy, at last; but I told him I was not asking from any improper motive, but was only curious to know, you know, what sort of a birth he contrived to make of it, and whether he found it to answer his expectations. My attention was withdrawn from him, at last, by a very remarkable, and very unaccountable circumstance. I had just put my eye-glass to my eye, and turned it towards the plank upon which the passengers walk on board the vessel, when I saw an old lady of a singular appearance, in the act of stepping upon it; she had come down to the wharf in a hackney-coach, number three hundred and forty-seven, drawn by two blind sorrel horses, with switch tails, and driven by a coloured gentleman with a straw hat, and a pair of striped pantaloons something like my own; there was no luggage at the back of the coach, nor under the driver's seat; and when she got out, the coloured gentleman drove off without waiting for his fare. The old lady had on a black silk bonnet, rather old fashioned, and a large blue camlet cloak, and she carried in her hand a small bundle wrapped up in a piece of whity-brown wrapping paper; it looked more like a book, or a couple of books, than any thing else; indeed, I am certain it contained books—or, perhaps it was a small back-gammon board. I thought it very remarkable that the old lady should think of setting out upon a journey without any luggage, and asked the steward if he knew how far she was going; but he could give me no information. My feelings became interested to a remarkable degree, and I determined to exercise all my ingenuity to discover something about this mysterious old lady; not that she was so very old; I should suppose that forty-five, or may be forty-six or seven, for a mere conjecture, might not be very far from her real standing; she was rather short, and stout; had a pair of keen and restless little black eyes, a sharp and shrewish looking nose, and mustachios of formidable growth and intensity of colour. I was on the point of speaking to her several times, but for once my confidence in the insinuating power of my address deserted me, and I was fain to rest unsatisfied, in the hope that chance, or a conversation with some other of the passengers, might afford me the information respecting her for which my soul thirsted. In the meantime, the hour for starting had arrived, and after a

AMERICAN LITERATURE.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

GEORGE MASON.

BY THE AUTHOR OF FRANCIS BERRIAN.*

Poeta nascitur non fit has been so long received as incontrovertible doctrine, that any attempt to demonstrate its falsity would now be considered vain, and even ridiculous; we shall not, therefore, undertake a task so very uninviting. But we may be permitted to enter our protest against the abuse of the principle, and to remonstrate against the mistaken notions of those who would extend its application farther than truth and reason will permit. It is undoubtedly true, that to become a good writer, a man must have certain peculiar gifts of nature, such as imagination, judgment, observation, &c.; but it is not true that the possession of these natural qualities alone will enable him to arrive at eminence in the walks of literature; it is indispensably necessary that he should have some knowledge other than that which may be acquired by an intercourse with the world and his own thoughts. To become great, or even to escape failure, he must study; must make himself master of the thoughts, and investigations, and discoveries of other men. "A little learning," as Pope says, "is a dangerous thing." It is indeed; better almost have none than not enough; that is, for one who aims at acquiring reputation by his pen. This is the sin of our country; we have too many young men among us, of respectable abilities and moderate attainments, ambitious of literary fame, yet unwilling to undergo the labour, without which all their efforts must prove fruitless. The writers of England are—as they ought to be—the hardest students in the world. Washington Irving devotes six hours each day to close and careful reading; and who has not read of Sir Walter Scott's magnificent library, or is ignorant that he is familiar with the contents of every volume that it contains? This is the way by which they acquire fame and fortune; by first acquiring ideas. With our writers, at least too many of them, a different system is pursued. Some, it is true, have not the instruments—we mean the books—these should not write at all; and they who have the means at their command, prefer relying upon their own resources, as they say; mistakenly imagining that, in the existing world around them, and in the workings of their own minds, they have all that is needful to qualify them for the undertaking upon which they have the hardihood to venture. They would rather walk abroad and look upon nature, or meditate, or write, than read; the necessary consequence is, that they cannot write. No man living, or that ever lived, has or had materials enough within himself to constitute a great poet, or novelist, or historian, or essayist, or philosopher. Byron's works teem with ideas obviously suggested by his extensive reading. Parr and Porson were libraries in themselves. Heber was an industrious and indefatigable reader; and even the gigantic mind of Johnson would alone have been insufficient to make him what he was, the wonder and glory of his age. It was study, intense study, that made these men great; and it is only study that can make an author. These remarks have been suggested by a perusal of the novel, of which the title is at the head of this article. The author is evidently a very clever man, and endowed with many of the requisites for success in his undertaking—imagination, knowledge of the world and of character, ingenuity, and strong power of conception. But he wants "book-learning;" his ideas are excellent, but he wants language to express them adequately; his characters are well conceived, and various, and original, but they are weakly drawn; his story excellent, and his descriptions graphic, but his style exceedingly faulty. The book is interesting, many parts of it intensely interesting, but the pleasure we derive from reading it is constantly alloyed by the recurrence of vulgarisms, repetitions, inaccuracies in style, and even in grammatical construction. Now why cannot the author set himself seriously to study for some four or five years; make himself familiar with the acknowledged models in English composition; store his mind with ideas drawn from the best sources, and resolutely desist from throwing these ideas, and his own, before the public, until he has thoroughly digested and brought them into shape and consistency? He few preliminary blasts from a bugle, blown by a little man in a drab pea-jacket and oil-skin hat, with a blue spotted handkerchief around his neck—who, by the way, had something very like a newspaper sticking out of his right coat-pocket—the machinery was put in motion, and we pushed gallantly from the dock. I kept my eye upon the old woman with the mysterious bundle and without any luggage, lest she might slip on shore; but she continued quietly seated upon a bench on the quarter-deck, and looking across the river. I have no very distinct recollection of the various objects which we passed in our progress, and which, as I am informed, are generally considered worthy of notice; for, to tell the whole truth of the matter, I found so many things to attract my attention on board, that my eyes were but seldom directed to any others; the old woman with the bundle claimed no small share of my attentive observation; and, besides her, there were numbers among the passengers in whose appearance I found subject of highly interesting exploration.

I found no difficulty in entering into conversation with my fellow-passengers; but it is worthy of observation, that no one colloquy of the many in which I was, in the course of several hours, engaged, was of more than ten minutes duration. The Irishmen on board, it will readily be conceived, I avoided with assiduous care; my experience of their national failing had been too recent. Why my conversations should have been so invariably brief, is a question upon which I have pondered with the deepest interest, but which, as yet, I have not been enabled to solve, unless the suspicion, elicited by a sharp answer of the mysterious old lady to the only question that I could summon up courage enough to put to her, should prove correct. I had taken care to keep near her station on the after-deck, in order that I should not lose whatever light might be afforded by a stray remark, for the discovery respecting her character, purposes, and destination, on which my feelings were so strongly set. But my precautions were, in this respect, of no avail. She said nothing to any body, and seemed to be always busy in thinking. I am aware that, in asserting the existence of this extraordinary instance of taciturnity in one of the loquacious gender, I am laying myself open to serious imputations upon my character as a man of veracity; but it is, nevertheless, a fact; and if my readers will not believe, I must submit with resignation to the burden of their hard thoughts. Be that as it may, however, in a paroxysm of impatience, I determined, at length, to break the charm of silence which seemed to hang around her; and having gradually established myself upon the very settee which supported her imposing figure, I said, with my most captivating manner, "I beg pardon, ma'am; a very fine day; I hope I don't intrude?"

"Yes, it's pretty well," was the oracular answer.

Somewhat emboldened at finding the mysterious personage could speak, I resumed the attack. "Capital steamer, this; how much might she have cost, I wonder?"

No answer.

"Seems to make a good thing of it for the owners; good number of passengers to-day."

"Yes."

"Going far up the river, ma'am, if I may be so bold?"

"Ask me no questions and I'll tell you no lies, Mr. Pry," was the appalling replication; and when it was uttered, my tormentor—for such indeed she was, and so is any body whose mysteries I cannot penetrate—with a look of utter contempt, arose, and marched as loftily as a grenadier to the other side of the deck, where she took possession of an arm-chair, and, drawing her cloak around her, appeared to resign herself once more to meditation. My feelings were deeply wounded, as may readily be conceived, to say nothing of my wonder at hearing myself addressed by name by a total stranger; but all thoughts of my repulse were speedily effaced by new adventures.

Immediately after the unceremonious rebuke which I have just related, I went into the forward cabin, and there found a Frenchman in a green coat and white pantaloons, with rings in his ears, playing backgammon with one of my own countrymen, dressed in a frock and smalls. I soon became interested in their game, for I suspected that they were playing for something, and felt very curious to know how much it was. I have no doubt I should have eventually ascertained the amount, but my attention was called off by a pedler, very shabbily clothed, with a sharp inquisitive face, and a small box under his arm. He was offering his wares to the company, and now addressed me in a low, confidential tone of voice, requesting me to step with him upon deck. I complied with his desire, and the pedler having led me to a remote corner, near the wheel, asked me if I wouldn't like to trade watches with him. My answer, of course, was in the negative; and, vexed at the disappointment, for I had expected some interesting disclosure, I was about to return to the players in the cabin; but the pedler would not part with me, and began to open his box of trumpery, strongly urging me to buy or trade. I was amused, and somewhat interested with the fellow's pertinacity and volubility; for his tongue stopped not for a moment, although, just at this juncture, the vessel did. He offered me wooden combs, almanacs, picture-books, or, as he called them, "primers;" whole cards of jackknives and scissors, cotton-balls, suspenders, smelling-bottles, darning-needles and pocket-books; and, in fact, seemed to have set his very soul upon persuading me to make a swap with him of something or other. His offers were perfectly unique; and I make no question, that in the course of our, or rather his, negotiation, it was at my option to become the possessor of all, or any portion, of his stock in trade, in exchange for the same articles. Those articles were my eye-glass, and a pair of Hoby's white-topped boots, which I had on at the time, and which my friend, the ambulatory merchant, did seem to covet with an exceeding earnestness. It never struck me, until after the termination of our voyage, that in this man I was beholding one of that redoubtable race of whom I had heard so much, and for whom I felt so strong a predilection—I mean the yankees; nor have I, to this moment, any other evidence of the fact, than the general accordance which my memory traces between his character and conduct and those of his supposed compatriots, as they have been described to me, for I have never seen him since; but it is distinctly borne upon my mind, that in the course of our short conference I was assailed with more questions, and those more acute and searching than had ever before fallen within the limits of my experience in twice the time; and, for once, I must confess myself outdone. In short, I am confident that my swapping friend was a yankee of the first water; and therefore I have concluded not to make the visit to his region which I had meditated. I have reason to complain of him, too, on another score; for, by his means, the mysterious old lady of the books escaped me. I have already mentioned that, during my engagement with him, our boat had stopped; it was to land and receive passengers. It is inconceivable to me, at this time, how I could have suffered myself to be detained as I was, in a remote situation, from which it was impossible for me to discern whatever might be passing at the gangway; but so it was; and when, at last, I escaped from my tenacious pedler and rushed to the side, the boat was again in motion, and the first object that met my eyes was the old lady in the cloak, standing quietly upon the wharf, with her small package in her hand. It seemed to me that there was an air of triumph in her shrewish-looking visage; and despair was in my heart. She was lost; and I have never since been fortunate enough to meet again with the Mrs. Sir Walter Scott of North America. For, be it known to you, gentle reader, that by the minute description I have been enabled to give, my mysterious old woman has been recognised to be no less a personage than that "Great Unknown."

LINES

ON LEAVING A VILLA ON THE BANKS OF THE WYE.

SWEET spot! I leave thee with an aching heart,
As down the stream my boat glides smoothly on;
With thee, as if I were a swain, I part,
And thou the maiden that I doted on.

I ne'er shall view yon woody glen again;
That lowly church, calm promiser of rest;
Yon white cots, free from riches and from pain,
Fantastic gems upon the mountain's breast.
Fast, fast thou'rt fading from my longing sight;
The next bold turn, and thou art gone for aye—
A dream's bright remnant on a summer night—
The faint remembrance of a love gone by.
Farewell! and if fate's distant unknown page
Doom me to wreck on passion's angry sea,
I'll leave philosophy to reasoning age,
And charm the tempest with a thought on thee.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

THE RIVALS OF ESTE,

BY JAMES G. BROOKS AND MARY E. BROOKS.*

In the tone, and sentiment, and manner of the principal poem, there is an approximation to those of Lord Byron, so great, that one not intimately familiar with the writings of the "Leader of the Satanic school," as he was foolishly designated by Southey, might almost be excused for conceiving the "Rivals of Este" to have emanated from the same mind that gave birth to Lara and Parisina and the Siege of Corinth; not that the fair author can be suspected of imitation, at least of intentional imitation, but simply, that having long been accustomed to look upon him with admiration and reverence, and her mind being saturated—so to speak—with his peculiarities both of thought and of expression, the effusions of that mind are naturally moulded into a partial resemblance. Between Mrs. Brooks and his lordship there is, however, one grand and permanent feature of dissimilarity; in the writings of the former, there is no self; no exhibition of the morbid and unnaturally excited feelings of the individual; no misanthropy, or spleen. There is melancholy, but it is the contemplative and chastening melancholy of a fine and sensitive spirit, not the moody self-tormentings of an unquiet conscience. It is a sober sadness of heart not incompatible with that benevolence which can find something to rejoice at in the joys, or to sympathize with in the sorrows of the humblest; nor with that delicacy of feeling that can be moved to enjoyment by the presence of any thing fair, or good, or beautiful; by the happy smile of childhood, and the frankness and enthusiasm of youth, and the placid content and tranquillity of age; by the majesty of mountains, the flow of waters, the excitement of a crowd, or the solemnity of solitude. There is nothing in her most saddening moods from which our feelings revolt; no bleakness, no desolation in her darkest moments from which we shrink, or with which it is painful to sympathize.

Were it not too delicate an undertaking, we could draw a parallel between the writer of this beautiful poem and another gifted woman, whom it is our pride to claim as a daughter of our native land; we might discover in each an equal depth and tenderness of feeling, an equally delicate conception of the beautiful in external nature, and in the mysterious workings of the soul; an equal purity of thought, and the same richness and vivid power of fancy. But in the one we should perceive a more just tone of moral perception, a more distinguishing sense of truth, compensated for in the other by a more felicitous command of language and a nicer ear for harmony of versification; in the former we should find more dignity, in the latter more sensibility; in the one, grandeur of thought would strike us as predominating; in the other, an exquisite knowledge of the heart, that seems to be intuitive, and to have been implanted in her mind, to the very end that she might become the minstrel of the finest feelings of our nature.

But we must not suffer ourselves to be led away from the subject under consideration, by our admiration of these highly-gifted ladies; our limits compel us to close these general observations, and attend more immediately to the volume which we have read with so much pleasure, and with some extracts from which we intend to enrich our pages.

We shall confine our attention to the poem entitled "La Verna," because the "Rivals of Este" has been already largely quoted from in other journals, and because, also, we think "La Verna" the best specimen of the volume. The following lines strike us as being particularly touching and beautiful:

Oh, who has not, while drowsiness
From slumber wooed a dull caress,
Stood 'neath the light of yonder beam—
Too bright to gild a sleeper's dream—
And hailed it, as the green spot on
The dull Sahara of his life,
That comes when all he loved is gone,
With many a loved remembrance rife;
And flying back to childhood's day,
And dreaming o'er the dream of youth,

Trod once again the rosy way,
Where sleep the forms of love and truth?
How lone the deep half-smothered sigh,
As the bright vision passes by!

The subject of the poem is the confession of a dying nun in the convent of La Verna; a tale of passion and despair; she had loved, and her lover had proved faithless.

Oh, colder than the wintry blast
From Ararat's eternal snow,
Is the chill glance of hatred cast
From souls where love was wont to glow.
One moment did I meet his gaze,
With the proud glance of other days;
And from my bosom rushed the tide—
Perchance it warmed my cheek in pride;
A sudden wrench essayed to sever
The links that should have clung for ever;
They could not fear the blight of time,
Nor part, for poverty or crime;
His, his alone, the deadly grasp
That could those fetter-links unclasp;
Let them; I cannot feel again,
Nor suffer, as I suffered then!

My life has been one fevered sweep
Of passion o'er my soul;
While phantoms in that sullen keep,
Uproused them from their fitful sleep,
And reason's stern control.
Yet chide me not; the wildest wave
Finds in the ocean-depths a grave,
Perchance it sought before;
And time as fierce a flood will see
Slumber in voiceless apathy;
Peace to the torrent o'er!
I look upon the days gone by,
And thought is weariness;
They brought for me nor smile nor sigh,
But one intensest agony
Hath stolen their power to bless:
For aye was frenzy in the dream,
For ever burning in the beam!

We have not extracted these passages as conveying any idea of the story of the poem, but simply as specimens of the manner and tone of thought of the accomplished writer; we think them beautiful, but not more so than many others, which we should gladly copy into our columns, if we could.

We have left ourselves no space to say even a word of the poems of Mr. Brooks contained in the same volume; but we regret this the less, because they have all, or nearly all, been already extensively published, and our opinion of his exalted powers as a poet is sufficiently well known. We should rejoice, nevertheless, to make some extracts from "Genius," which we consider not only the best in the book, but one of the best of the productions of the American poets. But we must forbear.

REPOSITORY.

SOLITUDE IN A CROWD.

This is to be alone; this, this is solitude.—Byron.

READER! were you ever alone in a crowd? If not, thank your stars, and bestow a grain of pity upon those who must return a different response to the question. A crowded solitude, if we may use such a strange expression, is, in sober sadness, as melancholy a sensation as human nature is capable of enduring.

A crowded solitude!—If you are young, thoughtless, and talkative, you will be astonished at the idea; and there will be nothing extraordinary in your surprise. The ancient poets—poor ignorant souls!—have given us a very different description of being alone. They have defined various kinds of solitude, suited to various descriptions of men; but all of them are alike founded on mistaken notions and groundless prejudice. Were we to follow their opinions, we should place the solitude of the lover in whispering groves, purling rills, and moonlight; that of the sage in a library, or an observatory; that of the poet in a dish of vegetables and a Sabine farm; and, a fortiori, that of the collegian in an uncarpeted domicile, with a fractured window on the one side and a smoking fire on the other. Is this solitude? Far from it! We must most strenuously contend that true solitude is to be found in a multitude.

We are aware that the solitude we are now discussing is not that which is generally understood by the term. Many persons have probably never heard of any but a corporeal solitude; that which we are describing is mental. The one is to be found in caves and Caucasus—the other in theatres and Almack's; the former delights in moonshine—the latter in candelabras; the first sets a great value upon the silence and pure air of the country—the second gives the preference to the noise and squeeze of the fashionable world; and which of these is real solitude?—the corporeal, which is removed from the sight and hearing of all objects? or the mental, which both hears and sees a variety of things, and is utterly unconscious that it does either?

We are distrustful of our powers of description, and will therefore endeavour to illustrate our meaning by examples. We are provided with plenty, for we have still in our recollection Lady Mordaunt's last "At home." All the world was there. Whist, music, dancing, and last, not least, eating, were all going on in the usual style at the same time; the squeeze in the rooms was beyond parallel in the annals of ton; and of course we found more solitude in that evening than we had done throughout the whole season. We made our entrée when her ladyship was in her highest glory; she was bowing to one, smiling to another, and courtesying to a third, and straining every nerve and feature to do the proper to all her guests. This, however, was as impossible as the number of her satellites was innumerable; the tumult was tremendous; and there was so much bowing, and begging pardon, and getting out of the way, that it was quite impracticable to advance or recede a step. Good breeding and bare elbows were thrust in our faces alternately; we with difficulty preserved our toes from the frequent attacks made on them by kid slippers; and, with still greater difficulty, preserved our hearts from the sweet smiles that said, "I beg ten thousand pardons." It was a vortex of delight, and we were hurried so rapidly in its eddies, that much time elapsed ere we were able to collect our editorial serenity, in order to make a few observations on the scene before us.

The multitude at length began very slowly to diminish; and having lodged ourselves in an unperceived corner of the music-room, we proceeded, according to our ancient custom, to speculate upon character. Our attention was first attracted by a tall gentleman of a very noble appearance, who was leaning against a pillar, in an attitude of profound meditation. His dress was after the English fashion, but the cast of his features, and his short curling hair, sufficiently denoted him to be a foreigner. His eyes were fixed directly upon us, but we satisfied our curiosity by an attentive survey, without fear of detection, as his mind was evidently some furlongs distant. Upon inquiry, we heard that he was an Indian chieftain, by name Teioninhokarawn—we have doubts as to the correctness of our orthography.—He had done considerable services to the British arms in the American war, and had now been invited by her ladyship as the lion of the evening. He had been surrounded without intermission by a tribe of quizzers, loungers, and laughers, but one glance was sufficient to convince us that Teioninhokarawn was—alone.

We observed Lady Georgiana Wilmot standing at the other side of the room, the very picture of fatigue. She had been singing much, and was evidently quite exhausted. A young star of fashion was moving towards her with a languishing step; and, as we had a strong curiosity to hear his address, we changed our station for that purpose. "Pon my soul," the gentleman began with a bow, "you are divine to-night." "Am I?" said the lady, with a vacant gaze. "Never heard you in better voice," returned her assailant. Her ladyship knew it was the tone of flattery, so she smiled, but she had neither spirits nor sense sufficient to attempt an answer. We immediately decided that Lady Georgiana was—alone.

We next proceeded to the card-room. At first the din, and the disputing, and the quarrelling, were so loud, that we doubted whether we should find any solitude there; but another look convinced us of our mistake. Lord Mowbray was evidently alone. He was walking up and down, deliberating whether he should sacrifice his conscience or his place at to-morrow's division. Not less apparent was the solitude of the Duchess of Codille; although her grace was busily engaged at cassino with a select party of right honourables. She had been for a long time alone in the contemplation of her new brocade, and was recalled into company by the vociferation of her partner, "Rat me, if I ever saw your grace play so ill!"

We were about to retire to the ball-room, when we remarked our noble hostess reclining on an ottoman, seemingly quite exhausted with fashionable fatigue. She was still, however, exerting herself to do the agreeable, and was talking with appalling rapidity to every one who approached her, although utterly unconscious of what she heard or said. We advanced to pay our respects, and were saluted with, "Ah, my lord! what has kept you away so long? and there's Ellen, poor thing, dying to see you! Ellen, love!" With some difficulty we explained to her ladyship that she was mistaken as to our rank. "Eh! mon Dieu! Sir Charles," she exclaimed, "pardonnez—but I'm really dead with ennui." We allowed ourselves to be knighted without further explanation, and made a precipitate retreat, for we perceived that her ladyship, after the labour of the evening, would be very glad to be—alone.

The first survey we took of the ball-room presented us with nothing but cheerful faces and laughing eyes: at the second, we discovered, even here, much and melancholy loneliness. There were moralists without sense, and country 'squires without acquaintance; beaux without a thought, and belles without a partner. We hastened to make a closer study of the various characters which presented themselves.

We first addressed ourselves to Mr. Harris, a respectable member of parliament, with whom we had become acquainted the year before in Norfolk. "What! you're not a dancer, Mr. Harris?" we began. "By heaven, sir," he returned, "if this bill passes—" We passed on, much vexed that we had intruded on our worthy friend's solitude.

We were hastening to accost Maria Kelly, a very interesting girl, whose lover had lately left this country for Minorca, when we were attracted by a conversation between an exquisite and our old acquaintance General Brose. "Ah, general!" said the dandy, "how long have you ceased to foot it?" "Foot!" interrupted the general, "by Jupiter! their cavalry was ten thousand strong." The old man was decidedly alone.

Before we could reach the recess in which Maria was sitting, she had been assailed by an impertinent. "Mary, I have the honour and felicity"—he began. The poor girl started from her reverie with a sort of vacant gaze, and replied, "He sailed last Tuesday, sir!" "Sola in sicca," said the impertinent, and lounged on. We had not the barbarity to speak to her.

Old Tom Morley, the misanthrope, had been admiring a wax taper in an unthinking sort of way ever since we entered the room; we went up prepared to be witty upon him; but we had hardly opened our mouth when he cut us short with "For heaven's sake, leave me alone!" and we left him alone. We were proceeding in our observations, when we saw Ellen Mordaunt, the beautiful daughter of our hostess, surrounded by a set of dashing young officers, at the other end of the room. We had just begun to examine the features of one of them, who was somewhat smitten, and appeared prodigiously alone, when the idol herself turned upon us that bright and fascinating eye,

"Which but to see is to admire,
And—oh! forgive the word—to love!"

We had originally inserted here a rhapsody on Ellen's glance, which would have occupied, as our printer assures us, three pages and a half; but, in mercy to our friends, we have erased this, and shall content ourselves with stating, that we were alone for at least ten minutes, before we recollected that it was five o'clock, and that we ought to think of retiring from the solitude of Lady Mordaunt's "At Home."

THE BORDER OF ERIE.

TO S. W. P.

On the border of Erie—bright shore of the west—
Beyond where Niagara's cataract roars,
Where the wild eagle mounts from her down-covered nest,
And high in the noon-blaze of midsummer soars;
There, friend of my bosom! I'll hasten to meet thee,
When one brief but desolate winter is o'er;
And there, in the home of my heart, will I greet thee,
Delighted that distance shall part us no more.

Sweet border of Erie!—I hail thee afar,
To tell thee I'm lonely though pressed by a crowd;
Yet hope is my friend, and the light of that star
Allures me away from the heartless and proud,
To show thee how constantly, fondly I love thee,
And how from thy welcome I'll never depart,
While the bright stars of heaven are rolling above thee,
And warm glows the life-blood that flows to my heart.

Green border of Erie!—thy meadows are gay,
And gay in thy woodlands the wild forest-flower;
But sad is my heart while I linger away,
And breathe not their fragrance in meadow or bower.
From the gleam of thy waters the bright fish are leaping;
But what are their innocent gambols to me,
Though liberty lies on thy river-brink sleeping,
Since I am not there to repose and be free?

Rich border of Erie!—thy garner are filled,
For autumn has come with his heart-cheering stores,
Profuse as the manna on Israel distilled,
Or wave-beaten sands that are piled on thy shores:
But what though the ripe, golden harvest is waving,
And songs are beguiling the hay-makers' care,
If I must be absent, thus joyously craving
Delights that elude me till I can be there!

Dear border of Erie!—I fly to thy charms,
And with me the lives that are cherished as mine;
And one little lambkin I bring in my arms,
To sport amid verdure and beauty like thine.
And there, while above us the sun rolls in splendour,
Or Luna beams mild on the waves of the west,
In friendship united, our bosoms shall render
Their homage to Him who has made us so blest.

THE FIRST STEAM-BOAT.

The following is an account given at the time of the passage of the steam-boat to Albany, in the year 1807: "She excited the astonishment of the inhabitants on the shores of the Hudson, many of whom had not even heard of an engine, much less of a steam-boat. She was described by some who had indistinctly seen her pass in the night, as a monster moving on the waters, defying the tide and breathing flames and smoke. Her volumes of smoke and fire, by night, attracted the attention of the crews of other vessels. Notwithstanding the wind and tide were adverse to its progress, they saw with astonishment that it was rapidly approaching them; and when it came so near that the noise of the machinery and paddles was heard, the crews in some instances sunk beneath their decks from the terrific sight and left their vessels to go on shore, while others prostrated themselves and besought Providence to protect them from the approaches of the horrible monster, which was marching on the tides, and lighting its path by the fire which it vomited!" All this took place, not in regions explored by "Sinbad the sailor," but on the river Hudson, twenty-one years ago.

A DISCONSOLATE HUSBAND.

The consul's wife at Mycon "had been married upwards of six years, and yet at the time I was introduced to her she was scarcely twenty years of age. The consul appeared ardently attached to her; nor did she seem to hold that servile rank to which the Levantine ladies are devoted; she was gay, young and lovely; her husband good humored, frank and affable; and, in short, the family was a perfect oriental picture of domestic happiness. * * * Here we were visited by my former host, the consul, whom I was startled at seeing equipped in a full suit of mourning, and with a beard of six weeks' growth, according to the mourning customs of the Greeks. On inquiring the cause of his distress, he informed me, with streaming eyes, that his beloved signora had expired about two months before. The sight of me seemed to tear open all the closed wounds of the poor fellow's bosom: he wept profusely, sighed long and deeply, and seemed a melancholy picture of fixed and overwhelming grief. * * * On his departure, I communicated to an old acquaintance my sympathy with the sorrow of the consul; but, judge of my surprise, when he informed me that Signor Cordia had omitted, in his tale of misfortunes, to mention one incident—namely, that he consoled himself with a second partner about a month after the death of the first, and, by a strange commingling of joy and grief, had absolutely compelled his present lady to put on, with himself, deep mourning for her predecessor."

Emerson's Letters.

An Irishman who had blistered his fingers by endeavouring to draw on a pair of new boots, exclaimed, "By St. Patrick, I believe I shall never get them on until I wear them a day or two."

There is a first model of beauty and agreeableness, which consists in a certain relation between our own nature and the things with which we are affected. Whatever is formed on this model interests and delights us; whatever differs from it is always displeasing.

Notice to Subscribers.—Those of our subscribers who intend to change their residence on the first of May, will please leave notice at the office.

Literary Misfortunes.—It is a misfortune that there are but three copies extant of the Chronicles of William of Gloucester, and that nobody will give to the world an edition from one of those copies—that in the possession of the earl of Warwick.

It is very unfortunate that the identity of Junius with somebody or other has never been established; for if it had, we should not be bored with everlasting and fruitless attempts to accomplish that desideratum.

It is a great misfortune that nobody will finish the Recollections of Mark Macrabin the Cameronian, of which several numbers appeared in Blackwood's Magazine, some years ago. And it is another misfortune that the author of the story, or rather part of a story, entitled Tristan the Grave, commenced in the late Atlantic Magazine, is too indolent to carry it on to the thirtieth number.

It is a grand misfortune that Sir Walter Scott must die at some time or other. He should live for ever.

It is a misfortune to have read Don Juan; or that, having read it, we cannot forget it in a fortnight.

It is a melancholy misfortune that most "periodicals will degenerate"—a greater, that many of them will not bear reading twice—and the greatest, that very few of them are worth reading at all.

It is a misfortune that there are no translations of Tasso, and Dante, and Ariosto.

Bowery Theatre.—The most successful and triumphant times of this theatre have been connected with the Italian Opera. We all recollect the engagement of Signorina Garcia, unprecedented as regards remuneration, in the theatrical annals of this continent, and which at once stamped a character for liberality and enterprise on the management of this establishment; and we also remember how well the taste and fashion of the city repaid that hazardous speculation. Another attempt has been made to get up the Italian Opera, and we are happy to say, with success. An engagement has been effected with Madame Feron and Mr. Horn, assisted by Madame Brichta, the amusing Rosich, and Monsieur Angrisani; and the comic opera of "Trionfo Della Musica" was performed on Monday evening to a crowded audience, and went off with great eclat, although Signor Rosich was unfortunately labouring under a severe hoarseness. We have seldom seen Mr. Horn to greater advantage than in Count Carolino; but the gem of the evening was Madame Feron. In a former number we expressed our opinion of this lady at some length, and have only to add, that every fresh appearance adds to our already high opinion of her uncommon powers. She was in fine voice, and appeared in excellent spirits. We are sorry to perceive that the opera is limited to three nights, but trust that it may be extended to a longer period, and that, before its close, the Barber of Seville will, if possible, be produced. A great curiosity would doubtless be manifested to see Madame Feron as the charming Rosina. The want of an efficient Figaro is the greatest difficulty. Horn and Rosich will be excellent as the Count and Doctor Bartolo.

Important—if true.—A London paper says, "We are happy to know that bonnets are on the decrease; the rage for huge head-dresses is rapidly subsiding; and the shadowy silken alcoves under which the ladies were recently to be seen walking and driving, are giving place to a moderate and convenient sized covering for the head."

The Graces.—We learn from the Courier, that the Philadelphia academy of fine arts has just received Canova's celebrated group of the "Graces." This beautiful and costly specimen of the genius and skill of the great statuary, was procured at Rome by Dr. J. Y. Clark, and has been presented by him to the academy.

Notice of a Grand Ball.—The following commendation of a grand ball, at Wavertree coffee-house, is, from its brevity, worthy of imitation. "The room was large and elegant; the company was choice and happy; the refreshments were excellent; and the attention of the host and hostess beyond all praise."

UN POCO DIM.

Praise ye the Lord, the Lord is good;
To praise his name is sweet employ:
Israel he chose of old, and still
His church is his peculiar joy.

The Lord himself will judge his saints;
He treats his servants as his friends:
And when he hears their sore complaints,
Repents the sorrows that he sends.

Through every age the Lord declares
His name, and breaks th' oppressor's rod;
He gives his suff'ring servants rest,
And will be known th' Almighty God.

Bless ye the Lord, who taste his love;
People and priests, exalt his name:
Among his saints he ever dwells;
His church is his Jerusalem.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.
TO IANTHE.

IANTHE, could I touch the lyre
With magic art, like thine,
I'd wake the spirit-breathing wire
To thoughts of light and tones of fire,
Like those which, breathed by thee, inspire
This raptured heart of mine.
And I would still the lay prolong,
And oft the strain repeat,
To tell how much I love thy song,
Its numbers are so sweet.
I've marked thee—ere a dozen springs
Had bloomed upon thy cheek,
When, buoyant on her glittering wings,
Thy infant fancy warbled things,
Such delicate imaginings
As poetry can speak.
'Twas genius, uncontrolled by art,
And reckless of defeat;

I heard the lay, it touched my heart—
'Twas wild and simply sweet.

I marked thee next, with cultured mind,
In all the charms of youth,
And knew thy lovely form inscribed
A heart which every grace combined,
By native taste and art refined,
The pure abode of truth.
Then, when I listened to thy lay,
Each pulse with rapture beat;
It seemed to bear the soul away—
'Twas exquisitely sweet.

Another heard—the one alone
Whose worth inspired the strain;
Whose manly heart is honour's throne,
Who breathed a sigh for every tone,
And made his modest wishes known—
Nor did he plead in vain.
And when a wife—I heard thee still
The matchless strain repeat;

How must his heart with transport thrill!—
'Twas ravishingly sweet.

And is there yet a tenderer tie
To twine Ianthe's heart?
Can warmer feelings light her eye,
And bid her pulses quicker fly?
Can any other's smile or sigh
Such ecstasies impart?
There can—an infant's smiles inspire
A strain with joy replete;
A mother's love attunes the lyre—
'Tis now divinely sweet!

PART II.

"I woke—where was I? do I see
"A human face look down on me?
"And doth a roof above me close?
"Do these limbs on a couch repose?
"Is this a chamber where I lie?
"And is it mortal, you bright eye
"That watches me with gentle glance?"

EVENING had settled in before the termination of the contest, from which the "rebels" slowly and unwillingly retired, defeated, but after having also inflicted a bloody retribution. It was an awful and melancholy sight. The little town of New-Ross was a crowded cemetery; every corner reeked with immolation, and resounded to the groans of the dying, or the shrieks of the few who dared to wail over the happier dead. The Slaney was purpled with the blood of hundreds who were cast into its tide. Among the ruins of those houses which were fired by the gun and match, were seen the half-consumed remains of many bodies; and, along the streets, piles of victims, bleeding and festering, were hurried, by the June heat, into premature decomposition. To escape from the pressure of his falling comrades, which a further loss of blood, already too profuse, would incapacitate him from attempting, was the first object of Charles after his fall, and he feebly crawled, or rather writhed himself to some distance from the increasing carnage. Here he lay covered with blood, at the entrance of a house, which the inmates had apparently abandoned, and whose windows, like nearly all the others in the town, were shattered by the incessant pealing of the artillery. Evening, as has already been observed, had set in before the fury of battle had subsided; and when it became less unsafe for those who had not joined the many inhabitants who, previous to the fight, had fled into the county of Killkenny, to look out on the surrounding massacre, Charles, now insensible from the loss of blood, was quietly drawn into the house before which he had lain. He passed two days in a state of comparative insensibility; on the morning of the third, the dawn of reason was observed, but it was, as yet, only a twilight through which he could scarcely recognise or define the forms of recent events. On the ensuing night, a less disturbed slumber accelerated his recovery, and he awoke, before the dawn, much refreshed, and with a perfect recollection of all that had occurred up to his fall. Subsequent to this, all was mystery. He found that the wound which he had received under his right arm had been carefully attended to, and he looked around, anxiously and fearfully, suspecting that he was cursed with convalescence within the walls of a prison, and nurtured and protected, like a lamb, for the slaughter; nor, in the first dim light of morning, did the appearance of his abode, which had been long used as a store-room, challenge his suspicion. "Whom have I here to befriend me? who will recognise the miseries of a wretch who had better been mingled with the dead? The havoc made among our followers was too mortal to countenance the hope that I lie under a friendly roof. Oh, heaven! the massacre of that day! how it taunts me with a share in its commission! The town is not theirs—they perished too thickly—and with whom do I dwell? and have our foes humanity enough?—humanity! I should rather have asked, is even the name recognised among them?"

While tortured upon this rack of doubt and supposition, he heard the sound of an advancing footstep; it became more and more audible, until the opening door revealed a female figure, whose mere outline was visible. She advanced towards his bed with a slow and rather hesitating step, which, he thought, indicated a lesser unwillingness to disturb his repose than to escape his observation, and looked with a timid solicitude into his face. "My protecting angel!" said Charles, "do I not remember—" but she had already passed from the room, leaving by the bedside a folded paper, which he seized, tore open, and half read, and, through impatience, half anticipated, these words—

CHARLES—How often, while dancing with the village girls to the music of the stream, was my pastime checked by the appearance of "the misanthrope," as my father was wont to describe you. I then felt a solicitude which now returns with a rejuvenescent vigour respecting you. Your thoughts were a mystery—your life was a romance; one excited my curiosity, the other my admiration. I would fain, in the thoughtlessness of my youth, have drawn aside the veil; but I had heard of love—and could I love him who had so frequently been the subject of my father's unfavourable remark?—but why detail? On the fifth, you fell by the door of her whom you often met with her companions in our native glen. When the work of slaughter had ceased, you were borne under her roof by the fatherless daughter of Ned Neville: he, too, had been seduced by the demon who visited the village as a rebel leader, but who, in fact, was, and is, a government spy—one of those treacherous jackals bribed to provide victims for the British Moloch: her father was shot in a skirmish, a few days since, and she is suffered, by my father's regard for my entreaties, to live under this roof: but, for you, there is no protection—he is your foe; sufferings and political interference have changed his heart; it is less kind than it has been; and his house is the home of those whom prejudice has made intolerant, and politics unmerciful. I did regret our removal to this fatal town, but you are safe, and I rejoice. You now know all: you are in the house of a foe, but he knows it not; and you have but one friend; her feelings are, probably, too openly, but yet they are honestly, expressed; and what is cold prudence when—but I am interrupted. Yours,

JULIA DONNELL.

Charles, as he perused this kind and passionate epistle, recollected the animated little child, who, far back in the vista of remembrance, had frequently glanced across him in his morning walk, like the roe of the mountains—her foot as light and her eye as tearless: then the beautiful sunny-faced girl, budding into womanhood, who looked through her clustering curls, from behind the hawthorn hedge, on his solitude, and, when discovered, stole blushing in among her light-hearted playmates that gambolled in the distance. He recollected her; but the years that had seared him had added to her beauty. She was about her nineteenth year; her person a model for the Grecian chisel in the day of its immortality; her cheek shining through the veil of curls like the young blossom of the apple-tree imbedded in its dark foliage—and her forehead, proportionately lofty, contrasting its snow with the jetty eye-brow, which, being unarched, gave a more tender and pensive witchery to the black bright eyes that sparkled beneath them—and her mouth closed with that melancholy smile which watches the bed of convalescence. Charles had seen beauty, but his acquaintance with her was too superficial to have reached a heart so blunted by misfortune as his had then been; but he had long since been untaught this stoicism of feeling, and he looked on that letter with the eyes of love. The unhesitating hand with which she had drawn aside the curtain of her heart—the affectionate remembrance of other days—the revelation of his situation—of the opinions amid which he was now living, and the terminating avowal of her single attachment—all appealed forcibly to his hopes and his affections, and he loved.

Day after day passed, and still his fair minister was by his side; and, as their communications became more frequent, their affections became more ardent. One morning, as Julia sat to breakfast, her father addressed her: "Julia, I have occasion to see that parcel of family papers which is secured in the upper store-room, the leases of the cottage and gardens, which, together with your hand, I intend to bestow upon Captain — of his majesty's loyal —, now that those troublesome days are likely to terminate. I wish, I say, to refer to those papers, and do you, Julia, procure the key after breakfast. Well, what a fine old fellow the captain is! and then his loyalty—'tis so unimpeachable! Moreover, he was quartered near us when we lived in that rebellious glen. How often he spoke to us about that Charley Desmond!—ay, by the way, I prophesied for that lad; he fell, as the captain says, at the head of a multitude, near the main-guard, and fighting as if the salvation of kingdoms was on his exertions."

"Perhaps, father," said Julia, "he thought the salvation of one was."

"Ha! ha! a remnant of your old opinions, I perceive; you always had a leaning towards that unfortunate lad; but he's passed. How often your poor mother, that's in her grave, and I, that am journeying to it, have forewarned you of him, and our advice has not been ineffectual; you have got rid of this romance of high-flying notions, and you are to wed a captain."

"Yes, father, I shall wed the captain, for he has bled in the cause of his country."

"What a dutiful girl, now!" said Donnell. "He has, indeed, bled, but is sufficiently convalescent to receive your hand. Have you seen him since the battle, Julia?"

"Yes," said Julia, "I have. He's quite recovered."

"And you love him now? you had, I recollect, some misgivings on the subject a few days since."

"Oh, I always loved him!—and then only apprehended that death would have robbed me of a hero."

"Noble! noble!" exclaimed Donnell. "You were, you know, a little wildish in your younger days. You loved—no—you liked young folks, and, until now, apparently discountenanced the offers of the captain; but his wisdom and fatherly years are worth all the senseless gayety and gallantry of twenty-five—but that noble sentiment atones for all. He comes to day, and I must have those papers. Let me have the key, Julia."

"Can I not fetch them to you myself, father? the ascent to that room were certainly disagreeable, and, perhaps, dangerous to your infirmity."

"No, no, Julia; this recent victory over the rebel rascals has made me young again."

"Well, sir, you shall have it instantly. But had I not better assume a change of dress, lest the captain come? You can better delay the papers than I the adjustment of my appearance; this is not the garb fit for a lover's eye," said she playfully, as she shook aside the ringlets from her eyes, that lit with a most designing loveliness.

"Really, this is delightful!—you gladden my old heart, Julia, and I willingly leave the whole matter to your own management. Do bring me the papers, Julia. What a charming, obedient creature!" continued he, as she flew from his presence and ascended the staircase with a fleet foot and a trembling heart.

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM THE FIRST VOLUME OF THE ETONIAN.

ON A CERTAIN AGE.

"Tempora certa."

We happened the other day to be present at a small party, where, being almost entire strangers ourselves, we had little to do but to listen to and reflect upon what was said by others. While we were engaged in this occupation, we heard one expression repeated several times, which made a strong impression upon us, and induced us to draw up the following treatise.

We first heard some gentlemen observing, that it was quite proper for Mrs. — to withdraw from the stage in time, for that she was now of a "certain age." Immediately afterward we heard it remarked by Mrs. Racket, that it was lucky for Maria the nabob had proposed in time, for the lady must be of a "certain age." Now, as the former of these objects had seen fifty winters, of which the latter fell short by at least twenty, it was natural for us to exert ourselves to discover what this "certain age" might be, the limits of which were so extensive. We accordingly commenced an investigation into the subject with great alacrity, and carried it on for some time with great perseverance. We regret to add, that our success has not been proportionate to our exertions; and that, by the most indefatigable research, we can only ascertain that nothing in life is involved in such uncertainty as this "certain age."

Our first hope was, that by inquiries from some lady of our acquaintance, who had the fortune or the misfortune to come under this definition, we might be able to ascertain the precise boundaries of the period. But here we met with a difficulty, as it were on the threshold of our project. Out of all the young beauties of whom we made inquiries, out of all the fashionable belles in high life, and the vulgar belles in low life, and the languishing belles, who have no life at all, we could find no one to return a satisfactory answer to this mysterious, unanswerable, insupportable question, "Are you of a certain age?" One laughed naturally, and another laughed artificially; one looked amazed, and another looked chagrined; one "left it to us to decide," another left the room; one professed utter ignorance, and another tapped us with her fan, and wondered how we could have the impertinence. But plain "Yes" or "No" was not forthcoming.

Finding this method ineffectual, we changed our battery, and carried on the siege in another quarter. We now applied to the same ladies for the names of such of their acquaintances as they considered were liable to this imputation—for a terrible imputation the witnesses appeared to consider it. Our difficulties were forthwith redoubled. We are not acquainted with a single girl with good eyes, good hair, good complexion, or good fortune, whose name was not given to us as verging upon "a certain age." And it seemed to us extraordinary that middle-aged fair ones, whose charms were manifestly in their autumn, were seldom honoured with this appellation; it appeared to be exclusively reserved for those who were young, beautiful, and new to a fashionable life. Far be it from us to insinuate that envy had any influence in making this appropriation.

Finding that the study which we had already bestowed upon this subject had tended rather to perplex than to elucidate the matter, we found it necessary to pursue the investigation a step farther. We now applied for information to the middle-aged matrons, the sober wives, the mothers of families. "Here," said we to ourselves, "prejudice will have ceased to influence, vanity to mislead, envy to embitter; here we shall learn the real, the whole truth, from lips unsoured by petty peevishness or violent passion." But the event disappointed our expectations: there appeared to be a strange disagreement upon this topic, for we found no two opinions to coincide. Mrs. Cranstoun, who has two daughters, and is in her twenty-ninth year, is of opinion that "a certain age" commences at thirty-four: but Mrs. Argent, who, according to our guess, is just entering her thirty-fourth year, is inclined to put off the dreaded period to forty. Lady Evergreen, again, who, to do her justice, paints as well at forty as she did at fourteen, disapproves of the impertinent notions of these "girls," and thinks that ten more years are wanting to give any one a just and proper claim to this enviable distinction. Fifty is with Lady Evergreen the precise period, the golden number, the "certain age." Still dissatisfied with the result of our examination, we betook ourselves, as a last hope, to the dowagers. "They," we thought, "as they must have long passed the boundaries of this dreaded space, can have no object or interest in withholding from us the truth." Alas! we were again lamentably deceived. Some of their ladyships had daughters whom they were anxious to preserve from this abominable imputation. Others had particular friends whom they were anxious to bring under it. Lady Megrim begged we would not interrupt her—she really never held good cards when any one looked over her hand; and Mrs. Volatile assured us that she had made it a rule never to think after she was married. She never would have married if she had thought before.

Finding ourselves quite at a loss to connect or reconcile with each other these several sentiments, we shall throw together a few observations which occur to us on the subject, and then leave it to wiser heads to determine the day, the hour, the minute, at which the unconscious fair one enters upon—"a certain age."

At first, we must notice a peculiarity in the words, which we do not well know how to account for; viz. that their use appears to be almost entirely confined to the fair sex. They are but seldom applied to a gentleman. We have certainly been ear-witnesses to some exceptions upon this rule: for instance, we heard old Cleaver, the butcher, who has lived nearly seventy years, and amassed nearly seventy thousand pounds, advised by his friend Gibbie to leave off business, as he was now of a "certain age." And in like manner did we hear Mrs. Solander, when inclined for a solitary walk, admonish her husband, the alderman, not to take up his crutch to accompany her, for he was now—"of a certain age." But with these, and a few other exceptions, we have heard this significant expression applied solely to ladies.

As to the meaning of the words, we confess that we are so completely at fault, that we do not thoroughly understand whether they imply censure or commendation. The air of sarcasm and contempt with which they are commonly delivered, leave us to conclude that the former is intended to be conveyed; yet we cannot but think that the words themselves signify the latter, if they have any signification at all. For, conscious as we are of the uncertainty of female fancies, the doubts they entertain on the most minute point, the hesitation which they display alike in the refusal of an equipage or a thimble, an ear-ring or a husband, we certainly consider it no small praise in a woman if she is found to be "certain" in any thing. Nevertheless, so attached are we all to our folly and our self-conceit, that we are unwilling even to be commended for the exercise of those good qualities which we call mean and contemptible. Hence it is that our fair friends, who cruelly exult in the ambiguity of uncertain wills, uncertain wishes, and uncertain smiles, reject with disdain the honour—which we must allow would be inconsistent—of possessing "a certain age."

The discovery of the time at which this epoch is fixed baffles our utmost diligence. We are rather disposed to place it at no particular number of years in the life of man, but to allow it to vary its period according to the disposition and manner of life of each individual. We would make it a sort of interregnum between manhood and age, between decline and imbecility. According to our idea, the certain age of the officer would last from the first to the final breaking up of his constitution; the certain age of the drunkard would extend from the first fit of the gout to the last shake of the head of his physician; the judge would find himself in a certain age, from the time when he quits the bench to the time when he is unable to quit the sofa; and the coquette must submit to the provoking definition of a certain age, from the day on which rouge and enamel first become necessary, to the silent melancholy day on which rouge and enamel will be unavailing.

According to this arrangement, a certain age would be that restless uneasy space which elapses between our first warning to prepare for another world and our final summons to enter it. That period is to some of long, to others of shorter duration; but we believe there are few to whom this brief, this insufficient space for preparation is not conceded; there are few who are not warned, by some previous sign or visitation, that their sand is almost run out, that a new state of existence awaits them, that their days upon this earth are numbered. The phrase which we hear so frequently, and disregard, seen in this light, will indeed inspire sombre and salutary ideas; for ourselves, we look upon a certain age as if it were the last veil which conceals from us the visions we dread to see; the last barrier which shuts us from that unexplored country, on which we fear to tread; the last pause between experience and doubt—the last dark silent curtain which separates time from eternity.

SKETCHES FROM LIFE.

FROM THE LITERARY REMAINS OF THE LATE HENRY NEELE.

A YOUNG FAMILY.

You must know, most dear and courteous reader, that I am a bachelor; not an old one, heaven forbid! but one of whom the ladies say, "What a pity it is that Mr. Wiggins does not marry!" The fact is, I am sole lord of my hours, and of my limbs. If I stay out late, I need neither lie nor look sulky when I get home. I need not say, "My dear Peggy, I really was the first to come away;" nor run the fearful alternative of either losing good company or enduring a curtain-lecture. Besides all this, I am not surrounded by a sweet young family; but of that "anon, anon, sir."

Having thus introduced myself to your notice, allow me to perform the same kind office for one of my friends. George Cheviot and I were school-fellows. He was neither very wise nor very rich; but he was merry and good-tempered; qualities which I could then better appreciate than the others, and which I am still heretical enough to think the most valuable of the quartette. He was, moreover, "a tall fellow of his hands," and as brave as a lion; and I, I don't blush to own it, was a weak, puny chitling, and, as it is called in school phraseology, wanted somebody to take my part. George, accordingly, fought my battles, while I wrote his exercises; and thus we became sworn associates. We played, and romped, and rioted together; and, like the vicar of Wakefield's parties, what we wanted in wit we made up in laughter; which, after all, I still consider the better thing of the two.

After leaving school, we both settled in the great city until George, who had a touch of the sentimental in his character, fell in love with, and married, a journey-woman milliner; the consequence of which was, that all his friends cut him, and none of his family would go within a mile of his residence. For my own part, I make it a rule to cut all my friends as soon as they get married. I do not like the transformation of a merry, frank, sociable companion, into an important family-man. Neither do I like their invariable practice of laying every fault upon the shoulders of their bachelor acquaintances; for I have known more than one man, who, when rated by his amiable helpmate for his late hours, has excused himself by saying, "My dear Mr. Wiggins would not let me come away." Notwithstanding the tenacity with which I usually adhere to this rule, I determined to make an exception in favour of poor George. His grandfather had been a butcher, and his father a master-carpenter, and therefore it is not surprising that his mother should be shocked at his demeaning himself so vastly.

I, however, who have always been of opinion that, in a free country like ours, a man has a right to make a fool of himself, if he chooses, looked at the affair with different eyes, and we continued as warm and friendly as ever. Although I did not call at his house, we met at our usual places of resort; and I found less difference in George than in most of my married acquaintances. He was, nevertheless, constantly expatiating on the joys of a married life, and especially of seeing a young family growing up about you; of "teaching the young idea how to shoot;" and of watching the archness, the vivacity, and the simplicity, of the pretty prattlers. One day when he was particularly eloquent on these topics, and I was as acquiescent and insincere as a man ought to be on such occasions, he extorted from me a promise to dine with him, that I might have the satisfaction of seeing him surrounded with his young family.

The appointed day arrived, and I was ushered into the presence of my friend and his lady. She was dressed very finely, had a mincing air of gentility, and I should have thought her rather pretty, if no one had said any thing about her. In one corner of the room stood a cradle, and close by it—no matter what; socks, and caps, and ribands, were thrown about the room in "most admired disorder;" the chimney smoked; several panes of the window were broken; and three or four squalid, dirty-faced children were sprawling on the ground, and roaring very lustily. "That is a sweet little fellow, madam," said I—heaven forgive me for the lie!—pointing to a blear-eyed, bloated-cheeked cupid in her arms.

"It's a girl, sir," said she, bursting into a horse-laugh; "yes!" she added, patting the bloated cheek aforesaid, "and it is a girl, though he thought it was a boy, my pretty!" This was the commencement of my bacalarean blunders, and the lady for some time regarded me with a contempt, which, had I mistaken her own sex, could hardly have been surpassed.

To recover myself from my confusion, I took a pinch of snuff; my friend and his wife begged to participate in the contents of my box, which they had no sooner done, than every obstreperous urchin in the room roared out to be allowed to do the same. This petition was followed by a half-angry altercation between husband and wife, the former saying, "Oh let them, pretty dears!" and the latter, "Indeed they shall not." The cause of indulgence, however, triumphed; and every dirty pug-nose in the room was speedily made dirtier, at the expense of my black rappee. The consequences may easily be guessed: a round of sneezing, snivelling, coughing, crying, and scolding, commenced, until the adventure was closed by a general wiping of eyes and noses throughout the apartment. For myself, I did nothing but commit blunders all the while I was in the house. Now my foot was on the nose of one, and now my elbow was in the eye of another; and I could not stir an inch without being in danger of dislocating a boy's neck, or fracturing a girl's cranium. I am afraid that I shall be thought a sad barbarian, for not being rapturously fond of children: but give me a cat, say I; I can play with that as long as I please, and kick it out of the room when I'm tired of it.

The announcement that dinner was ready relieved me, at least for a time, from my many miseries. While descending the stairs, George whispered in my ear, asking me, if I did not think him the happiest fellow in the world; to which I replied, "My dear boy, I quite envy you." We sat down to table, and after many apologies from the lady, who hoped that I should find something to my liking, but who feared that her fare would be found but homely, as her time was so much occupied by her young family, the dishes were uncovered. Whatever the dinner might be in fact, I found that it was intended to be considered a very good, and even a handsome one. The lady, who before her marriage had lived at the west end of the town, where she made linen, pocket-handkerchiefs, petticoats, and costly truas, in a garret, wished to pass for a person of some taste and fashion. Accordingly, the table, instead of the ordinary viands which the Englishman delighteth to masticate, exhibited a profusion of would-be French and Italian dishes. Of these I merely counterfeited to eat, excepting one or two; among which was a fricasee, for so my hostess styled a blue-looking leg of a fowl, floating in a sea of dirty lard and salt butter, and a plate of macaroni, so called, which tasted exceedingly like melted tallow. The best thing which I could get hold of, was a bottle of their champagne, which was really very tolerable perry. Our dinner did not, however, pass over without the usual accompaniment of much uproariousness from the room above, which the sweet young family continued to occupy, and Betty was every five minutes despatched from the dining-room to still "the dreadful pother o'er our heads."

Lord Byron says,

"—a fine family's a fine thing,
Provided they don't come in after dinner;"

and I agree with him; especially in the proviso. At my friend George's, however, the young family was introduced with the dessert. The eldest, a wide-mouthed, round-shouldered girl, took possession of the better half of my chair; where she amused herself the greater part of the evening by picking cherries out of my plate, and spitting the stones into it. The sweet innocent whose sex I had aspersed, filled, and well filled, the arms of mamma; and two greedy, greasy boys, stood one on each side of my worthy host. These contrived to entertain themselves in a variety of ways; putting their fingers into the preserves; drinking out of their father's wine-glass; eating till their stomachs were crammed to satiety, and bellowing out bravely for more. As a variety, we were occasionally treated with crying, scolding, and threats of a whipping, which operation I at one time positively expected to see performed in my presence. At length the lady and the "family" retired, and amidst boasting of his happiness on George's part, and felicitations on mine, we continued to ply the bottle. Rather to my surprise, I found that the port wine was admirable; but poor George, as I afterward learned, had sent for two or three bottles from a neighbouring tavern, for which he had paid an admirable price. After emptying the decanters on the table, I found that I had had enough, and proposed joining the interesting domestic group upstairs. In consequence, however, of my friend being very pressing, and of my being "nothing loath," I consented that another bottle should be broached. The order to that effect being speedily communicated to Betty, she met it with the astounding reply, "There is no more, sir." Although I told my friend that I was glad of it, and that I had drunk quite sufficient, his chagrin was manifest. He assured me, that although his wine-cellar was exhausted, he had plenty of spirits and segars, of which he proposed that we should immediately avail ourselves. To this, however, I positively objected, especially as I knew that the ci-devant journey-woman milliner considered smoking ungentle.

I have but little more to tell you; we adjourned to the tea-table, where nothing passed worth recording. The family was again introduced, for the purpose of kissing all round, previous to their retirement to bed. "Kiss the gentleman, Amy," said the lady; "and, Betty, wipe her face first; how can you take her to the gentleman in such a state?" Betty having performed this very requisite operation, I underwent the required penance from one and all, with the heroism of a martyr. Shortly afterward I took leave of my worthy host and hostess, and experienced a heartfelt delight when I heard the door close behind me. I am not in the habit, like Sterne, of falling down on my knees in the streets, or clasping my hands with delight, in a crowded highway. Still I could not help feeling, that few as were my positive causes of rejoicing, I was not devoid of some negative ones; and, above all, I felicitated myself, that I was not the happiest fellow in the world; that I had not married a journey-woman milliner; and that I was not blessed with a sweet young family; as my recent experience of the latter comfort had induced me to think that King Herod was really not quite so cruel as I had hitherto considered him.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

PETER THE GREAT.

A new comedy, concocted by Messrs. Kenney and Morton, entitled "Peter the Great, or the Battle of Pultawa," has been produced at the Park theatre with great success. What just right the piece has to the title of comedy, is not very clearly established, as it, in the end, turns out to be no comedy at all; but a compound of treasors, plots, attempted assassinations, dead marches, and summary executions. Sabre-cuts are substituted for wit, and pistol-shots for repartee; and, to say nothing of the battle itself, where the slaughter, being on too large a scale, is judiciously carried on behind the scenes, three gentlemen—two Cossacks and a conspirator—have their existences terminated before the eyes of the audience. Now we all know that death is no joke. The only parts which can be construed into any thing like comedy, are the jests cracked by Addlewitz and his wife Illo, a pair of Russian turtles, on the subject of matrimony, which most of us know, is no joke either. The heroine, Mrs. Hilson, is in distress from beginning to end, and her principal scene is where she imagines herself to be the cause of the death of her father, in which situation it is not to be supposed she either feels inclined to laugh herself, or be the cause of laughter in others. The piece is an heterogeneous mixture of opera, melo-drama, and farce, and a very pleasant mixture it is. The plots, for there are two or three of them, are well wrought up and skilfully interwoven into each other, while some of the incidents, particularly where the two monarchs, Charles and Peter, save each other's lives, and Peter's escape in the character of a miller, are highly interesting. Morton—for it partakes more of his manner than Kenney's throughout—can manage these affairs as well as any man living. He gets his heroes into and out of difficulties with neatness and despatch, and never fatigues the audience with long explanations of his improbable contrivances. He seems, however, inclined to repeat himself, and in the present play has pilfered from his former efforts with considerable ease and impudence, Czar Peter being nothing more than a northern Henri Quatre; while the rough old soldier Schwartz, is merely the rough old soldier Moustache, in a different latitude. We have seldom seen a new piece better performed. The actors seemed to be on such good terms with their parts, as to have formed an intimate acquaintance with them, a thing not very common on the first night of a new piece. Mrs. Hilson was interesting, Mrs. Sharpe amusing, and Mrs. Wheatley quite at home. Barnes laughed and was laughed at, and Hilson's part fitted him as if it had been expressly made for him; no one conceives or executes the character of a blunt old veteran better than Hilson. Mr. Simpson had so little to do, that there was scarcely time to find out whether that little was good, bad, or indifferent; but Barry, as Peter the Great, was really excellent. His bold, frank manner, and handsome face, peculiarly fit him for such parts. There is at times a degree of sameness about his attitudes, exits, and entrances, which he might as well get clear of, as it would only cost a little care and attention. One thing we like about Mr. B. is his unassuming character as stage-manager. He plays any character that is calculated to heighten the interest of the piece performed, and seldom or never puts himself forward in parts beyond his grasp. Stage-managers, in general, have a high opinion of their own abilities, and think themselves capable of playing any or every thing, which generally ends in the public and themselves entertaining a different opinion. Richings looked well as Alexis, and in the deep and tragical situations, was very amusing. Mr. Richings is a good comic actor in tragedy; at times there is no resisting his action and emphasis; he throws his legs and arms about in all directions; and sometimes they go right and sometimes wrong, though it is merely chance either way, Mr. R. not having any definite ideas on the subject. In other respects, he is a useful actor, and his songs draw down great applause on Fourth of July nights, when nothing but patriotic sentiments are required. Mr. Woodhull, that unfortunate man on the stage—we mean unfortunate as to his situations, not his acting—was in his usual predicament in this piece, that is, ordered for execution. We wonder how often he has trod the boards of this theatre on his way to death, to be hanged as a felon, shot as a deserter, or beheaded as a traitor! Take Mr. W. throughout the year, and his moral character on the boards is very bad. There is never a murderer, outlaw, scoundrel, or gentleman in debt in a piece, but Mr. Woodhull has to take charge of their enormities and misfortunes, and exhibit the pangs of remorse in his own proper person. In the present instance he is not executed, only going to be, and prepares himself for death—kneels down—is forgiven—gets up, and returns thanks in his usual manner. Mr. Woodhull, as a general actor, is entitled to much praise; he never burlesques a character, and is always perfect in the text; he plays every thing, and the manager might well say of him, that he could "better spare a better man." Altogether, "Peter the Great" is well worth seeing, and bids fair to become quite as popular, if not more so, than Charles the Twelfth. C.

Quere.—Why cannot the managers of the Bowery theatre treat the town with the Barber of Seville, during the engagement of Madame Feron?

THE SHUNAMMITE.*

It was a sultry day of summer time:

The sun poured down upon the ripened grain
With quivering heat, and the suspended leaves
Hung motionless; the cattle on the hills
Stood still, and the divided flock were all
Laying their nostrils to the cooling roots;
And the sky looked like silver, and it seemed
As if the air had fainted, and the pulse
Of nature had run down, and ceased to beat.

"Haste thee, my child!" the Syrian mother said,
"Thy father is athirst"—and from the depths
Of the cool well, under the leaning tree,
She drew refreshing water; and with thoughts
Of heaven's sweet goodness stirring at her heart,
She bless'd her beautiful boy, and to his way
Committed him. And he went lightly on,
With his soft hands pressed closely to the cool
Stone vessel, and his little naked feet
Lifted with watchful care, and o'er the hills,
And through the light green hollows where the lambs
Go for the tender grass, he kept his way,
Wiling its distance with his simple thoughts,
Till, in the wilderness of sheaves, with brow
Throbbing with heat, he set his burden down.

Childhood is restless ever, and the boy
Stayed not within the shadow of the tree,
But with a joyous industry went forth
Into the reapers' places, and bound up
His tiny sheaves, and plaited cunningly
The pliant withs out of the shining straw,
Cheering their labour on, till they forgot
The very weariness of their stooping toil
In the beguiling of his earnest mirth.
Presently he was silent, and his eye
Closed as with dizzy pain, and with his hand
Pressed hard upon his forehead, and his breast
Heaving with the suppression of a cry,
He uttered a faint murmur, and fell back
Upon the loosened sheaf, insensible.

They bore him to his mother, and he lay
Upon her knees till noon—and then he died!
She had watched every breath, and kept her hand
Soft on his forehead, and gazed in upon
The dreamy languor of his listless eye,
And she had laid back all his sunny curls,
And kissed his delicate lip, and lifted him
Into her bosom, till her heart grew strong—
His beauty was so unlike death! She leaned
Over him now, that she might catch the low
Sweet music of his breath, that she had learned
To love when he was slumbering at her side
In his unconscious infancy—

—"So still!

"'Tis a soft sleep! How beautiful he lies,
"With his fair forehead, and the rosy veins
"Playing so freshly in his sunny cheek!
"How could they say that he would die! Oh heaven!
"I could not lose him! I have treasured all
"His childhood in my heart, and even now,
"As he has slept, my memory has been there,
"Counting like ingots all his winning ways—
"His unforgotten sweetness.—

—"Yet so still!—

"How like this breathless slumber is to death!
"I could believe that in that bosom now
"There were no pulse—it beats so languidly!
"I cannot see it stir; but his red lip!—
"Death would not be so very beautiful!
"And that half smile—would death have left that there?
"And should I not have felt that he would die?
"And have I not wept over him?—and prayed
"Morning and night for him?—and could he die?
"No—heaven will keep him. He will be my pride
"Many long years to come; and this fair hair
"Will darken like his father's; and his eye
"Be of a deeper blue when he is grown;
"And he will be so tall, and I shall look
"With such a pride upon him!—He to die!"
And the fond mother lifted his soft curls
And smiled, as if 'twere mockery to think
That such fair things could perish.

—Suddenly

Her hand shrunk from him, and the colour fled
From her fix'd lip, and her supporting knees
Were shook beneath her child. Her hand had touched
His forehead, as she dallied with his hair—
And it was cold—like clay! Slow—very slow
Came the misgiving that her child was dead.
She sat a moment, and her eyes were closed
In a still prayer for strength, and then she took
His little hand and pressed it earnestly—
And put her lip to his—and looked again

Fearfully on him—and then, bending low,
She whispered in his ear, "My son!—my son!"
And as the echo died, and not a sound
Broke on the stillness, and he lay there still,
Motionless on her knee—the truth would come!
And with a sharp, quick cry, as if her heart
Were crushed, she lifted him and held him close
Into her bosom—with a mother's thought—
As if death had no power to touch him there!

The man of God came forth, and led the child
Unto his mother, and went on his way.
And he was there—her beautiful—her own—
Living and smiling on her—with his arms
Folded about her neck, and his warm breath
Breathing upon her lips, and in her ear
The music of his gentle voice once more!

Oh for a burning word that would express
The measure of a mother's holy joy,
When God has given back to her her child
From death's dark portal! It surpasseth words.

THE CASKET.

FROM THE AMERICAN MONTHLY MAGAZINE.

UNWRITTEN MUSIC.

Tickler.—I will accompany you on the poker and tongs.

Shepherd.—I have no objections—for you've not only a sowl for music, sir, but a genius too, and the two dinna always gang together—mony a man basin' as fine an ear for tunes, as the starnies on a dewy nicht that listen to the grass growin' roun' the vernal priuros, and yet no able to play on any instrument—on even the flute—let abee the poker and tangs.—Noctes Ambrosia.

I AM not known as a lover of music. I seldom praise the player upon an instrument, or the singer of a song. I stand aside if I listen, and keep the measure in my heart, without beating it audibly with my foot, or moving my head visibly in a practised abstraction. There are times when I do not listen at all; and it may be that the mood is not on me, or that the spell of it is mastered by beauty, or that I hear a human voice whose very whisper is sweeter than it all. There are some who are said to have a passion for music, and they will turn away at the beginning of a song, though it be only a child's lesson, and leave gazing on an eye that was, perhaps, like shaded water, or the forehead of a beautiful woman, or the lip of a young girl, to listen. I cannot boast that my love of music is so strong. I confess there are things I know that are often an overcharm, though not always; and I would not give up my slavery to their power, if I might be believed to have gone mad at an opera, or have my "Bravo" the signal for the applause of a city.

There is unwritten music. The world is full of it. I hear it every hour that I wake, and my waking sense is surpassed sometimes by my sleeping—though that is a mystery. There is no sound of simple nature that is not music. It is all heaven's work, and so harmony. You may mingle and divide, and strengthen the passages of its great anthem, and it is still melody—melody. The low winds of summer blow over the waterfalls and the brooks, and bring their voices to your ear as if their sweetness was linked by an accurate finger; yet the wind is but a fitful player; and you may go out when the tempest is up, and hear the strong trees moaning as they lean before it, and the long grass hissing as it sweeps through, and its own solemn monotony over all—and the dimple of that same brook, and the waterfall's unaltered bass, shall still reach you in the intervals of its power, as much in harmony as before, and as much a part of its perfect and perpetual hymn. There is no accident of nature's causing which can bring in discord. The loosened rock may fall into the abyss, and the overblown tree rush down through the branches of the wood, and the thunder peal awfully in the sky; and, sudden and violent as these changes seem, their tumult goes up with the sound of winds and waters, and the exquisite ear of the musician can detect no jar.

I have read somewhere of a custom in the Highlands, which, in connexion with the principle it involves, is exceedingly beautiful. It is believed that, to the ear of the dying—which, just before death, becomes always exquisitely acute—the perfect harmony of the voices of nature is so ravishing, as to make him forget his suffering, and die gently, like one in a pleasant trance. And so, when the last moment approaches, they take him from close the shieling, and bear him out into the open sky, that he may hear the familiar rushing of the streams. I can believe that it is not superstition. I do not think we know how exquisitely nature's many voices are attuned to harmony, and to each other. The old philosopher we read of might not have been dreaming when he discovered that the order of the sky was like a scroll of written music, and that two stars—which are said to have appeared centuries after his death in the very places he mentioned—were wanting to complete the harmony. We know how wonderful are the phenomena of colour; how strangely like consummate art the strongest dyes are blended in the plumage of birds, and in the cups of flowers; so that, to the practised eye of the painter, the harmony is imitatively perfect. It is natural to suppose every part of the universe equally perfect, and it is a glorious and elevating thought, that the stars of heaven are moving on continually to music, and that the sounds we daily listen to are but a part of a melody that reaches to the very centre of heaven's illimitable spheres.

(Pardon me a digression here, reader. Aside from the intention of the custom just alluded to, there is something delightful in the thought of thus dying in the open air. I had always less horror of death than of its ordinary gloomy circumstance. There is something unnatural in the painful and extravagant sympathy with which the dying are surrounded. It is not such a gloomy thing to die. The world has pleasant places, and I would hear in my last hour the voices, and the birds, and the chance music I may have loved; but better music, and voices of more ravishing sweetness, and far pleasanter places, are found in heaven, and I cannot feel that it is well, or natural, to oppress the dying with the distressing wretchedness of common sorrow. I would be let go cheerfully from the world. I would have my friends comfort me and smile pleasantly on me, and feel willing that I should be released from sorrow, and perplexity, and disease, and go up, now that my race was finished, joyfully to my reward. And if it be allotted me, as I pray it will, to die in the summer time, I would be borne out beneath the open sky, and have my pillow lifted, that I might see the glory of the setting sun, and pass away, like him, with undiminished light, to another world.)

It is not mere poetry to talk of the "voices of summer." It is the day-time of the year, and its myriad influences are audibly at work. Even by night you may lay your ear to the ground, and hear that faintest of murmurs, the sound of growing things. I used to think when I was a child that it was fairy music. If you have been used to rising early, you have not forgotten how the stillness of the night seems increased by the timid note of the first bird. It is the only time when I would lay a finger on the lip of nature—the deep hush is so very solemn. By and by, however, the birds are all up, and the peculiar holiness of the hour declines—but what a world of music does the sun shine on! the deep lowing of the cattle blending in with the capricious warble of a thousand of heaven's happy creatures, and the stir of industry coming on the air like the undertones of a choir, and the voice of man, heard in the distance over all, like a singer among instruments, giving them meaning and language! And then, if your ear is delicate, you have minded how all these sounds grew softer and sweeter as the exhalations of dew floated up, and the vibrations loosened in the thin air.

You should go out some morning in June, and listen to the notes of the birds. They express, far more than our own, the characters of their owners. From the scream of the vulture and the eagle to the low cooing of the dove, they are all modified by their habits of support, and their consequent dispositions. With the small birds the voice seems to be but an outpouring of gladness, and it is pleasant to see that without one articulate word it is so sweet a gift to them; it seems a necessary vent to their joy of existence, and I believe in my heart that a dumb bird would die of its imprisoned fulness.

Nature seems never so utterly still to me as in the depth of a summer afternoon. The heat has driven in the birds, the leaves hang motionless in the trees, and no creature has the heart, in that faint sultriness, to utter a sound. The snake sleeps on the rock, and the frog lies breathing in the pool, and even the murmur that is heard at night is inaudible, for the herbage droops beneath the sun, and the seed has no strength to burst its covering. The world is still, and the pulses beat languidly. It is a time for sleep.

But if you would hear one of nature's most various and delicate harmonies, lie down in the edge of the wood when the evening breeze begins to stir, and listen to its coming. It touches first the silver foliage of the birch, and the slightly hung leaves, at its nearest breath, will lift and rustle like a thousand tiny wings, and then it creeps up to the tall fir, and the fine tassels send out a sound like a low whisper, and, as the oak feels its influence, the thick leaves stir heavily, and a deep tone comes suddenly out like the echo of a far-off bassoon. They are all wind-harps of different power, and as the breeze strengthens and sweeps equally over them all, their united harmony has a wonderful grandeur and beauty.

Then what is more soothing than the dropping of the rain? You should have slept in a garret to know how it can lull and bring dreams. How I have lain, when a boy, and listened to the fitful patter of the large drops upon the roof, and held my breath as it grew fainter and fainter, till it ceased utterly, and I heard nothing but the rushing of the strong gust and the rattling of the panes. I used to say over my prayers and think of the apples I had stolen then! But were you ever out fishing upon a lake in a smart shower? It is like the playing of musical glasses. The drops ring out with a clear bell-like tinkle, following each other sometimes so closely that it resembles the winding of a distant horn; and then, in the momentary intervals, the bursting of the thousand tiny bubbles comes stealthily on your ear, more like the recollection of a sound than a distinct murmur. Not that I fish; I was ever a milky-hearted boy, and had a foolish notion that there was pain in the restless death of those panting and beautiful creatures; but I loved to go out with the old men when the day set in with rain, and lie dreamily over the gunwale listening to the changes of which I have spoken. It had a quieting effect on my temper, and stilled for a while the uneasiness of that vague longing that is like a fever at a boy's heart.

There is a melancholy music in autumn. The leaves float sadly about with a look of peculiar desolateness, wavering capriciously in the wind, and falling with a just audible sound that is a very sigh for its sadness. And then, when the breeze is fresher—though the early autumn months are mostly still—they are swept on with a cheerless rustle over the naked harvest fields and about in the eddies of the blast; and though I have sometimes, in the glow of exercise, felt my life securer in the triumph of the brave contrast, yet in the chill of evening, or when any sickness of mind or body was upon me, the moaning of those withered leaves has pressed down my heart like a sorrow, and the cheerful fire and the voices of my many sisters might scarce remove it.

Then, for the music of winter, I love to listen to the falling of the snow. It is an unobtrusive and sweet music. You may temper your heart to the serenest mood by its low murmur. It is that kind of music that only intrudes upon your ear when your thoughts come languidly. You need not hear it if your mind is not idle. It realizes my dream of another world, where music is intuitive like a thought, and comes only when it is remembered.

And the frost too has a melodious "ministry." You will hear its crystals shoot in the dead of a clear night, as if the moonbeams were splintering like arrows on the ground; and you listen to it the more earnestly that it is the going on of one of the most cunning and beautiful of nature's deep mysteries. I know nothing so wonderful as the shooting of a crystal. Heaven has hidden its principle as yet from the inquisitive eye of the philosopher, and we must be content to gaze on its exquisite beauty, and listen in mute wonder to the noise of its invisible workmanship. It is too fine a knowledge for us. We shall comprehend it when we know how the "morning stars sang together."

You would hardly look for music in the dreariness of the early winter. But before the keener frosts set in, and while the warm winds are yet stealing back occasionally like regrets of the departed summer, there will come a soft rain or a heavy mist; and, when the north wind returns, there will be drops suspended like earring-jewels between the filaments of the cedar tassels and in the feathery edges of the dark green hemlocks, and, if the clearing up is not followed by a heavy wind, they will all be frozen in their places like well set gems. The next morning the warm sun comes out, and by the middle of the calm, dazzling forenoon, they are all loosened from the close touch which sustained them, and will drop at the lightest motion. If you go along upon the south side of the wood at that hour, you will hear music. The dry foliage of the summer's shedding is scattered over the ground, and the round, hard drops ring out clearly and distinctly as they are shaken down with the stirring of the breeze. It is something like the running of deep and rapid water, only more fitful and merrier; but to one who goes out in nature with his heart open, it is a pleasant music, and, in contrast with the stern character of the season, delightful.

Winter has many other sounds that give pleasure to the seeker for hidden sweetness; but they are too rare and accidental to be described distinctly. The brooks have a sullen and muffled murmur under their frozen surface; the ice in the distant river heaves up with the swell of the current and falls again to the bank with a prolonged echo, and the woodman's axe rings cheerfully out from the bosom of the unrobed forest. These are, at best, however, but melancholy sounds, and, like all that meets the eye in that cheerless season, they but drive in the heart upon itself. I believe it is so ordered in heaven's wisdom. We forget ourselves in the enticement of the sweet summer. Its music and its loveliness win away the senses that link up the affections, and we need a hand to turn us back tenderly, and hide from us the outward idols in whose worship we are forgetting the higher and more spiritual altars.

Hitherto I have spoken only of the sounds of irrational and inanimate nature. A better than these, and the best music under heaven, is the music of the human voice. I doubt whether all voices are not capable of it, though there must be degrees in it as in beauty. The tones of affection in all children are sweet, and we know not how much their unpleasantness in after life may be the effect of sin, and coarseness, and the consequent habitual expression of discordant passions. But we do know that the voice of any human being becomes touching by distress, and that, even on the coarse-minded and the low, religion and the higher passions of the world have sometimes so wrought, that their eloquence was like the strong passages of an organ. I have been much about in the world, and with a boy's unrest and a peculiar thirst for novel sensations, have mingled for a time in every walk of life; yet never have I known man or woman, under the influence of any strong feeling that was not utterly degraded, whose voice did not deepen to a chord of grandeur, or soften to cadences to which a harp might have been swept pleasantly. It is a perfect instrument as it comes from the hand of its Maker, and, though its strings may relax with the atmosphere, or be injured by misuse and neglect, it is always capable of being re-strung to its compass till its frame is shattered.

Men have seldom musical voices. Whether it is that their passions are coarser, or that their life of caution and reserve shuts up the kindness from which it would spring, a pleasant masculine voice is one of the rarest gifts of our sex. Whenever you do meet it, however, it is always accompanied either by noble qualities, or by that peculiar capacity for understanding all character, which Goethe calls a "presentiment of the universe," and which enables its possessor, without a spark of a generous nature himself, to know perfectly what it is in others, and to deceive the world by assuming all its accompaniments, and all its outward evidence. I speak now, and throughout these remarks, only of the conversational tone. A man may sing never so well, and still speak execrably; and I rarely have known a person who conversed musically, to sing even a tolerable song.

A good tone is generally the gift of a gentleman, for it is always low and deep; and the vulgar never possess the serenity and composure from which it alone can spring; they are always busy and hurried, and a high, sharp tone becomes habitual.

There is nothing like a sweet voice to win upon the confidence. It is the secret of the otherwise unaccountable success of some men in society. They never talk for more than one to hear, and to that one, if a woman, and attractive, it is a most dangerous, because unsuspected spell; and every one knows how the voice softens instinctively with the knowledge that but one ear listens, and that it is addressed without witnesses to one who cannot stand aside from herself and separate the enchanter from his music. It is an insidious and beguiling power; and I have seen men who, without any pretensions to dignity or imposing address, would arrest attention the moment their voices were heard; and who, if they leaned over to murmur in a woman's ear, were certain of pleasing, though the remark were the very idlest commonplace of conversation.

A sweet voice is indispensable to a woman. I do not think I can describe it. It can be, and sometimes is, cultivated. It is not inconsistent with great vivacity, but it is oftener the gift of the quiet and unobtrusive. Loudness or rapidity of utterance is incompatible with it. It is low, but not guttural; deliberate, but not slow. Every syllable is distinctly heard, but they follow each other like drops of water from a fountain. It is like the cooing of a dove—not shrill, nor even clear, but uttered with the subdued and touching readiness which every voice assumes in moments of deep feeling or tenderness. It is a glorious gift in woman. I should be won by it more than by beauty—more even than by talent, were it possible to separate them. But I never heard a deep, sweet voice from a weak woman. It is the organ of strong feeling, and of thoughts which have lain in the bosom till their sacredness almost hushes utterance. I remember listening in the midst of a crowd, many years ago, to the voice of a girl—a mere child of sixteen summers—till I was bewildered. She was a pure, high-hearted, impassioned creature, without the least knowledge of the world or her peculiar gift; but her own thoughts had wrought upon her like the hush of a sanctuary, and she spoke low, as if with an unconscious awe. I could never trifle in her presence. My nonsense seemed out of place, and my practised assurance forsook me utterly. She is changed now. She has been admired, and found out her beauty, and the music of her tone is gone! She will recover it by and by, when the delirium of the world is over, and she begins to rely once more upon her own thoughts for company; but her extravagant spirits have broken over the thrilling timidity of childhood, and the charm is unwound.

There was a lady whom I used to meet when a boy, as I loitered to school with my satchel in the summer mornings, and of whom, by and by, I came to dream, night and day, with a boy's impassioned and indefinite longing. She was a married woman, perhaps twenty years older than I, but very—very beautiful. She was like one's idea of a countess—large, but perfectly light and graceful, and with an eye of inexpressible softness and languor. I was certain she had a low delicious tone, and, as she passed me in the street, I used to fancy how the words must linger and melt on that red lip, with its deep coloured and voluptuous fullness. Years after, when I had become a man, I was introduced to her. I made some passing remark, and with my boyish impression still floating in my mind, waited almost breathlessly for her answer. When she did speak, I was perfectly electrified. Such a wonderful rapidity of utterance, such a volume of language, I never heard from the lips of a woman. My dream was over.

It was always a wonder to me, that the voice is so neglected in a fashionable education. There is a power in it over men, greater even than manner, for it is never suspected. Nothing repels like indifference, and indifference is a loud talker, to whom any body may listen, and whom, therefore, nobody cares to hear. But a low tone is redolent of the great secret of a woman's power—reliance! Nothing wins like reliance. Be it in manner or tone, it is alike irresistible. I have seen a woman who would captivate most men by simply leaning on their arm. It was the only thing she knew, and she did that beautifully. It is said more plainly than she could have spoken it, "I confide in you utterly;" and who, that had not been initiated, could resist such an appeal? There is something in words spoken softly, and meant for one's ear alone, which touches the heart like an enchantment. I never linger by a low-voiced woman if she is not young. It indicates either a most childlike innocence and truth, or it is the practised witchery of a woman of the world, who knows too well for me the secret of her power.

There are circumstances in which the simplest soul becomes awful. I once watched with a dying friend in a solitary farm-house. It was a clear, still night in December, and there was not a sound to be heard beyond his just audible breathing. It wanted but a quarter to one, and I began to anticipate the striking of the large clock which stood in the farthest corner of the room in which I sat. It was, at first, simply with reference to my friend's comfort, for he was in a gentle doze, and I feared it might wake him from the only sleep he had got that night. I sat looking at the clock. The minute hand crept slowly on. I began to feel a nervous interest in its progress, and, as it advanced visibly, I leaned over and grasped more firmly the arm of the huge chair. As it grew near, a strange fear began to curdle my blood, and I could feel my hair stir, as if each individual filament were withering at the root. It crept on—and on. There was but one minute left! I felt a smothering sensation at my heart, and it seemed to me as if my life must stop. But that one minute seemed to me an hour. Before it had expired, every event of my life had rushed through my memory, and the awful responsibility of time, and the aggregate of pain, and despair, and agony, that was felt by the hundreds who were dying at that moment, and the guilt that was festering, in the darkness, the hearts of those who may not sleep, and, over all, my own thoughtless and immeasurable prodigality of time, and health, and opportunity, crowded into my soul, as if its capacity were equal to the concentrated anguish of a demon. The machinery at last began to stir. It seemed to me as if every vein in my body was an icy worm. My nerves stretched to an intenser pitch—large drops of sweat rolled from my forehead, and my heart stopped—almost. It struck!—and I fell back in my chair, in a paroxysm of hysterical laughter! I have watched often since, and have been in situations far more calculated to excite terror, but nothing ever overcame me like that solitary vigil. I had been up night after night with my friend, and was certainly much unnerved by fatigue and exhaustion; but the circumstance furnishes matter of speculation to the inquirer after the phenomena of human nature.

The music of church bells has become a matter of poetry. Thomas Moore—whose mere sense of beauty is making him religious, and who knows better than any other man what is beautiful—has sung "those evening bells" in some of the most melodious of his elaborate stanzas. I remember, though somewhat imperfectly, a touching story connected with the church bells of a town in Italy, which had become famous all over Europe for their peculiar solemnity and sweetness. They were made by a young Italian artizan, and were his heart's pride. During the war, the place was sacked, and the bells carried off, no one knew whither. After the tumult was over, the poor fellow returned to his work; but it had been the solace of his life to wander about at evening and listen to the chime of his bells, and he grew dispirited and sick, and pined for them till he could no longer bear it, and left his home, determined to wander over the world and hear them once again before he died. He went from land to land, stopping in every village, till the hope that alone sustained him began to falter, and he knew at last that he was dying. He lay one evening in a boat that was slowly floating down the Rhine, almost insensible, and scarce expecting to see the sun rise again, that was now setting gloriously over the vine-covered hills of Germany. Presently, the vesper bells of a distant village began to ring, and, as the chimes stole faintly over the river with the evening breeze, he started from his lethargy. He was not mistaken: it was the deep, solemn, heavenly music of his own bells; and the sounds that he had thirsted for years to hear, were melting over the water. He leaned from the boat, with his ear close to the calm surface of the river, and listened. They rung out their hymn and ceased—and he still lay motionless in his painful posture. His companions spoke to him, but he gave no answer—his spirit had followed the last sound of the vesper chime.

There is something exceedingly impressive in the breaking in of church bells on the stillness of the Sabbath. I doubt whether it is not more so in the heart of a populous city than anywhere else. The presence of any single, strong feeling, in the midst of a great people, has something of awfulness in it which exceeds even the impressiveness of nature's breathless Sabbath. I know few things more imposing than to walk the streets of a city when the peal of the early bells is just beginning. The deserted pavements, the closed windows of the places of business, the decent gravity of the solitary passenger, and, over all, the feeling in your own bosom that the fear of God is brooding like a great shadow over the thousand human beings who are sitting still in their dwellings around you, were enough, if there were no other circumstance, to hush the heart into a religious fear. But when the bells peal out suddenly with a summons to the temple of God, and their echoes roll on through the desolate streets, and are unanswered by the sound of any human voice, or the din of any human occupation, the effect has sometimes seemed to me more solemn than the near thunder.

Far more beautiful, and, perhaps, quite as salutary as a religious influence, is the sound of a distant Sabbath bell in the country. It comes floating over the hills like the going abroad of a spirit, and as the leaves stir with its vibrations, and the drops of dew tremble in the cups of the flowers, you could almost believe that there was a Sabbath in nature, and that the dumb works of God rendered visible worship for his goodness. The effect of nature alone is purifying, and its thousand evidences of wisdom are too eloquent of their Maker not to act as a continual lesson; but combined with the instilled piety of childhood, and the knowledge of the inviolable holiness of the time, the mellow cadences of a church-bell give to the hush of the country Sabbath a holiness to which only a desperate heart could be insensible.

Yet, after all, whose ear was ever "filled with hearing," or whose "eye with seeing?" Full as the world is of music—crowded as life is with beauty which surpasses, in its mysterious workmanship, our wildest dream of faculty and skill—gorgeous as is the overhanging and ample sky, and deep and universal as the harmonies are which are wandering perpetually in the atmosphere of this spacious and beautiful world—who has ever heard music and not felt a capacity for better? or seen beauty, or grandeur, or delicate cunning, without a feeling in his inmost soul of unreachd and unsatisfied conceptions? I have gazed on the dazzling loveliness of woman till the value of my whole existence seemed pressed into that one moment of sight; and I have listened to music till my tears came, and my brain swam dizzily—yet, when I had turned away, I wished that the beauty of the woman had been perfecter; and my lips parted at the intensest ravishment of that dying music, with an impatient feeling that its spell was unfinished. I used to wonder, when I was a boy, how Socrates knew that this world was not enough for his capacities, and that his soul, therefore, was immortal. It is no marvel to me now.

STANZAS.

"In the letter from the Ipsariot women to the female Philhellenists of New-York, it is observed that many had thrown themselves into the sea to escape from the slavery and persecutions of their oppressors."

SPIRIT of Sappho! from the minstrel waters

That sing around thee in their coral caves,
While, o'er thee, Beauty's sympathetic daughters
Weep tears of crystal through the deep blue waves,
And from Leucadia's bloody steep the lyres
Of bards still crave one spark of Lesbian fires;"

For as there burns beneath the southern sea,
A fire, unquenched by wave, undimmed by wind,
So light the billows with thy harmony,
And brighten with thy unextinguished mind;
And there, till time untunes the lyric string,
Its sweetest song the poet's lip shall sing—

Yes, shade of Sappho! from the ocean swell,
That o'er thy slumber drops its emerald fold,
Bade the glad sea-nymphs sound the greeting shell,
And ope their halls of coral and of gold;
For ne'er did purer martyr spirits go
To meet the love-eyed Lesbian maid below.

Gather the bright-faced flowers around thee growing,
Which mortal eye hath seen not, nor shall see;
And when the monarch sun is seaward going,
Treasure the brightest beam he flings to thee:
To drown despair in the redeeming foam,
The young, the brave, the sinless seek thy home.

The foe came out with banner and with blade,
And struck the shrines of Greece with iron fire;
Vain was the shriek of mother and of maid,
And vain the vengeance of the frantic sire:
For, hydra-like, when fell one severed head,
Another fiercer bristled in its stead.

In th' unseen bowers where weeps the sea-bird's amber,
Flashed not th' Ipsariot conflagration down,
And, bursting through thy spirit-peopled chamber,
Look'd the expiring beam of Greek renown?
While desolation, like the deluge, fills
The deepest valleys and the loftiest hills.

Not thus in other times, mute queen of song!
For when the bold barbarian dared advance,
Some chief would scatter death their lines along,
Some goddess blast them with a single glance;
But now no Spartan sweeps the trembling field,
No Athens smiles beneath Minerva's shield.

E'en so, not thus shall they—the widowed daughters
Of men whose valour placed them 'mid the stars—
Be slaves to swell the pride of Turkish slaughters,
And yoke their limbs to their triumphal cars.
No! let the thunder of the slave descend—
'Twill break the soul, but it will never bend.

They rushed—devoted, youthful, fair, and brave—
They rushed to the giant steep, and cast
Their beauty and their sorrow to the wave,
And sank to ocean's chambers bright and vast.
And long shall Hellas' children weep above
The martyr-friends of liberty and love!

A HEALTH.

FILL high the cup!—the young and gay
Are met with bounding hearts to-night;
And sunny smiles around us play,
And eyes are sparkling bright:
Let wit and song the hours beguile,
But yet, amid this festal cheer,
Oh, let us pause to think awhile
Of him who is not here!

Fill high the cup!—yet ere its brim
One young and smiling lip has pressed,
Oh, pledge each sparkling drop to him
Now far o'er ocean's breast!
The cordial wish each lip repeats,
By every heart is echoed here;
For none within this circle beats,
To which he is not dear.

A sudden pause in festive glee—
What thought hath hushed the voice of mirth,
Hath checked each heart's hilarity,
And given to sadness birth?
O! read it in the shades that steal
Across each animated brow;
The wish none utters, yet all feel,
"Would he were with us now!"

Yet chase away each vain regret,
And let each heart once more be gay;
Trust me, the meeting hour shall yet
Each anxious thought repay.

Is not his spirit with us now?
Yes! wheresoe'er his footsteps roam,
The wanderer's yearning heart can know
No resting-place—but home!
Then smile again, and let the song
Pour forth its music sweet and clear—
What magic to those notes belong,
Which thus chain every ear!
Soft eyes are filled with tears—what spell
So suddenly hath called them there?
That strain—ah, yes! we know it well;
It is his favourite air.

With every note how forcibly
Return the thoughts of other days!
The shaded brow, the drooping eye,
Are present to our gaze.
With all around his looks are blest;
His form, is it not gliding there?
And was it not his voice which sent
That echo on the air?

One wish, with cordial feeling fraught,
Breathe we for him ere yet we part,
That for each high and generous thought
That animates his heart,
That Power which gives us happiness,
A blessing on his head would pour!
Oh! could affection wish him less?
Yet, could we ask for more?

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Rachel Dyer, a North American Story, by John Neal.—In the preface to this singular production, we are informed that it was originally prepared for Blackwood's Magazine, as the first of a series of North-American stories; and that it was the intention of the author, in writing it, among other things, to show that "personal beauty and intellectual beauty, or personal beauty and moral beauty, are not inseparably connected with, nor apportioned to, each other;" that "heroes are not, of necessity, six feet high, nor of a god-like shape, and that we may be deceived if we venture to judge of the inward by the outward man."

In the accomplishment of this his object, Mr. Neal has selected, for the time of his narrative, the period when the frightful belief in witchcraft was raging with irresistible power throughout the then province of Massachusetts Bay, and for his heroine, Rachel Dyer, one of the unhappy victims to that appalling and sanguinary superstition. In the fulfilment of his purpose, she is represented as the possessor of all mental beauty; of fortitude, meekness, charity, and almost every virtue; but in person as "a freckled witch, with red hair, and a hump on her back." To enhance the interest with which her character is invested, she is made to cherish in her inmost heart a hopeless passion; hopeless, because her younger and far lovelier sister loves the man, and is beloved again. This man, George Burroughs, is one of those strange unnatural characters in which Mr. Neal so much delights; a mysterious, inscrutable sort of being, half white man and half savage, endowed with supernatural strength both of mind and body, with surpassing beauty, irresistible eloquence, and a most surprising faculty of doing incredible and unaccountable things. In short, another Logan, or Harold, with rather less bloodthirstiness, and somewhat more discretion. The whole story consists of the fruitless efforts of this man to restrain the madness and fury of the people in their persecution of the fancied witches, and of his own final destruction; for he too is tried, condemned, and executed, together with the "laidley maiden" by whom he is beloved.

In the conduct of this novel, or rather history, Mr. Neal has exhibited precisely the same faults and excellencies that were found in "Keep Cool," which we believe was his first regular production—if that word "regular" can justly be applied to any thing of his. The faults are, in the first place, and above all, extravagance—overwhelming extravagance, both of language and of ideas. With him a storm is never simply a storm, but the most outrageous tempest that ever afflicted this poor suffering globe. His strong men out-Samson Samson; his warriors all surpass Achilles. Yet, amid all his extravagance of expression, he does sometimes hit upon most powerful combinations of words; as, for example, in the very first page of this volume, where he speaks of the great western wilderness as "a wood where half the men of Europe might easily hide from each other." Another fault is, that he is so very fond of making his locutors interrupt each other in their dialogues. It is scarcely possible to find, in any of his works, a speech with an honest full-stop at the end of it, signifying that the speaker has said all he has to say; but evermore there are dashes—dashes—and abrupt terminations, and interruptions, so that it is extremely difficult to puzzle out the meaning; as, for example,

"I heard all this—I had much reason to believe it—for every body that I knew believed it—I grew instantly weary of home—"

"Lights, there! lights—"

"I could not sleep for the desire I had to see that country—"

"You'd better stop a while, Mr. Burroughs—"

"And I lost no time in going to it—"

"Pull up where you are, but keep your face to the jury—"

Now this does very well, occasionally, to give spirit to the dialogue; but it is a dangerous instrument, and should be used sparingly, and with extreme caution; a truth of which Mr. Neal does not appear to be aware, for all his conversations are spoiled by his lavish expenditure of dashes.

But we like Mr. Neal too well—as a writer, that is; for we do not know him personally, and probably never shall—to take much pleasure in finding fault with him; we will, therefore, conclude this notice by giving to our readers our candid opinion of Rachel Dyer: it is well worth reading, notwithstanding all its faults; the author has great command of language, and is often very happy in his use of it; he has accumulated an immense store of ideas, some of them very good ones; his characters, although not always natural, are conceived and delineated with great power, and his incidents, albeit extravagant, are interesting. His books have that peculiar quality, wild and absurd as they sometimes are, of grasping and retaining the attention of the reader; each of them, as a whole, is bad, yet each of them contains bits that one would regret not having read; each of them, as a whole, is unintelligible, yet every body should read them, and by reading each of them something useful may be learned—and this is about all that can be said of Mr. John Neal.

The Talisman.—Mr. Bliss, the publisher of this admirable annual, has just announced to the public that he has for sale the works of Mr. Francis Herbert, in two volumes, bound to correspond with each other, and forming the commencement of a collection of tales and poems, that every American, or at least every citizen of New-York, ought to possess. The appearance of Mr. Herbert in the field of native literature, is an event worthy of commemoration; and the interest with which it must be viewed, is not a little heightened by the mystery that surrounds his character. It seems that he is not, by any means, a youthful man; yet until within the last year or two, his name has not been heard of; every body appears to know something about him, yet nobody knows himself, unless, indeed, it be Mr. Bliss, and he is as close as a minister of state. The writings which he has put forth have been received with admiration enough to flatter any man's vanity, yet no author was ever known to manifest so little concern for the reception of his labours as Mr. Herbert; it appears that his time is constantly employed in travelling from one end of the world to the other; and, by the way, the celerity of his movements is said to be astonishing in the highest degree, yet year after year brings forth a volume of exquisite little morceaux, the very writing of which, one would suppose to be sufficient occupation for any man during a twelvemonth.

We have lately looked over all the annuals of the present year, and it is with no small gratification that we have honestly arrived at the conclusion that the Talisman, published in our own city, is the best in literary merit; and that, in the beauty of its illustrations, it has but few superiors. We learn that the third volume is already in rapid progress.

The American Monthly Magazine.—This new periodical of Mr. Willis has at length appeared, and very creditable it is both to him and the "Literary Emporium," from whence it comes to us. The plan upon which it seems the work is to be conducted is similar to that of the poet Campbell's—the New Monthly Magazine of London. This first number contains some admirable specimens of composition; witness the leading article "Unwritten Music," which we have copied into our columns of to-day: to quote the editor's own words when reviewing another work, "It is a mass of beautiful words and musical expressions—flowers gathered indiscriminately from the author's imagination, like a child's lapful of roses, without stems." p. 70. In reading this production, we were strongly reminded of those delightful chapters which have appeared during the last two or three years in Blackwood's Magazine, under various appropriate titles, such as "Cottages," "Birds," "Streams," "May-day," &c. and which we could never tire of reading. The poetry, too, is very pretty. "The Shunammite"—obviously from the pen of the editor—is, in our opinion, the very best thing in the work; but our readers will judge for themselves. Mr. Bliss is the agent in this city, and we recommend the "Monthly Magazine" to the patronage of our citizens.

Literary Remains of Henry Neale.—We have received this long expected and interesting volume, but not in season for a notice in this week's Mirror. In our next number, we shall devote more space to its examination, and in the meantime we extract from its pages a clever article which originally appeared in the "News of Literature," in 1826, and is a favourable specimen of the work.

Scott's revised Edition of his Novels.—We are gratified in having it in our power to announce to our readers, that the suggestion which we threw out a few weeks since, has been adopted and acted upon. Messrs. Seymour, Clayton, Fanshaw, and Sleight, have undertaken a reprint of the forthcoming edition of the Waverley novels, revised and illustrated by the author himself. Every reading man will, of course, make an effort to include these volumes in his library, and therefore we doubt not that these intelligent publishers will find their undertaking as profitable as it is praiseworthy.

Memoirs of the Extraordinary Military Career of John Shipp, written by himself.—We have been, until now, prevented from noticing this new work, by the pressure of indispensable occupations, which left us no time to read it with sufficient attention to enable us to speak of its merits with accuracy. At this late period, it is hardly worth while to give an extended notice, particularly as Mr. Shipp has been largely commented on and quoted from by our contemporaries, and has, moreover, found favour in the eyes of the reading public. We cannot pass him by, however, without adding our mite to the general voice of commendation, for we owe him our thanks for the pleasure which we have found in following his chequered fortunes. There is every reason to believe that what he tells us, so far as he confines himself to what fell within his own knowledge, is strictly true; and the story is interesting in a high degree. His ideas upon the effects and tendency of corporal punishment, appear to us to be particularly worthy of attention. His opportunities for observation have been excellent, and the conclusions he draws from what he has seen, are sound and convincing.

Diversions of Hollycot.—This is the captivating title of an excellent little volume, recently published by W. B. Gilley, especially intended for the edification of children. It is pleasing to see talents so distinguished as those of the author of Clan-Albin, engaged in the cause of childhood; and the very fact that the "Diversions of Hollycot" are from her pen, is a sufficient recommendation.

Miss Sterling.—The Musical Fund concert, which took place on Tuesday evening, the twenty-first ultimo, was completely successful. A more crowded, brilliant, or fashionable assembly has seldom been convened at the city-hotel. On this occasion, the interesting and highly gifted young lady whose name stands at the commencement of this paragraph, made her first appearance before an American public. We have already noticed her astonishing and soul-entrancing performances, and shall, therefore, at this time, content ourselves with merely transcribing the following brief remarks from a morning paper:

"Miss Sterling's style of execution on the piano-forte, put the dilettante almost out of their wits. It was delightful, highly finished, or what the French would call superbe! magnifique! and even to those who could not enjoy the mysterious delights of splendid execution, the winning grace with which Miss Sterling went through the performance, was not the smallest portion of enchantment."

May-day.—None respect more than we do, the good old customs of our worthy Dutch ancestors; none are more anxious to preserve the landmarks which designate our rights to the hereditary virtues, the unbending integrity, and the unostentatious and simple manners of the New-Netherlanders, who once graced the soil of this island by their righteous and peaceable lives, and whose bones are mingled with the kindred earth on which we now so lightly tread. We deplore the abandonment of the frail, but enticing pipe, whose columns of smoke, as they slowly issued from the lengthened and cylindrical stem, curled in beauteous wreaths up into the balmy atmosphere of Manahatta's isle; we regret the absence of the genuine Geneva from the social board—the temperance society to the contrary notwithstanding—and we often shed tears of piteous sorrow as we behold the merciless, the ruthless destruction of those substantial Rotterdam-brick edifices, whose gable ends—studded with clamps of iron, and bearing their date, like good old Madeira, on their honest fronts—were wont to adorn our narrow, but clean streets. But we must, nevertheless—while we cheerfully give in to the custom of regularly moving on the first of May, and avow our unabated and unbounded veneration for the profound sagacity which instituted it, and the still more profound wisdom which has hallowed, and embalmed, and preserved it to the present day—we must confess, that the weight of the burden is sorely heavy: mind and body are distracted; the soul scarcely knows its abiding place, and wishes for the wings of a dove, that it might flee away and be at rest. Look there at that escutcheon of our friend J.; it is taken down; alas! where shall we now sit and idly our delightfully entertaining and instructive articles for the Mirror? His books, too—see how they lie!

"Tully's hide to Sappho's leather,
"All are displaced and mixed together."

How we shall manage to call up our thoughts again, to bid them resume their wonted channels, and once more follow their former current, we know not. All is noise to the ear, and disfigurement to the eye. Servants and their brooms, cartmen and their ropes, barrowmen and their precarious burdens, women and their impatient commands, dust, and chaos, and destruction, are the order of the day! We would finish this article; but it is impossible: the commingling of blue spirits and gray, white spirits and black, forbid.

"Fair is foul, and foul is fair.
"Hover through the bog and filthy air."

Expedition.—It is stated, in one of the London papers, that Mr. Peele's great speech upon the Catholic emancipation bill, was commenced at about half-past five o'clock, and concluded at ten; and that in thirty minutes afterwards, a copy of the Sun newspaper was handed to him, containing the whole of his harangue. This is wonderful rapidity. The manner in which it is effected is thus: four reporters are employed, each of whom attends in rotation for about ten or twelve minutes; he then hurries off to the printing-office, commits to writing what he has heard, and flies back to the house to take his station in the gallery once more. Very few of these reporters avail themselves of the assistance of stenography, but trust almost entirely to memory. Their pay is from thirty shillings to three guineas a week.

Miss Cramer.—The benefit of this pleasing actress will take place at the Bowery theatre, on Wednesday next, when Mr. Plumer, the vocalist, whose fame has reached us from abroad, will sustain, for the first time in this city, the character of Young Meadows. The whole bill of fare is certainly attractive, and we wish Miss C. a full house.

EDITH.

EDITH! o'er the waters blue
Ere I'm gone, my love, adieu!
Ere from hence I fly away,
Hear, oh hear me, while I pray!
Oh! whate'er may be my lot,
Edith, love, forget me not!

When you see this shady scene,
Where, together, we have been;

When yon babbling brook you view,
Which so oft we've listened to;
When you see my father's cot,
Edith, love, forget me not!

By the power thou hast to grieve me—
By the thoughts that will not leave me—
By the fear that will not fly—
By the hope that cannot die—
By this sacred parting spot—
Edith, love, forget me not!

O'er the waters when I ride,
Thou shalt o'er my thoughts preside;
In the battle's wild affray,
Thou shalt hold thy wonted sway;
Then, whate'er may be my lot,
Edith, love, forget me not!

Yet one—yet another kiss!
Then, adieu to you and bliss!
Oh! what anguish 'tis to part
From the ruler of my heart!

Edith, sweet, forget me not—
Thou canst never be forgot.

PART III.

"Oh how this spring of love resembleth
"Th' uncertain glory of an April day,
"Which now shows all the beauty of the sun,
"And by and by a cloud takes all away!"

"FLY, Charles, fly instantly; your safety and my happiness are at stake. By a little ingenious shuffling, I prevented my father from visiting this room; and what a scene then!" exclaimed Julia, as she entered and closed the door of the apartment. "Haste, Charles, haste, for the sake of life and love! I am this day expected to recognise the devoirs of some old captain in one of the king's regiments, and much delay on your part will subject me to the agony of an interview." She briefly repeated the conversation she had had with her father; then hastily penned a letter to him, declaratory of her decision and intention to accompany Charles in his flight; and, having sealed it, hastened to procure the desired papers for him. He was still sitting as she had left him, and his aged brows were beaming with the expectation of "the happiest change," as he termed it, "that had hitherto gladdened his domestic life."

"You have been rather long, Julia," said he, as she entered; "but the key is rusty, from disuse, I suppose. Ay, these are the very articles. You must know, Julia, that the captain is no prodigal—no builder of castles in the air; and, in such hands, these will be valuable. Now, let me just explain the difference between their fate in less experienced hands. First—but you have not yet changed that unsuitable dress; go, go, and be expeditious; your mother was rather tasty that way, too, you know. Oh, could she but see Julia now, how blest would she be to witness her! But, ha! what have we here? the address is Julia's handwriting—one of her school letters, I presume; but, no, 'tis quite fresh, and sealed, as I live! Let me see!"—He opened and read,

DEAR FATHER—For seven or eight days, Charles Desmond has been under your roof. Jane Neville knew him among the wounded, as he lay at our door on the fatal fifth. Could I refuse my permission to her to save the life of an old playmate, and a fellow-creature? That life is saved—must I add, for me? Ere you shall have received this, we shall be beyond the reach of vengeance. He has erred—so have the bravest and the best, at all times, and in all countries; but I feel I love him; that love is old as my childhood. Ought I to divide my hand and heart? No; it would be the cause of my misery; and, knowing your paternal affection, I venture to say, it would give you no ultimate happiness. Farewell, for awhile; and, among your thoughts of what you, no doubt, believe my imprudence, let there sometimes come the redeeming one, that I still am your affectionate daughter,

JULIA DONNELL.

This was the letter which she had just written, and determined to transmit through the post-office; but, in the heedless hurry of her search for the papers, and the confusion of her situation, she had inadvertently laid it among them, and thus anticipated its delivery by many hours.

It is scarcely necessary to say that Donnell did not engage in his review of the papers: he flung them aside—started up—called his servant, and desired him to proceed instantly to the house of George Wiseman, who acted as a peace-officer in the town, and say that his presence, with a small military guard, was necessary. "Let not a second person know your errand," said he; "and be quick." The old man then resumed his seat, and Julia entered, having changed her dress.

"What think you of me now, father? does this please you?"

"By no means, girl; you were far fairer when I last looked upon you. That gown is fitter for an elopement than the reception of a lover; and these shoes—why, Julia, I should consider them almost too coarse for travelling as the wife of a rebel."

"Your reproach is rather severe, sir," said Julia, as her consciousness of its applicableness suffused her cheeks with crimson.

"Severe! yes, indeed, Julia; more severe than I could have wished. But, to put an end to this farce, know you that?" and he flung the letter on the table with a maddening emphasis.

Julia seized it—held it at arm's length before her scarce-believing eyes—stood statue-like for one agonised moment—clasped her trembling hands together—shrieked, and fell back into her chair. Ere her father had left his seat, Charles, directed by the "well-known voice," entered the room. What was his life, if her's was in peril? He first seized the sword that stood naked against the wall, and was about to address the father, when the door was opened, and the clatter of bayonets was heard in the hall. Charles knew his own character. "And what," said he, "is the business of armed military here, if not to secure my person?" There was little time for consideration—he darted forward into the entrance.

"Seize him—he is a rebel!" cried the father; "the blood of loyalty is on his hands!"

"He is mine, he is mine—save him! save him!" Julia exclaimed.

"Nay," said Charles, lifting his bold, but unimpassioned voice above the others, "he who first comes within the reach of this blade, adds one to my victims."

At the head of this military party, was a man whom we have had occasion to introduce, in the earlier portion of our narrative, to the reader, as an insurrectionary leader, and whose real character Charles now understood from Julia's letter. To the interference of such suborned villains has Ireland to ascribe most of those vampire misfortunes that, without breaking the dream of her insecure repose, sucked the life-blood from her veins. Charles Desmond instantly recognised him, and saw the demon-sneer upon his lip, as if he would say,

Farewell, sweet spirit! not in vain you die,
If Eblis loves you half so well as I.

"Soldiers, do your duty," said Wiseman. At these words, Charles sprung forward with the ferocity of the tiger—covered his sword in the heart of the director, and resumed his position with sufficient activity to keep the soldiers at bay. They were armed only with bayonets, and, before they could succeed in apprehending him, two of them had mingled their blood with that of the treacherous spy. Further resistance was vain, indeed impossible, for he had been dangerously wounded.

"As you are men," said Charles, addressing the soldiers, "I conjure you to let me behold and embrace, once more, the idol of my affections."

"Bear him off, bear him off—the rebel! the murderer!" exclaimed Donnell.

"Oh, heed him not—he is cruel!" continued Charles—"and she—look, she is dying! she is dying!" This unexpected and alarming scene had thrown Julia into an hysterical fit, from which she had not yet recovered. Charles made one effort to reach her, but the military dragged him back.

"This," said one of them, "is the rascal who attacked the main guard; d—n me, if we give him even praying time;" and they pulled him along to the prison, where he had the additional misfortune to meet with many whom he had known in his native village, and who had been cajoled by the same wretch.

When Julia had recovered, she beheld the waste of blood that flowed around. "What," said she, "is Charles lost to me? is my love, and my hope, and my life sacrificed? then farewell home, and"—She became inaudible as she rushed through the hall to the street, where the track of fresh blood-drops led her to the prison. There she was informed, by some of the spectators, of Charles's committal, and, gazing on the blood that spattered the entrance, supplicated admission. Here the scene became too melancholy—too frantic for description: her prayers and exertions were fruitless; and, in despair and wretchedness of heart, she saw the heavy door barred against her, and felt that he was for ever excluded from her sight.

She would not return to a house which was no longer a home, but wandered about the country, particularly that place which was so sacred to her, as the scene of her first love and her most unclouded recollections. A settled delirium soon seized upon her young mind; and, after a melancholy and short interval, she died, but not in the knowledge that her affectionate and unfortunate Charles, with his usual fearlessness, and the returning aid of "that untaught, innate philosophy," which had, at one period, made mankind generally the objects of his aversion, had perished under the hand of the law; and, in his last moments, "sanctified," as himself joyfully exclaimed, "his dying lips with the name of the purest and fondest woman that ever lived."

THE ESSAYIST.

RHYME AND REASON.

He whose life has not been one continued monotony; he who has been susceptible of different passions, opposite in their origins and effects, needs not to be told, that the same objects, the same scenes, the same incidents, strike us in a variety of lights, according to the temper and inclination with which we survey them. To borrow an illustration from external scenes—if we are situated in the centre of a shady valley, our view is confined and our prospect bounded; but if we ascend the topmost heights of the mountain by which that valley is overshadowed, the eye wanders luxuriantly over a perpetual succession of beautiful objects, until the mental faculties appear to catch new freedom from the extension of the sight; we breathe a purer air, and are inspired with purer emotions.

Thus it is with men who differ from each other in their tastes, their studies, or their professions. They look on the same external objects with a different internal perception; and the view which they take of surrounding scenes is beautified or distorted, according to their predominant pursuit, or their prevailing inclination.

We were led into this train of ideas by a visit which we lately paid to an old friend, who, from a strong taste for agricultural pursuits, has abandoned the splendour and absurdity of a town life, and devoted to the cultivation of a large farming establishment, in a picturesque part of country, all the advantages of a strong judgment and a good education. His brother, on the contrary, who was a resident at the farm during our visit, has less of sound understanding than of ardent genius, and is more remarkable for the warmth of his heart than the soundness of his head. In short, to describe them in a word, Jonathan sees with the eye of a merchant, and Charles with that of an enthusiast; Jonathan is a man of business, and Charles is a poet. The contrast between their tempers is frequently the theme of conversation at the social meetings of the neighbourhood; and it is always found that the old and the grave shake their heads at the almost boyish enthusiasm of Charles; while the young and the imprudent indulge in severe sarcasms at the mercenary and uninspired moderation of his brother. All parties, however, concur in admiring the uninterrupted cordiality which subsists between them, and in laughing good-humouredly at the various whims and foibles of these opposite characters, who are known throughout the country by the titles of "Rhyme" and "Reason."

We arrived at the farm as Jonathan was sitting down to his substantial breakfast. We were delighted to see our old friend, now in the decline of life, answering so exactly the description of Cowper,

"An honest man close-button'd to the chin, Broad cloth without, and a warm heart within."

We felt an inward satisfaction in contemplating his frieze coat, whose debut we remember to have witnessed five years ago, and in speculating upon the snows which five additional winters had left upon his head since our last interview. It was some time before we recovered sufficiently from our reverie to inquire after the well-being of our younger companion, who had not yet made his appearance at the board.

"Oh!" said Jonathan, "Charles is in his hey-day years; we must indulge him for the present; we can't expect such regularity from five-and-twenty as from six-and-fifty."

He had hardly done speaking, when a loud halloo sounded as an avant-courier of Charles's approach, and in less than a minute he presented himself before us.

"Ten thousand pardons!" he cried.

"One's enough," said his brother.

"I've seen the finest sun-rise," said Charles.

"You're wet through," said Jonathan.

"I'm all over rapture," said Rhyme.

"You're all over dirt," said Reason.

With some difficulty Charles was persuaded to retire for the re-adjustment of his dress, while the old man continued his meal with a composure which proved he was not unused to the morning excursions of his volatile yoke-fellow. By the time he had got through his beefsteak and three columns of the newspaper, Charles re-entered, and despatched the business of eating with a rapidity in which many a modern half-starved rhymist would be glad to emulate him. A walk was immediately proposed; but the one had scarcely reached an umbrella, and the other prepared his manuscript book, when a slight shower of rain prevented our design.

"Provoking," said Rhyme.

"Good for the crop," said Reason.

The shower, however, soon ceased, and a fine clear sun encouraged us to resume our intentions, without fear of a second disappointment. As we walked over the estate, we were struck with the improvements made by our friend, both as regarded the comfort and the value of the property; while now and then we could not suppress a smile, on observing the rustic arbour which Charles had designed, or the verses which he had inscribed on our favourite old oak.

It was determined that we should ascend a neighbouring hill, which was dear to us from its having been the principal scene of our boyhood's amusements.

"We must make haste," said Charles, "or we shall miss the view."

"We must make haste," said Jonathan, "or we shall catch cold on our return."

Their actions seemed always to amalgamate, though their motives were always different. We observed a tenant of our friend ploughing a small field, and stopped a short time to regard the contented appearance of the man, and the cheerful whistle with which he called to his cattle.

"Beatus ille qui procul negotiis," said the poet.

"A poor team, though," said his brother.

Our attention was next excited by a level meadow, whose green hue, set off by the mixture of the white fleeces of a beautiful flock of sheep, was, to the observer of nature, a more enviable sight than the most studied landscape of the artist's pencil.

"Lovely colours!" ejaculated Charles.

"Fine mutton," observed Jonathan.

"Delightful scene for a rustic hop!" cried the enthusiast.

"I am thinking of planting hops," said the farmer.

We reached the summit of the hill, and remained for some moments in silent admiration of one of the most variegated prospects that ever the country presented to the contemplation of its most ardent admirer. The mellow verdure of the meadows, intermingled here and there with the sombre appearance of ploughed land, the cattle reclining in the shade, the cottage of the rustic peeping from behind the screen of a luxuriant hedge, formed a tout-ensemble which every eye must admire, but which few pens can describe.

"A delightful landscape!" said Charles.

"A rich soil," said Jonathan.

"What scope for description!" cried the first.

"What scope for improvement!" returned the second.

As we returned, we passed the cottage of the peasant, whom we had seen at his plough in the morning. The family were busily engaged in their several domestic occupations. One little chubby-faced rogue was conducting Dobbin to his stable, another was helping his sister to coop up the poultry, and a third was incarcerating the swine, who made a vigorous resistance against their youthful antagonist.

"Tender!" cried Rhyme—he was listening to the nightingale.

"Very tender!" replied Reason—he was looking at the pigs.

As we drew near home, we met an old gentleman walking with his daughter, between whom and Charles a reciprocal attachment was said to exist. The lateness of the evening prevented much conversation, but the few words which were spoken again brought into contrast the opposite tempers of my friends.

"A fine evening, madam," said the man of sense, and bowed.

"I shall see you to-morrow, Mary!" said the lover, and pressed her hand.

We looked back upon her as she left us.

After a pause—"She is an angel!" sighed Charles.

"She is an heiress," observed Jonathan.

"She has ten thousand perfections!" cried Rhyme.

"She has ten thousand dollars," said Reason.

We left them the next morning, and spent some days in speculations on the causes which enabled such union of affections to exist with such diversities of taste. For ourselves, we must confess, that while Reason has secured our esteem, Rhyme has run away with our hearts; we have sometimes thought with Jonathan, but we have always felt with Charles.

YOUTHFUL FRIENDSHIPS.

Youth, the season of unsuspecting openness and disinterested zeal, of buoyant hope and cheerful confidence, presents to us the happiest division in the life of man. Ambition has, as yet, exercised but little influence, and pride sustained but few disappointments. Temper is not yet embittered by unexpected frustration, nor is exertion checked by insuperable competition. Animated by the gay perspective of future prospects, youth ever casts off the consciousness of care; and, in the contemplation of happiness, present or to come, delights to dwell upon the glittering scene of promise and expectation. Associated in the enjoyment of these exhilarating ideas with others, sharing equally the gladness and the glory of its hopes, it pursues with avidity the same path, which leads to the stations of distinction, and opens to future views of elevation and of honour. The struggle is that of sport, and, like it, concludes with satisfaction; the witnesses of the contest, the partners in the success, and the least prosperous in the fortune of the fray, unite to revivify dejected hope, and rekindle the spirit of emulation. The influence which this reciprocal communication of sentiment, this continual contact of mental power and acquirement, possesses over our society, is unlimited: it binds the most distant in the closest union to one another, and first discovers to them the necessity and the usefulness of mutual dependence. For within this varied scene of exertion and inactivity, there always will be those who press forward with impatience to the different degrees of merit and reputation; while there will be others, who as eagerly decline the restraint of application and the sacrifice of abstraction; who depend for present assistance and freedom from labour on the efforts of the studious, for whom, in after-days, they rationally hope to reserve due tributes of gratitude and esteem, anxiously considering the success and fame of their friends as involved in the event of every action over which their interest and inclination enjoy even a partial control; since, in the perfect exercise of genuine friendship, no advantage can attend either party in which both do not equally participate; for surely they shall be strong in the strength, wealthy in the wealth, and powerful in the influence of each other; their friendship shall change storms and tempests in the affections to a day of sunshine, and out of darkness and confusion of thoughts shall bring daylight on the understanding. But there are many connexions, less interested in the commencement, which may prove more beneficial in the event; for such as are founded on personal predilection, or intellectual appreciation, are secured by affection, and confirmed by respect. These have been known to survive the sprightliness and the prime of life, and remain constant even to "the murmurs of peevishness and the dreams of dotage;" till, when those aged companions have shaken off their load of years, and gone to rest in the peacefulness of the tomb, the memory of their virtue is bequeathed as a monitor to surviving friends, and a cheering director to re-union in a happier world.

If there is felicity in cherishing the social tendencies of the human heart, or if there is advantage in cultivating the social relations of human life, how sincere and pure a pleasure we feel in perusing the simple dialogues of the Roman philosopher, which perpetuate the memory of the best and wisest men, who have filled the world with history and wonder—who have displayed, even in chains and in death, the power of attachment and the spell of affection, and left to posterity the sense of that sublime generosity and moral beauty, which is calculated to produce the most beneficial effects both on the state of general society and the constitution of individual sensibility. But these ancient pairs, as their conduct toward each other was influenced by esteem and love, so their actions in the world were governed by unblemished integrity; the course of their happy and honourable days terminated, as they commenced, in the light of virtue. For to them what was more beautiful than virtue? It refined their intentions, and sublimed their thoughts; it endued them with dignified notions of their relative situations, and spread a sanctity over that closest and gentlest of all endearments, the bosom friend.

It is a chastening task to review the steady friendships of such venerable characters; but to calculate on each impulse or caprice which excite and regulate our age of enthusiasm, would be the wildest among the absurdities of cold speculation. To measure the ardour which hurries forward the execution of precipitate designs and the declaration of incautious opinions, is to attempt impossibilities, and struggle against the laws of reason. For the commencement has been appropriately termed the romance of life: its most unaccustomed scenes are succeeded by novelties more unexpected; the transitions and the changes in its situations are rapid and brilliant; admiration is attracted by the lustre of dazzling possession, and rapture elicited in the delight of luxurious gratification. But the splendour of the pageant serves only to disguise its own unsubstantial and transitory nature, since the next stage of existence reduces the aspiring and unequal thoughts of man to a level with the sober realities of common life. He now discovers the capriciousness of accidental intimacy; the possibility of friendships being obliterated; the warmth of feeling frozen into courteous formality; and the unaffected zealous eagerness of regard checked and bridled into managed condescension. He sees men looking abroad into the world with circumspect reserve and deliberate caution, reposing confidence in no assistance and fidelity but their own—their little centres of their narrow systems.

the sole objects of their solicitude and labour. Under such impressions, without great violence, he may in some respects compare such a state of society to that of the ancient barons, when "every man's house was his castle," and his sword the only means which the occasion and the law allowed him for defence. He may, indeed, think himself free from personal violence, at least possessed of sufficient remedies for such abuses; but he will discover a painful reality, that he is scarcely free from insidious circumvention, and barely protected from treacherous importunity: he may be stung by the lifeless adder, which he had imprudently warmed on his hearth; he may be plundered by the houseless steward, to whose hands he had confided the advancement and preservation of his wealth. From this sickening view of worthlessness and corruption, he will look with transport to the days that are gone, when the advanced experience of life had not as yet disclosed the alloy which lurked beneath so brilliant, yet so slight a covering, so near the surface; the brightness of which was so speedily tarnished, and the substance so easily worn away. He will find the consolation of this bitter season, in early recollections connected with former pleasures, unsullied and without alloy; far different from those transitory enjoyments, so happily compared to the crackling of burning thorns, the sound of which is just heard as it is silenced—the flame just seen as it sinks into ashes.

From such prospects we have ventured to remove the veil which the thoughtlessness of boyhood spreads across the range of its vision. If their aspect is calculated to check impatience for that freedom from restraint, which presents itself with unreal attractions to the imagination; if their description tends to recall the fancy from that eccentricity to which it had been propelled in search of treasures without value, and objects without existence, to its natural course, or determine the relative proportion of happiness and misery allotted to the young and to the old—we shall rest satisfied with the picture we have drawn; and in the hope that it will attach the memory and the affections of those for whom it is designed, to the scenes and associations of their early days, we are content to resign it to their hands, without adding another embellishment, which may endanger the reputation, or weaken the impression of our labour.

DEFERRED ARTICLES.

LAWS OF HONOUR.

A DUEL was lately fought at Startbourg between two ladies, one French and the other German, on a quarrel about a young miniature painter. The combatants met, pistol in hand, and each attended by a female second. The German was furious, and insisted on fighting muzzle to muzzle; but the Frenchwoman, regulating her conduct by the advice of her second, stood out for twenty-five paces. They fired together, and missed. The German then insisted on their approaching, and firing until either fell. The seconds, however, now interposed, and declaring that the laws of honour were satisfied, took away the pistols, and the affair ended; but without any apology. The fair Frenchwoman, before leaving the ground, handsomely professed herself not actuated by any personal hostility. "She had thought it due to her honour to take a shot with the German; but now that the affair was at an end, the lady was welcome to the miniature painter, whom she had forbidden her presence that very morning." The German was a baroness, and the Frenchwoman the wife of a general of division.

ONE HUNDRED YEARS AGO.

The following, from a paper published in London in 1723, will illustrate the difference between the present times and a century past: "Tuesday, January, 1723. On Sunday a woman was seized near London-wall for wearing a gown faced with calico; and being brought before a magistrate, and refusing to pay the penalty inflicted by the statute, she was committed to the compter." The importation of cotton wool last year, exceeded twenty nine million pounds. What would the good lady say to the magistrate if she could return and see the cotton articles now in use? What was Manchester in those days?

Married at Bristol, Master Daniel Fish, aged eighteen, to Mrs. Neoma Small, aged forty-five, more or less, after a long and sentimental courtship of no time at all!

THE SERENADE.

"The maiden paused, as if again
"She thought to catch the distant strain,
"With head upraised, and look intent,
"And ear and eye attentive bent,
"And locks flung back, and lips apart,
"Like monument of Grecian art."

ANNA, list! the zephyrs play
Over the blue wave fleetly;
And the boatman's distant roundelay
Breaks on the still night sweetly.
Ope the casement—open wide—
Let us drink the moonbeam's light;
Like a proudly-glitt'ring bride,
Rides she through the clouds of night.

O 'tis sweet—the hour I love—
The lovely hour of placid even;
Thus to let our spirits rove,
And mingle with the stars of heaven.

Nature sleeps—and all around
A holy silence spreads her reign;
Save the sheep-bell, not a sound
Is heard along the tranquil plain.

While the halcyon calm we view,
Anxious cares and troubles fly;
We the bliss that's past renew—
Breathe to absent love a sigh.

Hark! a lute—I heard its tone—
Again the sound salutes my ear:
Who the wand'rer late and lone,
Thus that joys rude night to cheer?

"List thee, Anna, list, I pray"—
Softly steals the melody—
Sweet the voice, and sweet the lay,
Floating o'er the silent sea.

TIME'S CHANGES.

There was a child, a helpless child,
Full of vain fears and fancies wild,
That often wept, and sometimes smiled,
Upon its mother's breast;
Feebly its meanings stammered out,
And tottered tremblingly about,
And knew no wider world without
Its little home of rest.

There was a boy, a light-heart boy,
One whom no troubles could annoy,
Save some lost sport, or shattered toy,
Forgotten in an hour;
No dark remembrance troubled him,
No future fear his path could dim,
But joy before his eyes would swim,
And hope rise like a tower.

There was a youth, an ardent youth,
Full of high promise, courage, truth;
He felt no scathe, he knew no ruth,
Save love's sweet wounds alone;
He thought but of two soft blue eyes,
He sought no gain but beauty's prize,
And sweeter held love's saddest sighs,
Than music's softest tone.

There was a man, a wary man,
Whose bosom nursed full many a plan
For making life's contracted span
A path of gain and gold;
And how to sow, and how to reap,
And how to swell his shining heap,
And how the wealth acquired to keep,
Secure within its fold.

There was an old, old, gray-haired one,
On whom had fourscore winters done
Their work appointed, and had spun
His thread of life so fine,
That scarce its thin line could be seen,
And with the slightest touch, I ween,
'Twould be as it had never been,
And leave behind no sign.

And who were they, those five, whom fate
Seemed as strange contrasts to create,
That each might, in his different state,
The others' pathways shun?
I tell thee, that, that infant vain,
That boy, that youth, that man of gain,
That gray-beard, who did roads attain
So various—they were one!

TEARS.

Oh, those tears,
If they were true and rightly spent, would raise
A flowery spring in the midst of January;
Celestial ministers, with crystal cups,
Would stoop to save them for immortal drink!

THE FIREMAN.

Talk of the courage of cavaliers and warriors! It is all well enough, and it arises from very strong causes: fame, admiration, fortune, promotion and renown, are before the soldier, and he would be a mere clod were not his shout "onward!" His exploits are the admiration of the beautiful and the theme of the sons of song; his name goes abroad in the world, and his life forms a portion of history. Human existence being no great affair, it is no wonder that man should risk it under such powerful inducements.

But look at the intrepidity of the fireman—night after night rushing to scenes of danger and alarm; mounting the blazing pile, and groping through the dense smoke; every step uncertain, and every motion perilous! And all this, too, in darkness and solitude, for his companions are too busy in the same duty to admire his exploits, and applaud his heroism. He may walk along the verge of the burning roof and plunge amidst the flames, to save helpless women and children—he may exhibit the self-possession of a Caesar, the impetuous heroism of a Hannibal, or the humanity of a Bayard, and yet the world knows nothing about it. The next day finds him engaged in his ordinary business, and as he walks along he is not pointed out and admired by the crowd—the "monstratier digito" appertains not to him; and yet, who can there be more worthy of admiration? Worldly renown and worldly promotion do not follow in consequence of his intrepidity; he is not lauded in the gazettes of the day, nor is his name recorded in history; even emolument, the most paltry of all rewards, is not awarded to his services. And yet, where shall we look for more generous self-devotion, more manly perseverance, more exalted courage? Not in the battle-field, or on the ocean—not in the storming of a fortress, nor in the struggle with a tempest—and where else can we look for the parallel?

Mora. Cour.

VICISSITUDES OF FORTUNE.

The criminal court of justice of Corsica was lately occupied with the trial of a case, which presents some curious and romantic circumstances. About the year seventeen hundred and sixty, a native of Corsica, named Franceschini, on his return from Sardinia, where he had just been married, was captured by an Algerine corsair, who conducted both himself and his wife to Algiers, where they were exposed for sale as slaves, and purchased by a rich inhabitant. He had humanity enough, however, not to separate the newly married pair. They had three children, two boys and a daughter named Davia. Franceschini contrived to get into the good graces of his master, amassed a large fortune, and obtained permission to return to Corsica with his family. He had scarcely, however, set sail, before he was again captured, his treasure taken from him, and he and his family carried captive to Morocco. Franceschini was again very fortunate, however, and was presented to the emperor, who evinced great partiality for his daughter Davia, then about seven years old. Though he was loaded with honours and riches, the love of country prevailed over his ambition, and he asked as a favour of the emperor, that he might be allowed to return—to which the latter consented, on condition that Davia should remain. When Franceschini returned home, he began to feel uneasy at the idea that his daughter should be immured in a seraglio; and having armed a vessel, he again set sail for Morocco, with the intention of carrying away a prince of the imperial family, in order that he might obtain his daughter in exchange. He landed at Salee, but was suddenly attacked with disorder, and died. Some years elapsed, and Davia, after numberless vicissitudes, had become empress of Morocco, and her mother and her two sons went there to see her, and resided with her some time. Davia died in 1802, of the plague, and her son Augustin possessed himself of her riches, and returned home. Two years afterwards, he suspected that his nephew, Jacques Marie, had robbed him of five hundred piastres, and he therefore brought him before the above court on this charge. The court, however, acquitted Marie, and he was set at liberty.

THE LIE.

At a court-martial, a young Irish officer, when questioned whether he had not given the lie to a certain person, replied, "No: I only said that either he or the colonel had told a lie, and that I was sure it wasn't the colonel."

STANZAS.

I CANNOT speak in joyous strain
Of youthful pleasure's rosy chain,
For to my wild and changeful song
No tones save those of pain belong.

Why is it thus? has nought of joy
Been mingled in my cup of life?
Have I but found this earthly scene
A dreary waste of pain and strife?
Oh, seldom does the hand of heaven
A child of earthborn sorrow bless
With such sweet joy as has been given
To me, in all its sweet excess.

Why is it, then, that notes of wo
Are all that from my lyre will flow?
Oh, 'tis because in joyous hours,
When all around is glad and gay,
I think not of the fragile flowers
The muse has scattered in my way.

Though o'er her sunny path the muse
May sprinkle flowers of varied hues;
And image forms of life and light,
And beauty, to her votary's sight,
Yet vain the art—there are for me
Fornas brighter in reality.

Oh, not to glad and joyous hearts
The glorious wealth of song is given;
But when each transient joy departs,
Like flowers before the tempest driven;
And when from earth we turn away,
With faded hopes and feelings riven,
Then poetry, with soothing sway,
Comes like a messenger from heaven.

VILLAGE TALES.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

SOLITUDE.

THERE was bustle and commotion in the village of M—. It was just about sunset. The labourers were returning to their peaceful homes; their wives and daughters were standing at the doors or on the lawns to welcome them; the boys were let loose from school; and, in short, it was the very witching hour of idleness, when trifles excite the interest of the curious crowd, and the slightest event is deemed the forerunner of "things of mighty import." But the occurrence which now disturbed the serenity of the little village could scarcely be called a trifle: it was nothing less than the arrival of a messenger to the steward of Hawthorn-Place, to announce that the house, which had remained uninhabited for nearly three years, was about to be occupied by a stranger. Who could it be? was the question. The owner, a man of immense wealth, seldom came to visit it. He was a merchant in a large city, at least sixty miles off; a singular old fellow, who cared very little for any thing but business, hated moving from place to place, and, from the distance of the village from any commercial town, probably thought of his property in it as rather an incumbrance than any thing else. It had been bequeathed to him by a distant relation, and after advertising it for sale for some months without finding a bidder, he had remained in quiet possession of it, contented with receiving once in three months from the honest old steward, accounts of the rents, profits of the farm, &c. All the wisdom of the villagers could not discover who the new owner could be. Some hinted that the property had been disputed and recovered by a nearer relation than the late claimant. Others, that a son of his had mysteriously disappeared in his infancy—was supposed dead—and had come to life again, from pure regret that so handsome a place should be tenantless. None surely could be mad enough to buy a farm without seeing it, and all were ready to aver that no stranger had visited it in a long time. Curiosity was busy in conjectures upon the subject for nearly a fortnight, but as it could not be satisfied, it, at last, in a great measure died away; though it was said that scandal had given place to wonder in the weekly tea-parties of the old women; that some had sickened from curiosity, and one old maid had actually dismissed her physician and overcome a nervous disorder which had troubled her seven years, for fear she should die before she arrived at the truth of the matter.

In the meanwhile workmen arrived at the place, alterations were made in the house, improvements on the farm, neat, handsome furniture replaced the old, and still every thing went on as though it were conducted by an invisible agent. From the important air of old Martin the steward, he was thought to know more than he chose to tell; but still it might be pretence, as no hint from him ever escaped to confirm the supposition, and examination and cross-examination availed nothing with him or his assistants. Don't know, was all the answer obtained by the querists for the name of the coming resident, and it was true from all excepting the old steward, who was the only participator in the secret. The only one in the village who seemed uninterested in this important affair, was a young gentleman who had resided for some months in the village, and was generally spoken of as the young artist from the city. He had excited some curiosity at first, but as he had always appeared what he represented himself—a student, who wished to reside in the country for a time, to recruit his health and perfect himself in his studies, he was soon considered as one of the village, and none suspected him of being the confident of the steward. He had obtained a few scholars in drawing among the richer inhabitants, which employed him for a few hours in the day; the rest of his time was apparently devoted to study, or solitary rambles, to sketch from nature landscapes for his pupils to copy. His manners were reserved and somewhat haughty, and, in spite of his tall handsome figure and pale interesting countenance, the village belles, piqued at his indifference to their charms, regarded him with dislike, which his apparent poverty by no means contributed to dispel. But there was one among his pupils who thought differently: she was his favourite, and none wondered at it, for Ellen Maynard was the sweetest and most engaging maiden that ever danced upon village green. She had been an orphan from early childhood, and from her smallness of stature and elasticity of step had obtained the name of fairy Ellen. But her character will be better known from the following letter written by our young artist to a friend:

"DEAR GEORGE—I am at present residing in one of the sweetest little spots in this western world. It is situated on the banks of a beautiful river, and is surrounded on three sides by thick woods. I am tired and disgusted with a world in which I have met nothing but disappointment, and I think I could live and die here without a wish ever to see it again. You know my passion for long solitary journeys on horseback: in one of them, Providence, or, as you would call it, chance, directed me here. It was a delightful afternoon, and leaving the choice of the road to my faithful horse, he conducted me through a path in the woods to this charming vale. I was at the entrance of the village. On one side was a thick hedge of hawthorn; and alighting from my horse, that he might browse the green grass, and climbing the hedge very valiantly, I looked over, and oh, such a beautiful group met my view, that I thought myself for a moment under some enchantment. Several pretty children, from five to eight years of age, were gathering the flowers which grew in rich profusion around; some still younger were playing on the grass. A few grown lads and lasses were sitting on rural benches, laughing and chatting in the exuberance of innocent mirth; and one young girl was wreathing the flowers gathered by the children into various fantastic shapes, and laughing at her own ingenuity, as she twisted them with the glossy ringlets of the little ones, and fastened them amid her own dark curls. She was a perfect Hebe; as light and airy as a vision of fancy, and graceful as Venus herself. She seemed the divinity of the little party, and I soon discovered that it was to celebrate her birth-day they had assembled together. I introduced myself as Edgar Newton, a young artist, and was received very cordially by the young men, and presented to the maidens.

Addressing an elderly woman, who proved to be the aunt of my Hebe, I asked her if I could be accommodated in the village; and she directed me to a small house kept by an old lady, who professed to have rooms to let, and, taking one of them with my usual promptitude, I found myself quite at home. I have announced myself as teacher of drawing, and the dear bewitching Ellen is one of my scholars. She is quite an heiress, and can do pretty much as she pleases with the old folks; and it is her pleasure to take two lessons a day, that she may improve rapidly. If I were not the most modest fellow in the world, I should say—but never mind—capricious, wild and volatile as she is, she is one of the most fascinating vixens I ever met with. She sings like an angel the simplest songs in the world, weeps at the melody of her own voice, and then laughs at herself for weeping. She will listen for hours to my descriptions of fine paintings, explanations of the art, and then ask me, with an arch look, what I have been talking about? But it is evident she treasures up every word, as she makes the most astonishing progress in the art. I am in love with her, George, seriously in love; and if she will love me, for myself, I shall be the happiest man upon earth. I wish you to assist me in a plan I have devised, the particulars of which I shall inform you in my next. Good by. E. W."

Ellen Maynard had not arrived at the age of seventeen without admirers. The spruce doctor had long been anxious to obtain her smiles, and the bashful curate had sighed at an immeasurable distance, happy if she but looked at him, and if she spoke to him, inspired. But all offers had been decidedly rejected. She seemed too happy in her own freedom to yield to the dominion of the arch god; and had not our Edgar most opportunely arrived at M—, Ellen would inevitably have been at last an old maid. But he did arrive, and with all the ardour and rashness of her age and nature did Ellen love him. He was superior to her former companions in intellect, and as she received his instructions, she felt that new worlds were opened to her view. She read with avidity the books he gave her, she sung to his flute, and was astonished herself at the rich sweetness of her own voice. She knew that she loved, but she durst not believe herself beloved. She thought him too far above her in genius and intellect to think of her as a wife; and she felt that to be near him, to hear his conversation, and receive his approbation, were to her happiness supreme.

What a change does this all-engrossing passion make in the heart of woman! Man loves—is disappointed—and loves again. But woman, the moment in which she confesses to herself that she loves, is a changed being. Her former amusements afford her no pleasure; she wonders how she ever could have been happy without some one to love. She thinks not of the future, and the present is one long dream of indescribable happiness. So it was with Ellen. But one day Edgar slightly hinted to her that the time of his departure was approaching. The thought was horror to her; it had never occurred to her before, and now it rendered her miserable. She had naturally a strong mind, and she contrived to answer him calmly; but Edgar knew well the heart of woman, and he read in her changing colour and fixed eye enough to satisfy his hopes. "She loves me, dear George," he wrote in his next letter to his friend. "I drew the confession from her last night, in the little walk by the hedge I have so often mentioned. I am loved for myself alone; she thinks I am poor and friendless, but she says she owns enough for us both. What a competency!—a small cottage with a little farm of about three acres. Well, she shall be the happiest woman in the world. I have obtained the consent of the old people, and we are to be married soon. I shall expect your presence at the wedding, and, in the meantime, your assistance in the plan I mentioned in my last."

What this plan was, if our reader has not had wit enough to guess, he must wait patiently until we are at liberty to disclose it.

Great rejoicings were preparing in the village, for none was so beloved as Ellen; and though many, a little envious, perhaps, sneered at her choice, yet a wedding was a merry event, and looked forward to with joy by all.

During the courtship of our two lovers the great house had been but little thought of, but as it was now finished, and declared ready for the reception of the owner, curiosity was again awakened respecting him. Old Martin received information that the gentleman would arrive on the eighth of September. It happened to be the appointed wedding-day of Ellen. It arrived at last—a beautiful bright morning. The church was decorated with greens. The little favourites of Ellen were up with the dawn, gathering daisies and other flowers to strew in her path. The bride-maids were busily engaged in ornamenting their dresses and anticipating the pleasures of the day. There were two young girls, friends of Ellen, who were to officiate as bride-maids. The brother of one of them was to be groomsmen; and it appeared that Edgar had forgotten to engage another. "Strange!" said the girls to each other; "what shall we do?" About ten o'clock, a plain, neat, green barouche, entirely new, was seen to drive up to the door of the manor, and an under-sized gentleman, of about twenty-eight or thirty years old, alighted, and announced himself as Mr. George Newby. The servants pressed forward to receive him; the villagers thronged to pay him their respects and satisfy their curiosity.

Hearing of the approaching wedding, he expressed a wish to attend, much to the delight of the old aunt of Ellen, who said he was a perfect gentleman. He conversed freely with Edgar, as being from the same city as himself, and offered to stand up as groomsmen. All matters being arranged, the party proceeded to the church. After the venerable old pastor had concluded the simple service, and the bride had gone through the customary forms, the whole party, by the invitation of Mr. Newby, proceeded to Hawthorn-Place. He ordered refreshments to be prepared, and leading Ellen to the head of the table, welcomed her to her own house. The surprise was universal.

"Yes," said Edgar, "it is true, my friends, Mr. Newby is my friend, and has assisted me in preparing this surprise for my beloved Ellen, who, in loving me for myself, has filled the measure of my happiness. I will live in the midst of my tenants, making their happiness my own; and in choosing their favourite Ellen for my wife, I am sure of their approbation, my own felicity, and, if I read her bright eyes aright, that of my sweet Ellen." SKETCHES OF ENGLISH SOCIETY.

FROM A LATE LONDON PERIODICAL.

MAD—QUITE MAD.

"Great wits are sure to madness near allied."

It has frequently been observed that genius and madness are nearly allied; that very great talents are seldom found unaccompanied by a touch of insanity, and that there are few bedlamites who will not, upon a close examination, display symptoms of a powerful, though ruined intellect. According to this hypothesis, the flowers of Parnassus must be blended with the drugs of Anticyra; and the man who feels himself to be in possession of very brilliant wits, may conclude that he is within an ace of running out of them. Whether this be true or false, we are not at present disposed to contradict the assertion. What we wish to notice is, the pains which many young men take to qualify themselves for bedlam, by hiding a good, sober, gentlemanlike understanding, beneath an assumption of thoughtlessness and whim. It is the received opinion among many, that a man's talents and abilities are to be rated by the quantity of nonsense he utters per diem, and the number of follies he runs into per annum. Against this idea we must enter our protest; if we concede that every real genius is more or less a madman, we must not be supposed to allow that every sham madman is more or less a genius.

In the days of our ancestors, the hot-blooded youth, who threw away his fortune at twenty-one, his character at twenty-two, and his life at twenty-three, was termed "a good fellow," "an honest fellow," "nobody's enemy but his own." In our time, the name is altered; and the fashionable, who squanders his father's estate or ruins his best friend, who breaks his wife's heart at the gaming-table, and his own neck at a horse-race, escapes the sentence which morality would pass upon him, by the plea of lunacy. "He was a rascal," says common sense. "True," says the world; "but he was mad, you know, quite mad."

We were lately in company with a knot of young men who were discussing the character and fortunes of one of their own body, who was, it seems, distinguished for his proficiency in the art of madness.

"Harry," said a young sprig of gentility, "have you heard that Charles is in prison?"

"I heard it this morning," drawled the exquisite—"how distressing! I have not been so hurt since poor Angelica—his bay—broke down. Poor Charles has been too flighty."

"His wings will be clipped for the future," observed young Caustic.

"He has been very imprudent," said young Candour.

I inquired of whom they were speaking.

"Don't you know Charles Gally?" said the exquisite, endeavouring to turn in his collar; "Not know Charles Gally?" he repeated, with an expression of pity. "He is the best fellow breathing; only lives to laugh and make others laugh; drinks his two bottles with any man, and rides the finest horse I ever saw—next to my Angelica. Not know Charles Gally? why every body knows him! he is so amusing! ha! ha!—and tells such admirable stories! ha! ha!—often have they kept me awake"—a yawn—"when nothing else could."

"Poor fellow!" said his lordship, "I understand he's done for ten thousand!"

"I never believe more than half what the world says," observed Candour.

"He that has not a farthing," said Caustic, "cares little whether he owes ten thousand or five."

"Thank heaven!" said Candour, "that will never be the case with Charles: he has a fine estate in Leicestershire."

"Mortgaged for half its value," said his lordship.

"A large personal property!"

"All gone in annuity bills," said the exquisite.

"A rich uncle, upwards of fourscore!"

"He'll cut him off with a shilling," said Caustic.

"Let us hope he may reform," sighed the hypocrite.

"And sell the pack," added the nobleman.

"And marry," continued the dandy.

"Pshaw!" cried the satirist, "he will never get rid of his habits or his hounds."

"But he has an excellent heart," said Candour.

"Excellent," repeated his lordship, unthinkingly.

"Excellent," lisped the fop, effeminately.

"Excellent," exclaimed the wit, ironically.

We took this opportunity to ask by what means so excellent a heart and so bright a genius had contrived to plunge him into these disasters.

"He was my friend," replied his lordship, "and a man of large property; but he was mad—quite mad. I remember his leaping a lame pony over a stone-wall, simply because Sir Marinaduke bet him a dozen that he broke his neck in the attempt; and sending a bullet through a poor pedlar's pack, because Bob Darrell said the piece wouldn't carry so far."

"Upon another occasion," began the exquisite in his turn, "he jumped into a horse-pond after dinner, in order to prove it was not six feet deep; and overturned a bottle of Eau de Cologne in Lady Emilia's face, to convince me that she was not painted. Poor fellow! the first experiment cost him a dress, and the second an heiress."

"I have heard," resumed the nobleman, "that he lost his election for ——— by lampooning the mayor; and was dismissed from his place in the treasury for challenging Lord C——."

"The last accounts I heard of him," said Caustic, "told me, that Lady Tarrell had forbid him her house, for driving a pig into her drawing-room; and that young Hawthorn had run him through, for boasting of kissing his sister's hand!"

"These gentlemen are really too severe," remarked young Candour to us.

"Not a jot," we said to ourselves.

"This will be a terrible blow for his sister," said a young man who had been listening in silence.

"A fine girl, a very fine girl," said the exquisite.

"And a fine fortune," said the nobleman.

"The mines of Peru are nothing to her."

"Nothing at all," observed the sneerer—"she has no property there. But I would not have you caught, Harry; her income was good, but is dipped, horribly dipped. Guineas melt very fast when the cards are put by them."

"I was not aware Maria was a gambler," said the young man, much alarmed.

"Her brother is, sir," replied his informant.

The querist looked sorry, but yet relieved. We could see that he was not quite disinterested in his inquiries.

"However," resumed the young cynic, "his profusion has at least obtained him many noble and wealthy friends." He glanced at his hearers, and went on: "No one that knew him, will hear of his distresses without being forward to relieve them. He will find interest for his money in the hearts of his friends."

Nobility took snuff; foppery played with his watch-chain; hypocrisy looked grave. There was long silence.

We ventured to regret the misuse of natural talents, which, if properly directed, might have rendered their possessor useful to the interests of society, and celebrated in the records of his country. Every one stared, as if we were talking Hebrew.

"Very true," said his lordship; "he enjoys great talents. No man is a nicer judge of horse-flesh. He beats me at billiards, and Harry at picquet; he's a dead-shot at a button, and can drive his curricule-wheels over a brace of sovereigns."

"Radicalism," says Caustic, looking round for a laugh.

"He is a great amateur of pictures," observed the exquisite, "and is allowed to be quite a connoisseur in beauty; but there"—simpering—"every one must claim the privilege of judging for themselves."

"Upon my word," said Candour, "you allow poor Charles too little. I have no doubt he has great courage—though, to be sure, there was a whisper that young Hawthorn found him rather shy; and I am convinced he is very generous, though I must confess that I have it from good authority, that his younger brother was refused the loan of a hundred, when Charles had pigeoned that fool of a nabob but the evening before. I would stake my existence that he is a man of unshaken honour, though, when he eased Lieutenant Hardy of his pay, there certainly was an awkward story about the transaction, which was never properly cleared up; I hope that, when matters are properly investigated, he will be liberated from all his embarrassments; though I am sorry to be compelled to believe that he has been spending double the amount of his income annually. But I trust that all will be adjusted. I have no doubt upon the subject."

"Nor I," said Caustic.

"We shall miss him prodigiously at the club," said the dandy, with a slight shake of the head.

"What a bore!" replied the nobleman, with a long yawn.

We could hardly venture to express compassion for a character so despicable. Our auditors, however, entertained very different opinions of right and wrong!

"Poor fellow! he was much to be pitied—had done some very foolish things—to say the truth, was a sad scoundrel—but then he was always so mad."

And having come unanimously to this decision, the conclave dispersed.

Charles gave an additional proof of his madness, within a week after this discussion, by swallowing laudanum. The verdict of the coroner's inquest confirmed the judgment of his four friends. For our own parts, we must pause before we give in to so dangerous a doctrine. Here is a man who has outraged the laws of honour, the ties of relationship, and the duties of religion; he appears before us in the triple character of a libertine, a swindler, and a suicide. Yet his follies, his vices, his crimes, are all palliated, or even applauded, by this specious facon de parler—"He was mad—quite mad!"

THE DRAMA.

THE SUPERNATURAL CHARACTERS OF SHAKSPEARE.

BY THE LATE HENRY NEELE.

"He was the soul of genius,
"And all our praises of him are like waters
"Drawn from a spring, that still rise full, and leave
"The part remaining greatest."

It is one of the most striking peculiarities in the genius of Shakspeare, that, although he is eminently the poet of nature, and exhibits her with singular felicity in her ordinary and every-day attire, yet that, when he gets "beyond this visible, diurnal sphere," he surpasses all other writers, in the extraordinary power and invention which he displays in the delineation of supernatural beings. It has been justly remarked, that in his most imaginary characters he cannot be so properly said to go beyond nature, as to carry nature along with him, into regions which were before unknown to her. There is such an extraordinary propriety and consistency in his supernatural beings, and every thing which they say and do is in such strict accordance with the character with which he has invested them, that we at once become, as it were, denizens of the imaginary world which the potent art of the poet has conjured around us; the marvellous merges into the probable, and astonishment and surprise are changed into intense interest and powerful sympathy. Shakspeare is the only poet who effects this; at least to the same extent. The magic of other writers pleases and surprises us; but in that of Shakspeare we are thoroughly wrapt up. We are as much under the influence of the wand of Prospero as are Ariel and Caliban; the presence of the Weird Sisters on the blasted heath, arrests our attention as strongly as it did that of Macbeth and Banquo; and the predictions of the prophetic spirits on the eve of the battle of Bosworth, ring as fearfully and as solemnly in our ears, as they did in those of the conscious usurper. The great secret of all this is, the wonderful art with which the character of these visitants from another world is sustained, and in which they are not surpassed by any of our author's representations of mere humanity. Ariel is as perfect and harmonious a picture as Miranda.

or Ferdinand; and, above all, the witches in "Macbeth," are creations on which the poet has lavished all his skill, and exhausted all his invention.

The supernatural machinery of which he makes the most frequent use, is founded upon the popular belief in ghosts. This is a superstition which has existed in all ages and countries, and among all classes and conditions of men. There are many who affect to despise it, but it is scarcely too much to say that there never existed an individual who was not, at some period or other, under the influence of the feelings which such a belief excites.

The "saint, the savage, and the sage," the man of letters, and the uninformed peasant; the child of science, who can explain the structure of the universe; and even the skeptic—Hobbes, for instance, among many others—who refuse to give credence to any written revelation of the will of the Creator, have all confessed that

"There are more things in heaven and earth
Than are dreamed of in our philosophy."

Hence this belief has become an engine of most potent influence in the hands of the poet; since by it he could work upon the feelings of all mankind. The great authors of antiquity, and these of Spain and Italy, and above all, those of the north of Europe, the countries of cloud and mist, the "Lands of brown heath and shaggy wood, Lands of the mountain and the flood,"

where the phenomena of nature are such powerful auxiliaries to a lively imagination and a credulous understanding, all these have delighted in breaking down the barrier between the corporeal and the spiritual world, and in shaking our dispositions

"With thoughts beyond the reaches of our souls."

The most distinguished writers of our own age have not neglected to avail themselves of this popular superstition, if such it must be called. Coleridge's "Ancient Mariner;" Lord Byron's "Manfred," and "Siege of Corinth;" and that masterpiece of the mighty wizard of the north, the "Bride of Lammermoor," are proofs, among innumerable others, of the ability which our contemporaries have evinced, when they have ventured to lift up the veil which shrouds the secrets of the spiritual world.

It is, therefore, not surprising that Shakespeare should have enrolled these shadowy beings among his dramatis personæ; or that in his management of them he should have displayed consummate genius. The introduction to the entrance of the ghost in "Hamlet," shows infinite taste and judgment. Just as our feelings are powerfully excited by the narration of its appearance on the foregoing evening, the speaker is interrupted by "majesty of buried Denmark" once more standing before him:

"The bell then beating one—
"But soft, break off!—look where it comes again!"

then the solemn adjurations to it to speak; the awful silence which it maintains; the impotent attempts to strike it; and the exclamation of Horatio, when it glides away—

"We do it wrong, being so majestic,
To offer it the show of violence," present to us that shadowy and indistinct, but at the same time appalling and fearfully interesting picture, which constitutes one of the highest efforts of the sublime. The interview with Hamlet is a masterpiece. The language of this awful visitant is admirably characteristic. It is not of this world. It savours of the last long resting-place of mortality; "of worms, and graves, and epitaphs." It evinces little of human feeling and frailty. Vengeance is the only passion which has survived the wreck of the body; and it is this passion which has burst the cerement of the grave, and sent its occupant to revisit the "glimpses of the moon." Its discourse is of murder, suffering, and revenge; and gives us awful glimpses of that prison-house, the details of which are not permitted to "ears of flesh and blood." Whether present or absent, we are continually reminded of this perturbed spirit. When on the stage, "it harrows us with fear and wonder;" and when absent, we see it in its influence on the persons of the drama, especially Hamlet. The sensations of horror and revenge which at first possess the mind of this prince; then his tardiness and irresolution, which are chided by the reappearance of the spectre; and his fears, notwithstanding all the evidence to the contrary, that it may be an evil spirit, which—

"Out of his weakness and his melancholy, Abuses him to damn him," form one of the most affecting and interesting pictures in the whole range of Shakespeare's dramas.

The spirits of the murdered victims of the usurper Richard, are also admirably introduced; but they do not occupy so prominent a station in the drama as the ghost in "Hamlet." The apparition of Julius Caesar in the tent of Brutus, is a brief but awful visitation, and the mind of the spectator is finely prepared for it by the unnatural drowsiness which possesses all the attendants.

The ghost of Banquo exists only in the disordered mind of Macbeth; and we think that the effect would be prodigiously increased, if the managers would listen to the opinions of the best critics, and forbear to present it before our visual organs. But what shall we say of the weird sisters, and of their unutterable occupation?

"How now, ye secret, black, and midnight bags,
"What is't ye do?"
"A deed without a name!"

This is the true sublime; it is composed of the essential elements of sublimity; and the most highly-wrought description of their employment would produce an effect infinitely inferior to the simple brevity of this reply. The mind wanders into the pathless field of horrible imaginings. From the moment that Macbeth encounters them on the blasted heath, he is impelled along his inevitable path by their spells. His mind is troubled with "thick-coming fancies;" his "face is a book where men may read strange matters;" "things bad begun, make strong themselves by ill:" until at length, he is

"In blood
"Slept in so far, that should he wake no more,
"Returning were as tedious as go o'er!"

and his unearthly tempters complete their horrid task and gain their prey.

The fairies in "A Midsummer Night's Dream" are of a nature as essentially and distinctly different as celestial from infernal, or light from darkness. Even "that shrewd and knavish sprite" Puck, is but mischievous only, not wicked; and Oberon, and Titania, and all their elfish troop, are untainted with any fiendish attributes, and almost without any touches of mortality. The "delicate Ariel" is another still-varying creation of the same gifted pencil; made still more effective by its contrast with the monster Caliban—"that thing of darkness"—"as disproportioned in his manners as in his shape:"

"Whose mother was a witch; and one so strong,
That could controul the moon, make ebbs and flows,
And deal in her command, without her power."

But to do ample justice to all the supernatural characters of Shakespeare, would demand a volume, not an essay; and however frequently we may have perused the magic page which "gives these airy nothings a local habitation and a name," it is still untiring, and still new. And though the all-potent art which gave it life, and breath, and being, is extinct; though the charm be broken, and the power lost; yet still—

"Our mighty bard's victorious lays
"Fill the loud voice of universal praise;
"And baffled spite, with hopeless anguish dumb,
"Yields to renown the centuries to come."

THE COUNTRY MAIDEN.

The sweet country maiden, she gets up betimes,
Taking her kids to feed out on the grass—
On the grass, on the grass—ah! the sly little lass,
Her eyes make me follow with mine as they pass:
I am sure they'd make day in the middle of night.

Then she goes, the first thing, to the fountain hard by,
Treading the turf with her fresh naked feet—
Naked feet, naked feet—O so light and so sweet,
Through the thyme and the myrtles they go so complete,
And she makes up a lap, which she fills full of flowers.

Then she tucks up her sleeves to wash her sweet face,
And her hands, and her neck, and her bosom so white—
Her bosom so white—with a gentle delight:
I never beheld such a beautiful sight;
It makes the place smile wheresoever it turns.

And sometimes she sings a rustical song,
Which makes the kids dance, and the sheep also—
The sheep also—they hark, and they go;
The goats with the kids, all so merrily O!
You would think they all tried to see who could dance best.

And sometimes, upon a green meadow, I've seen her
Make little garlands of beautiful flowers—
O, most beautiful flowers—which last her for hours;
And the great ladies make them for their paramours,
But all of them learn from my sweet country lass.

And then in the evening she goes home to bed,
Bare-footed, and loos'ning her laces and things—
Her laces and things—and she laughs and she sings,
And leaps all the banks with one of her springs;
And thus my sweet maiden she passes her time.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

FAMILY ECONOMY.

THERE is nothing which goes so far towards placing young people beyond the reach of poverty, as economy in the management of their domestic affairs. It is as much impossible to get a ship across the Atlantic with half a dozen butts started, or as many bolt-holes in her hull, as to conduct the concerns of a family without economy. It matters not whether a man furnish little or much for his family, if there is a continual leakage in the kitchen or in the parlour, it runs away, he knows not how; and that demon, waste, cries more, like the horseleech's daughter, until he that provides has no more to give. It is the husband's duty to bring into the house, and it is the duty of the wife to see that nothing goes wrongfully out of it—not the least article, however unimportant in itself, for it establishes a precedent; nor under any pretence, for it opens the door for ruin to stalk in, and he seldom leaves an opportunity unimproved. A man gets a wife to look after his affairs; to assist him in his journey through life; to educate and prepare his children for a proper station in life, and not to dissipate his property. The husband's interests should be the wife's care, and her greatest ambition carry her no further than his welfare and happiness, together with that of her children. This should be her sole aim, and the theatre of her exploits is in the bosom of her family, where she may do as much towards making a fortune as he possibly can in the counting-room or workshop. It is not the money earned that makes a man wealthy; it is what is saved from his earnings. A good and prudent husband makes a deposit of the fruits of his labour with his best friend; and if that friend be not true to him, what has he to hope? If he dare not place confidence in the companion of his bosom, where is he to place it? A wife acts not for herself only, but she is the agent of many she loves, and she is bound to act for their good, and not for her own gratification. Her husband's good is the end at which she should aim, his approbation is her reward. Self-gratification in dress, or indulgence in appetite, or more company than his purse can entertain, are equally pernicious. The first adds vanity to extravagance; the second fastens a doctor's bill to a long butcher's account; and the latter brings intemperance, the worst of all evils, in its train.

WHO IS SHE?

There is not a question that betrays greater anxiety than "Who is she?" Any thing beautiful in a fair stranger instantly strikes, and inquiry is everlastingly hummed. The ideas of beauty are almost as various as the different lines of the human countenance. Feeling does not follow at all times those ideas, but the secret spell of sympathy influences the heart, and we are oftentimes in love without admiring. Some amateurs there are who prefer the display of a well-turned ankle to all other considerations, while many are in raptures at the "dignity of love," of action, the graceful step, the beaming eye, or the heavenly smile; but there are thousands whose sullen souls, like "lamps in sepulchres," are unmoved by either. Peace to all such! the power of attraction grows with the intensity of heat; and those that have it not, cannot expect to be entertained when they cannot contribute to enjoyment.

"Who is she?" rushes into the tender bosom when she views a dangerous rival. "Who is she?" glances from the eye of the gallant, when cheered by the prospect of an agreeable change, or a charming variety; and the fortune-hunter, when a hint is dropped, teases you with importunities. "Who is she?" repeats the scandal-bearer and the newsmonger, that he may entertain the next acquaintance with his fresh acquisitions. "Who is she?" flashes from the poking stare of the dandy, when he pops his eye through the quizzing-glass upon a strange charmanie! and "Who is she?" rushes from the eager gestures of old Tease, when his shrivelled up heart is subdued by graces that despise his imbecility.

THE RAINBOW, RAIN, &c.

A rainbow can only occur when the clouds containing or depositing the rain are opposite to the sun; and in the evening the rainbow is in the east, and in the morning in the west; and as our heavy rains in this climate are usually brought by the westerly wind, a rainbow in the west indicates that the bad weather is on the road, by the wind, to us; whereas the rainbow in the east proves that the rain in these clouds is passing from us. When the swallows fly high, fine weather is to be expected or continued; but when they fly low, or close to the ground, rain is almost surely approaching. This is explained as follows: swallows pursue the flies and gnats, and flies and gnats usually delight in warm strata of air; and as warm air is lighter, and usually moister, than cold air, when the warm strata of air are high there is less chance of moisture being thrown down from them by the mixture with cold air; but when the warm and moist air is close to the surface, it is almost certain that, as the cold air flows down into it, a deposition of water will take place.

A BLOW-UP.

A few weeks since, the good people that dwell in the little village of Triana, on the banks of the Tennessee, in the county of Madison and state of Alabama, being much at a loss for the wherewithal to complete a church, resolved on a dramatic effort for the accomplishment of this purpose. Accordingly, after some deliberation, the tragedy of "Pisarro" was selected. Thespians are ever fond of the tragic muse, and suitable preparations were made to astonish, electrify, and horrify the eager and delighted multitude that flocked from the village and adjacent country to "see a play." For a while, our Thespians were "at fault" about the representation of a storm that occurs in a very interesting part of the story. A storm without thunder and lightning would never do at all. At length, a piece of sheet-iron and a quantity of powder were obtained, and it was supposed, that beating on one and flashing the other as an accompaniment, would be a "most apt" imitation, and could not fail of producing effect. The room was crowded to overflowing—the entertainment proceeded, and the storm in all its grandeur and magnificence came on. Two of the corps were ready at their posts, to manufacture a due portion of thunder and lightning. Rap—rap—rap went the sheet-iron, and it thundered! Flash went the powder—and it lightened! The children were alarmed—the ladies were really apprehensive that the flood of rain would burst upon them—while the men declared it was the most "natural thing" they had ever seen in their lives. The effect was fine! At this critical moment the canister of powder took fire, and in an instant, "Jupiter Tonans" and his coadjutor of the "forked element" were blown "sky high." The "red right arm" of the "thunderer" was somewhat lacerated, whilst he who, but a few minutes before, held the "winged lightning" in his hand, now found himself burnt, scorched, and singed in a very painful, though not in a dangerous manner. The sufferers were speedily conveyed home, and their wounds dressed; but during this painful operation they uttered furious and bitter imprecations against home-made thunder and lightning. This thing, of a flash of lightning slipping out of one's hand, and singeing off his eye-lashes, burning his hair, blacking and scorching his face, is, without doubt, a very ugly business, and should be carefully guarded against by all Thespians. EXTRACT.

It is almost as difficult to make a man unlearn his errors as his knowledge. Mal-information is more hopeless than non-information; for error is always more busy than ignorance. Ignorance is a blank sheet, on which we may write; but error is a scribbled one, on which we must first erase. Ignorance is contented to stand still, with her back to the truth; but error is more presumptuous, and proceeds in the same direction. Ignorance has no light, but error follows a false one. The consequence is, that error, when she retraces her footsteps, has further to go, before she can arrive at the truth, than ignorance.

THE HATTER AND RUSTIC.

"There are tricks in a' trades but ours," as the lawyer said to his client.—An honest rustic went into the shop of a quaker to buy a hat, for which twenty-five shillings was demanded. He offered twenty shillings. "As I live," said the quaker, "I cannot afford to give it thee at that price." "As you live!" exclaimed the countryman, "then live more moderately, and be hang'd to you." "Friend," said the quaker, "thou shalt have the hat for nothing. I have sold hats for twenty years, and my trick was never found out till now."

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Tales of Passion, by the author of Gilbert Earle.—These are two extremely interesting volumes; inferior, indeed, to Pelham, but not unequal to a competition with almost any other of the modern novels. The tales are three in number: "Alice Lovel," a story of love and devotion; the "Bohemian," a powerful romance of love and vengeance; and "Second Love," a tender Spanish tale of pure affection. Of these the longest and the best is the "Bohemian." The writer has displayed in it profound knowledge of the fierce passions, whose effects it was his purpose to illustrate, great command of language, purity of style, and richness of imagination. The letters of the reformed Roué Savile, in the last story, are admirable; but for the total absence of misanthropy, we might almost compare them with those masterly articles in Blackwood, entitled the "Posthumous Letters of Charles Edwards, esq." By the world of novel readers, these volumes will be welcomed as a valuable acquisition.

Yesterday in Ireland.—Another novel! The time appears to be rapidly approaching when the important periods of Irish history—and they are by no means few or far between—will be illustrated by a novel. As to Irish character, that has been illustrated until the subject is almost exhausted; we are as familiar from childhood with it as with the very A B C itself, in the writings of Miss Edgeworth, Lady Morgan, Mr. Banim, Crofton Croker, and a host of other literary worthies. Thus we have made a step in the career of knowledge. Hitherto the aim of Irish writers has been to describe and portray the individual men and women of that very interesting island; now we are taught to study the character of classes, and to investigate the operation of circumstances upon sects in politics and religion. Such has been the object of the author of this new work. The time he has chosen for his narratives is the latter part of the reign of Queen Anne; and his principal incidents arise out of the constant state of feud between the protestants—Irish as well as English—and the catholics. As yet, we have been able to bestow upon the novel but a hasty perusal; but it appears to be interesting, and written with some spirit. The writer is obviously a catholic, or, at least, friendly to "concession," and it is not improbable that his production was intended to have some influence upon the decision of the great question which at present agitates Great Britain.

The two Chambers.—We sincerely hope that this subject, so important to the welfare of the city, will be regarded by our citizens in its true light. Selfish policy and obtuseness have done much, hitherto, to prevent the adoption of a measure which needs only to be understood to meet with universal approbation. The immense responsibilities resting on the common council, the illimitable powers and authority vested in them, are not paralleled in the case of any other public body in this country, whether civil, political, legislative, executive, or judicial. The charter which formed them bears its date nearly two hundred years ago, when the population of this city was thirty times less than it is now, and the property over which they exercised control one hundred times less. And does not this increase require a modification of the governing power? When we call to mind the frequent abuses of this power, to which there is neither check nor limit, and which, we are sorry to say, even public opinion can scarcely restrain, we recollect the unwarrantable, and heedless, and unnecessary expenditures of the public money, the passing of oppressive and unequal laws, which are sometimes scarcely being carried into effect, to the annoyance of the citizens—as in the case of opening and improving streets—before they are revoked, and worse ones enacted in their place—we say, when all these circumstances are taken into consideration, will not the voice of the public call aloud for reform? But it is said, if we have two councils, one will be "a house of lords!" This argument succeeds wonderfully with those whose prejudices are so strong that they will listen to no reason, but allow their minds to be carried away by empty sounds. Whoever thought of calling the senate of the United States a house of lords, or designate the senates of the different states by this title? And yet, in their instance, the objection might be made with far greater plausibility, inasmuch as they are elected for a longer number of years than the members of assembly, or house of representatives, and have also executive powers of appointment delegated to them. In the case of the two branches of the common council, it is not intended to make any such distinction. It is simply separating the aldermen from the assistant aldermen, and rendering them a mutual check upon each other. Thus, when one passes a law that is obnoxious to the citizens, they may have time to remonstrate before it passes the second chamber. Many other advantages of a similar nature might be enumerated; but it is unnecessary, as they will suggest themselves to every reflecting mind that is acquainted with the wants and interests of our varied and increasing population.

Cross-street.—A plan originated with the common council, not long since, to extend this street, and convert it from a receptacle of vice and misery to a decent and handsome thoroughfare. We trust the project will not be suffered to lie dormant, but be pursued in right good earnest, until it is completed. It would be a source of ample credit to the board, of real interest to the possessors of property in that neighbourhood, and of pride to the city at large. This street has long been viewed with horror and disgust by the community, and to pass it, especially after dark, is a matter of some risk to both life and limbs. A few dollars expended might be turned to good account, and made available in over-proportionate returns. We say this advisedly. We are aware, at the same time, that the interests of a few are at war with this object, as they must be with every one that redounds to public improvement at their own supposed cost. These few might be convinced, by sound argument, that their property would increase in value if the street was once cleared of the moral stain which is lying heavily upon it, and that the gain to their pockets, now brought in by the wages of sin and corruption, is a reflection upon themselves and a disgrace to the city.

The Park.—Often as we take the liberty of arraigning the negligence of our public authorities, we are happy, at all times, to bear testimony to all the good acts they perform. Among these we have great pleasure in noticing the very essential improvements which the Park has undergone within a few weeks past. Its appearance is calculated to gratify the eye and taste of the lounge, and to have no very inauspicious influence over the minds of those unfortunate creatures who are about entering the halls of justice to seek its decisive, if not always equitable awards. A goodly and verdant prospect is well calculated to allay irritated feeling, and introduce soothing and calm reflections where before all was bustle and angry turbulence. It were desirable that this thought should not be lost sight of, and that the purview of the hall should participate in the advantages of improvement. The bridewell, and the jail, and their appendages, what do they there, amid the green sward and the shady avenues of elms and sycamores? Why are they not removed, and thus the principle of improvement carried out to its full extent? They are surely not kept there for the purpose of contrast?

The Mercantile Advertiser.—This highly respectable and useful vehicle of commercial intelligence has lately undergone, in the true spirit of the age, a change, or metamorphosis. Its sheet has been enlarged, its type improved, and its editorial department strengthened by the accession of the services of John I. Mumford, esq. a scholar, a merchant, and a gentleman of undoubted talents. Under such an effort, it cannot be questioned that this long established paper will experience such a renovation in its spirit and patronage as will ensure it an exalted rank among its numerous rivals, and extend its sphere of active usefulness.

Poverty.—Although the season of general distress has passed away, we still find many beggars parading our streets, and imploring the public bounty. Why is this? Why are not means taken to prevent the continuation of an evil which, if allowed to grow, will soon darken this city with its disgrace. Example is contagious, and compassion to those miserable wretches who once take up the honest trade of asking alms, is the greatest encouragement that can be held out to their multiplication. Why do not the public authorities take this matter in hand? Or do they mean to grant license to beggars? It might be rendered a source of public revenue. Let them try it. It is not worse than receiving pay from the liquor venders of Alsatia. Where, too, are the ward committees? They were calculated and expected to do much good, but, as yet, they have done nothing. Now is the time, or never. To wait till the wound has broken open afresh, will be too late. Administer a radical remedy to the constitution, and it will never fester more.

THE BIRD THAT THROUGH THE SUMMER SKY.

THE MUSIC BY H. ZEUNER.

ALLEGRETTO.

The bird that through the sum - mer sky, Now takes his care - less flight, Is like to what my spi - rit was, Ere thou hadst met my sight. With bright-ness on his glit - t'ring wing, And glad - ness in his eye, He fear - less - ly pur - sues his way, And ca - rols through the sky - - And ca - rols through the sky.

But when the fowler's cruel sport
 Has marred his pleasant song,
 And, wounded sore, upon the earth
 His limbs are stretched along,

He then shall look, as now I look,
 Upon the distant sky,
 And sadly think on moments past,
 As I do—with a sigh.

And thine it is that I, bereft
 Of all that makes life dear,
 Must bear the deeply-rankling shaft,
 And shed the secret tear.

Thy words have been a blighting spell,
 Thy smile a curse to me;
 And welcome now is any fate,
 So 'tis not shared with thee.

LINES

BY MISS SHERIDAN.

I do not love thee!—no! I do not love thee!
 And yet when thou art absent I am sad,
 And envy even the blue sky above thee,
 Whose quiet stars may see thee and be glad.
 I do not love thee!—yet I know not why,
 Whate'er thou doest, seems well done, to me—
 And often in my solitude I sigh,
 That those I do love are not more like thee.

I do not love thee!—yet, when thou art gone,
 I hate the sound—though those who speak be dear—
 Which breaks the lingering echo of the tone
 Thy voice of music leaves upon my ear.

I do not love thee!—yet thy speaking eyes,
 With their sweet, bright, and most expressive hue
 Between me and the midnight heaven arise,
 Oftener than any eyes I ever knew.

I know I do not love thee! yet, alas!
 Others will scarcely trust my candid heart—

And oft I catch them smiling as they pass,
 Because they see me gazing where thou art.

EMMA HAYWOOD.

"Tis a strange world, and full of contradiction."

It has been often said, and with truth, that the life of one who devotes himself in his closet to the study of books, is monotonous, and to others uninteresting; but he who walks forth into this busy world, and mingles with his fellow-men, finds endless variety, amusement, and instruction. 'Tis true, we often deceive ourselves; and vanity, the great ruling passion, sometimes causes us to persist in error rather than own that our powers of observation are fallible. "Ah! you cannot deceive me; I know human nature so well." I caught the remark as I was passing, and stopped to look at the speaker. He was a thin, straight, little man, with a hooked nose, over whose enormous bridge he peeped into "human nature" with a pair of sharp little gray eyes, with scarcely enough of beauty in their expression to witch the heart of woman, but, nevertheless, of whose quickness of sight he was extremely proud.

"Do you know that old man?" said I to my friend.

"Yes; he is a broker in this city; a man of some standing among the merchants, as possessing rather more integrity than some of his trade, though less generosity than any. He is much given to suspicion; never trusts any one with business which he can possibly manage himself—except when he happens to take a particular fancy, as he calls it, and then he runs into the opposite extreme. He has lately taken into partnership with him a young man, who became a favourite with him, by some strange chance, several months ago, and has had the art to maintain his advantage ever since. He is a great hypocrite; has already secretly made away with some of the old fellow's property; and is gradually endeavouring, under pretence of relieving him from care, to get the business entirely into his own hands. If he succeeds, he will ruin his old master by his extravagance, and then probably laugh at him for his credulity. The broker will never listen to any thing in his dispraise: his invariable answer to such attempts is as you have heard—'It is impossible to deceive one who knows human nature so well.'"

I was much amused with this trait of character, though I could not help thinking that even the best and wisest among us are equally liable to suffer from the delusions of vanity.

It was a delightful day, and Broadway displayed more than its usual variety of beauty and fashion.

"That is a beautiful girl coming towards us," said I to my friend—"the one in black, walking with that tall young man. What an animated countenance! what a playful smile!"

"I think," said she, as she passed us, "the young man was perfectly right: he was insulted, and of course there was no remedy for him but to fight."

It was perhaps said without much thought, but the sentiment uttered by her rosy lips almost changed my opinion of her beauty. I easily guessed the subject of her discourse to be the young man in —, who had lately killed his antagonist in a duel resulting from some foolish private quarrel. Woman strangely forgets herself, when she becomes the advocate of duellists. As delicate as her form should be the soul that inhabits it. Instead of being the encourager of the rude passions of man, it should be her care to soften, if not subdue them; to condemn these disturbers of society, both by word and action, and to uphold by her soothing support the truly principled, who braves the sneers of the crowd rather than offend his conscience and his God.

My reflections were interrupted by the stopping of a carriage near me, from which descended a lady whose face seemed familiar to me. As she came nearer, she glanced at me, and as her beautiful eyes sparkled with an expression of pleased remembrance, I recognised in her my old acquaintance, Emma Haywood. I was about to speak, but she checked me by a cold distant bow, which betrayed at once her change of character, and reminded me, that, as I had not seen her since the days of her childhood, I could not claim the right of a privileged acquaintance. As she turned away, I saw that her eyes were filled with tears; and as I saw it, and marked the paleness of her cheek, I knew that, however the ceremonies of the world of fashion had quelled the vivacity of her disposition and clouded her feelings, they had not changed her heart, and I longed again to converse with my little friend, whom, of late years, I had heard spoken of only as the dashing belle and vain coquette—terms, I was now convinced, entirely inapplicable to her real character.

Some years ago, before I had quite ceased to consider myself a young man, I boarded in a narrow street, and opposite a small neat building inhabited by Mr. Haywood, the father of Emma, who was his only child. The window of my chamber looked directly upon their back piazza, upon which Emma used frequently to sit with her books or needlework, and delight me by the melody of her song. She was just about fourteen, and having been brought up by a pious and intelligent mother, in a retired manner, she had not yet learned to covet the admiration of the world, and therefore possessed the artless unsophisticated manners most natural to her age. Her father was in a respectable business, which, however, brought him no more than just sufficient to maintain his family genteelly, providing every comfort, but rejecting all needless expense and useless show.

I became acquainted with the family, and used occasionally to visit them, though it was my chief delight to watch the young Emma. When unconscious of being observed, she would breathe her own happiness in the sweetest songs, or dance to the music of her own voice. I have often gazed upon her bright face and graceful form at such times, and wished, almost without a doubt of the realization of the wish, that her life might always be as happy, and her spirit always as pure. I have followed her, in my own fancy, through the happy scenes of youth, till she grew up a lovely woman, and with a half pensive pleasure pictured her a happy wife to some noble fellow, who could justly appreciate her worth.

I called to bid farewell to the family, when I was about leaving the neighbourhood for a foreign shore, and Emma received my parting salute with the frankness of childhood, and bade me good-bye with unconstrained expressions of regret. Often, amidst scenes of dissipation and fashionable gayety, has my fancy gone back to sweet Emma Haywood; and often have I wished myself again at the little window, amusing myself with watching her childish sports. But when I returned to my native place, I learned that Mr. Haywood had, shortly after my departure, come in possession of a large fortune by the death of an old miserly uncle, who was thought to be miserably poor, until death forced him to disclose the secret of his hidden treasures. The money which had proved a perpetual torment to him, destroyed the happiness of the nephew and his little family. The house in which they had passed so many pleasant hours, was given up, as too small for their use. They removed farther into the city, occupied an elegant mansion splendidly furnished, bought carriages and horses, gave large dinner-parties, and, in short, entered with avidity into the dissipation of fashionable life.

Emma was a beautiful girl, and masters of all sorts being procured for her, she became an accomplished woman. But, admired by many for her beauty and intelligence, courted for her fortune, and flattered by all, she soon lost, in the giddy mazes of fashion, the simplicity of her character; the edge of youthful enthusiasm wore off, and, taught to disguise her feelings, to control the first impulses of her heart, and direct her actions and words, not by reason, but by caprice, it is no wonder that she should be thought of only as a beautiful, rich, and heartless woman. I had never met her until she passed me in the street, and, had it not been for the momentary sparkle of her former self as she recognised me, and the involuntary tear which started to her eyes as she turned away, I should have concurred with the opinion of the world. As it was, I sought and obtained an introduction. She passed for one of the gayest of human beings: she delighted the young by her wit and the fascination of her manners, while even the old forgot their sage maxims and stern morality in gazing upon her beauty, and receiving the soft attentions with which she well knew how to sooth their asperities, and flatter their peculiarities. But I, who had seen her amid such different scenes, liked not the change, and could not help thinking she was evidently supporting an assumed character. The sound of some simple melody would occasionally recall the recollections of past times to her mind, and she would shudder, as if the chord of memory vibrated painfully. I always noticed that she preferred the graces of Italian music to the airs that used to be her favourites; and if I attempted to speak of our early acquaintance, she would give the conversation a sudden turn, and chat upon indifferent topics with the ease apparently of an habitual trifter.

The constant round of dissipation was too much for Mrs. Haywood—she sank under it; and Emma had to weep the loss of a mother to whom she was sincerely attached, and who was the only confidant of her sorrows. Her fashionable friends, finding their consolations of little avail, confined their attentions to ceremonious calls, and the gay Emma was now frequently alone and neglected. I again became her friend, and, from the mere want of relieving her sorrows by disclosing them, almost her confidant.

"I am not happy," said she one day. "I often wish myself again in retirement, but I cannot shake off the habits I have acquired; and, miserable as I am, should be still more so in any other situation. I am very proud, and I cannot bear to relinquish the station in society I now hold."

It was in vain to protest against such thoughts; she silenced me almost angrily, saying, her destiny was decided. There was a meaning in her words which I could not then fathom; but I afterwards learned it from an aunt of hers, with whom I happened to be intimately acquainted, and who afterwards supplied the place of her mother to Emma, in almost every respect.

"Emma is a strange girl," said my friend; "but though I see her destroying herself, from false opinions of her own character and capabilities of happiness, yet these opinions are too fixed for me to alter; and if I wish to remain her friend, I must not attempt it. Her father has lost a very considerable part of his fortune by imprudent speculations, and Emma, convinced that, were she no longer to mix in the gay world as the equal of the highest, she should be eminently wretched, is about to make herself the victim of her own ambition. Among her numerous admirers, is one whose chief recommendation is his fortune, which is said to be immense. He has been refused by her more than once, in very decided terms. Hearing of her father's losses, he has again offered himself to her; and, protesting that her every wish shall be gratified, and the misfortunes which threaten her father entirely averted, he has gained her consent, and the deluded girl will shortly be his wife. He is old, ugly, and said to be extremely whimsical and passionate. He now almost worships her for her surpassing beauty; but when the novelty of that shall have passed away, he is not one of those to be won by the sweetness of her disposition and her dazzling accomplishments; and if she once finds herself neglected, I know not what will become of her. The unhappy girl will never bend to his caprices, though she would probably witness them in silent scorn."

A few days afterwards, I heard that Emma was married to the rich old Mr. —. I have since met her sometimes, followed by a train of admiring sycophants, the gayest and most fashionable of them all. She has ceased to consider me as an acquaintance, and no tear ever dims her eyes now, at the thought of other days. She has learned the art of dissimulation to perfection, and is envied by all, as one of the blest ones of the earth. Once, and once only, have I seen her moved: it was at a party, at which she was, as usual, the point of attraction. It was mentioned that the handsome young Edward B—, who had been rather celebrated in the world of fashion as a pleasing poet, had that morning died of consumption—brought on, as was supposed, by some secret grief: the colour fled from the cheek of Emma, and it required all her self-command to check the tears which were rising to eyes of late unused to weeping. The plea of indisposition satisfied those who remarked, with surprise, her change of countenance; but, catching my glance of pity, she haughtily remarked that she was now quite well; and begging the dancers not to interrupt themselves on her account, she joined their train, and was again herself. I recollected the amiable young man whom Emma had formerly favoured, and while the neglect she afterwards had shown him—even though she loved him—filled up the measure of her errors, I thought his fate far far preferable to hers. None will recognise the subject of this history; for all are deceived. Her deceit is greater and more complete than that of many; but she is not the only one who yields up happiness to ambition, pride, or vanity. Many, whose eyes are bright, and whose words are gay, conceal heavy hearts, and find not in their choice of life, that which can fill the "aching void" within. Those whose study is man, will often be disappointed by such melancholy changes of character; but there are some who pass the "ordeal" pure and uncontaminated, and the discovery of one such spirit will compensate for thousands of disappointments. The diamond would not be valued, if it were not rare; nor happiness really enjoyed, if it were not hardly won. J.

FINE ARTS.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR. THE FOURTH ANNUAL EXHIBITION OF THE NATIONAL ACADEMY.

ON Saturday, at noon, the exhibition-room of the Academy was opened to a number of ladies and gentlemen, invited to examine the productions of the past year. Most of our readers will probably remember the appearance of the room at the last exhibition, the general excellence of the pictures, and the strong emotions of pleasure excited by the presence of a body of art so honourable to our country, and to the artists by whom it was created; we venture to predict that the present exhibition will be not less numerous and fashionably attended than the former, and that its visitants will derive from the examination at least an equal degree of gratification.

The number of pictures now prepared for the inspection of the public is the same with that of the preceding year, one hundred and seventy-two, with few exceptions, from the pencils of the same artists, but entirely different; for it is one of the principal regulations of this rising and elegant institution, that no one picture shall be twice exhibited; they must also be original; no copy, however excellent, is admitted; nor can any painting be received, unless the production either of an American, or of an artist residing in the United States.

It is not in our power at present, to give so minute or extended a notice as we should be pleased to lay before our readers; at the time of writing, we were not able to obtain a catalogue, and are therefore obliged to rely upon memory only, in giving to the public the impressions made upon us by our visit; but, however imperfect our recollection of the particulars may be, we do very distinctly remember that it was productive of a high degree of pleasure, for we take a deep and lively interest in the progress of our country in this noble art; and it is gratifying to our national pride to find that a single year has been equal to the production of so much improvement—of so many really creditable pictures; the fact speaks loudly in commendation both of the artists by whom it has been effected, and of the public in whom they have found encouragement and patronage.

On entering the room, the eye is immediately attracted by a full-length portrait of a lady at the further extremity, from the pencil of Mr. WEIR; this gentleman is an American, but has passed some years in Italy, gathering knowledge and improvement in that parent land of art, where the artist pursues his lofty occupation in the midst of inspiration. The good effects of Mr. Weir's years of study are visible in this picture, and also in his portraits of Redjacket and of a Greek boy, each in the graceful but contrasted costume of his native land; from these two beautiful specimens, engravings are in the Talisman of the present year, and are no doubt familiar to our readers. The spectator dwells with pleasure upon the chaste and simple beauty of the portrait, but is at length attracted from it by an exquisite production of Mr. INGHAM's fascinating pencil; this is a portrait of a young lady gracefully presenting a basket of fruit, her lovely countenance beaming with smiles and innocent animation, and her ringlets waving in careless profusion around her exquisitely moulded neck and shoulders.

The admiration excited by this gentleman's exquisite picture of the "White Plume," at the last exhibition, must be fresh in the recollection of our readers, but we think that the lady with the grapes will be even more admired. Mr. Ingham has also in the exhibition a portrait of a lady with white plumes, not less rich and glowing than the former, of which it is intended to be the counterpart.

Mr. MORSE, the president, we regret to say, has but few pictures in this exhibition, and those few are all portraits; among them is one which will be looked upon with deep interest—an admirable likeness of Mr. Bryant, the distinguished American poet.

By the side of the lady with the grapes, is the latest effort of Mr. COLE; his genius has, in this instance, soared to an exalted flight; his subject is the "Subsiding of the Waters of the Deluge," and the manner in which it has been treated is worthy of his established reputation. The waste of waters is seen to be diminished; the bare and rugged peaks of the loftiest mountains are left uncovered; in the distance, the ark of safety is dimly visible floating in lonely security; and, over all, the glow of the returning sun is spread like a promise of hope in the midst of so great desolation. There is a grandeur in the simplicity of this picture which we cannot but admire. The other pictures of Mr. Cole are portraits of remarkable scenery in various portions of our own country, distinguished, like all his productions, for their sublimity and fidelity to nature.

Mr. HARDING, of Baltimore, has furnished an excellent portrait of the venerable patriot, Charles Carroll, of Carrollton; an interesting and admirably painted picture.

Mr. INMAN, among other portraits, has one which is naturally associated in the mind of the spectator with that of Carroll; it is of Col. Nicholas Fish, of this city, whose services in the "time that tried men's souls" have entitled him also to a place in the memory of every American. Mr. Inman has several other portraits, all worthy of his fame, both in fidelity of resemblance and in the excellence of their execution. We were gratified in beholding his original design illustrative of the Persian story in this year's Talisman—a rich and gorgeous picture.

Mr. DUNLAP has several pictures; among which we were particularly struck with one of the muse of history; a graceful and elegant composition, well drawn, and marked with his usual felicity of colouring.

There is one picture of our distinguished countryman, LESLIE, the property of Mr. Donaldson, to which we could devote a page of our journal, did time and dire necessity permit—for we are proud of it, as being the production of an American. The subject is a rural excursion by a cockney family; there is the snug and worthy citizen himself, resolved upon casting aside business for one day, and, John Bull like, enjoying, in the unaccustomed shade and quiet, his pipe and his newspaper; near him his two children and the little dog, deep in a game of romps, joyous laughter actually being in the faces of all the three; the mother holding up her warning finger to check their noisy merriment, lest it disturb the citizen in his reading; the grandmother looking on with heartfelt sympathy in their mirth; and at a little distance, the apprentice, dressed all in his best, with a bachelor's-button in his button-hole, looking unutterable things in the face of his blushing sweetheart. We stood and pored upon this exquisite composition for a good half-hour, and thought that, were our artists paid at home as they are paid in England, such pictures might be produced and purchased here as well as there; and then we sighed to think they were not, and went a little farther on, to look at Mr. QUIDOR's picture of Rip Van Winkle, from the Sketch-Book, in the excellence of which we found an evidence of the truth of our opinion. In England, this picture would be bought at a handsome price, and the painter be thus encouraged and enabled to produce one still better. How it will be in America we cannot say.

Mr. AGATE has a clever picture of two children striving to provoke each other to a smile; the composition is very happy, and the only fault of the painting is that it wants breadth, and the handling is somewhat timid. It gives testimony, however, of a very decided improvement over his pictures of the last exhibition.

Mr. CUMMINGS' miniatures bear away the palm again; one of a lady in crimson-velvet, struck us as being a masterly production.

We were much pleased with a sea-piece, by Mr. BRADFORD, we believe; a very beautiful cabinet picture; and also with the architectural designs of Mr. DAVIS. If we are not much mistaken, this gentleman will yet stand at the very head of his profession in this country, if not in the world.

But it is time for us to close this article, which we have already extended far beyond the limits within which it was our purpose to confine our remarks. In looking back at what we have written, we are surprised to find we have been able to say so much, after so short and imperfect an examination as we had it in our power to make of these works of art; and we look upon it as an evidence, and strong evidence too, of the merit of the exhibition, that so many pictures should have made so vivid an impression upon our mind and memory as to enable us to mention them even as we have. We shall be a frequent visitor to the exhibition-room, and should we hereafter find any thing worthy of more particular notice, or if in our preceding observations we have committed any errors either of omission or of commission, we shall take great pleasure in returning to the subject.

LITERATURE.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

TALES OF THE GOOD WOMAN.

BY A DOUBTFUL GENTLEMAN.

A VOLUME thus quaintly entitled, has just issued from the judicious press of the Messrs. Carvill. The name of the doubtful author is not given, but it requires no extraordinary acuteness to discover in these stories the originality and racy quaintness of the author of the "New Mirror for Travellers," the "Wise Men of Gotham," and of many of the papers in "Salmagundi." The tales are four in number; the "Yankee Roué," the "Drunkard," "Dyspepsy," and "Old Times in the New World;" and besides these, there is a "Memoir of the Unknown Author," which is not less whimsical and entertaining than the others. The "Yankee Roué" is eminently satirical, lashing with keen, yet playful severity, the absurdities of travelled dandies, whose emigrations to other lands have taught them only how to waste the gifts of nature, with follies more ridiculous or vices more detestable than they could have acquired if they had staid at home. The "Drunkard" is an appalling sketch of the miserable career of one born to better things, but debased by intemperance into brutality, peculation, insanity and murder. "Dyspepsy" is a pleasant prescription for the fashionable disease of idle gentlemen, teaching them by the force of example, how they may escape the fiend that gnaws their vitals, and become useful and respectable members of society. "Old Times in the New World" is a tale of the "ancient dominion" at the time of its first settlement, and abounds with pathos and pure fun. The heroic Captain Smith is one of the most prominent characters.

We extract as a fair specimen the following hit, from the "Yankee Roué." Sopus is the travelled hero, and accompanies his friend Heartwell to the American Academy of Fine Arts, to examine a collection of Italian originals—the prototypes, we suppose, of those lately disposed of at auction:

"Ah!" cried he, as they entered the exhibition-room, and saw the very worst collection ever imposed upon the good people of the city, labelled with the names of Michael Angelo, Raphael, Domenichino, Salvator, and the Carracci. "Ah! really now, this is something like; I declare this really does honour to the country. It reminds me of the gallery at Florence. Why, the names are the very same." Whereupon he out with his glass after the manner of travelled men, and fixing himself opposite to an immeasurable daub, full of green lions and brown trees, labelled Sal. Rosa, began to be quite enthusiastic. "What expression in the trees! What grace in the very rocks! What dignity in the lions! Any body could tell they were the kings of the beasts! There is nobody, after all, equal to Sally Rosa, for persuasive grace of attitude, softness of expression, and felicity of groping," as he was pleased to call it—"I knew her in Florence. She was a most elegant woman."

Heartwell stuffed the whole catalogue into his mouth, and walked away at a quick step. He, however, returned in a few moments.

"You are right," said he; "Miss Sally was particularly remarkable for all these characteristics. I see you are a connoisseur."

"A piece of a one," answered he, pulling up his stock, and adjusting his striped gingham collar. "But, my dear Heartwell, never again call a foreign lady miss or mistress. It is Madame or Signora Sally Rosa."

"I shall bear it in mind," said the other.

After spending some time in pointing out the various excellencies of this rare collection of originals, by the great Italian and Flemish masters, in which Sopus displayed equal taste and accuracy, he was carried into the apartment where the statuary and busts are deposited.

"What, in the name of all that is monstrous and vulgar, have we got here?" cried he, stopping opposite the Laocoon.

"'Tis the famous Laocoon," said Heartwell.

"La—La—ocoon," said Sopus, "Who is it by?"

"The name of the artist is somewhat doubtful. It is supposed to be a work of great antiquity."

"Yes, any body can see it must have been done in the infancy of the arts. The artist did well to keep his name secret. But who is this tall, long-spliced, sprawling fellow, standing on one leg?"

"That is the Apollo Belvidere. You must have seen it before."

"O, ay—I think I do recollect something of a wooden statue, stuck up at the Belvidere House, where my uncle's club used to meet. I suppose they call it the Apollo Belvidere on that account. Can you tell me who carved it?"

"No, I regret to say that I have forgot it," replied Heartwell, again having recourse to the system of gagging.

"No matter," said the other; "it is not worth remembering. Let us go back; I want to take another look at the Sally—or as these vulgarians call her, Sal."

THE CARBONARO.

Perhaps there is not, or has ever been, in the civilized portion of the world an institution of which so much has been said, and yet of which so little is known with any thing like certainty, as the affiliated body, designated "The Carbonari," which, during several years immediately succeeding the fall of Napoleon, existed in almost every country of continental Europe. The fact of its existence was established beyond doubt; but of its nature, objects and operations, the utmost ignorance has hitherto prevailed; for as yet there have been no means of ascertaining these but by their effects. These effects were insurrections and revolt against the established authorities, springing up in various quarters at the same moment, and demonstrating by this unity of time that their contrivers were acting in concert. The volumes of which we are now to speak, profess to throw more light upon this hitherto obscure subject; and the details which they give are in a high degree curious and interesting. The "Carbonaro," Count Jerome de la Cesia, is the hero of the story; a young, wealthy, patriotic and high-spirited Italian nobleman, of rare abilities, strong passions, and a most enthusiastic hatred of oppression, or, what is with him synonymous, monarchy. The principal incidents of his life, engaged at it was in unremitted machinations and conspiracies, form the leading features of the tale; and in tracing the intricacies of his career, the author has exhibited a singularly minute and apparently accurate acquaintance with the hidden springs and causes of the various political denouements that agitated Europe during the period of which he writes. Interwoven with the revolutionary incidents of the work, is an underplot, the groundwork of which is disappointed passion, terminating in an appalling and successful scheme of vengeance.

The principal, indeed we may say the only fault we have to find with "The Carbonaro," is the unsatisfactory abruptness of its termination. The first chapter introduces the reader to a mysterious event, the causes of which the remainder of the book is occupied in developing; but of its consequences, in the discovery of which he is not less interested, he is left in utter ignorance; the road in which he is made to accompany the author, assumes the form of a complete circle, at a certain point of which they commence their journey together in the first page, and in the last they arrive at the same point once more, and part with very little ceremony. Perhaps, however, it is the author's intention to write a continuation.

THE NEW-YORK STAGE.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

MR. SIMPSON'S BENEFIT.

WE stepped into the Park theatre, though at rather a late hour, on Monday evening, to see how affairs were going on at that establishment. We gave up all hopes of effecting a lodgment in the lower tier at the first glance—tried the second, but found it as impenetrable as Schumla—the third, which we were loath to venture into, having been trained up in the way that we should go, was the only resource, and so, like Falstaff, "hiding our honour in our necessities," we entered; but even here all "access and passage" to the boxes was blocked up by compact masses of people, and being averse to lobbying, in every shape, we even ascended into the fourth heaven, and ensconced ourselves in a corner of that remote region! from whence we espied our old friends Mrs. Malaprop, Acres, and Sir Anthony moving in dumb show below. Hearing was altogether out of the question, unless it was the upper notes of Mrs. Wheatley, the fine peculiar laugh of Hilson, or the harsh, grating complication of sounds which Miss Kelly emits when she uplifts her voice in a fashion peculiar to herself, and which, by some persons, is irreverently termed singing. The house was crowded from top to bottom; and right glad were we to see it. There is no man that has better deserved the public approbation than Mr. Simpson. There is a feeling of honour and respectability coupled with his name in the theatrical world, and all who know him in private life, freely acknowledge his worth as a man. The present season at the Park has been eminently successful—may it continue so.

"There is a tide in the affairs of men,
Which, taken at the flood, leads on to fortune."

Last season was the ebb—this is the flood, and we sincerely hope it will lead on to fortune. There is a fair prospect of it, for we observe the "universal favourite," Clara Fisher, is engaged—the enchantress who has allayed the tariff ferment in the south by turning its feelings into a fresh channel, and who now, after a long absence, returns to gladden the eyes of her northern friends. We hope she will take a fresh range of characters, as there is yet a wide field in which she would be eminently successful. Quere. Would not Farquhar's fine comedy of the "Recruiting Officer" be an excellent speculation at the Park? We would not wish to see better representatives of Sergeant Kite and Bullock, than Hilson and Placide, while Miss Clara might indulge her penchant for male attire in the sprightly and dashing part of Sylvia. DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

SAGACITY OF A DOG.

A REMARKABLE instance is given in the Scotsman of the sagacity of a dog. At a farm-house near Falkirk, during the late frost and snow, the hens were all missing from their roost, and could no where be found. In the evening the dog brought into the house in his mouth a hen apparently dead, which he laid down before the fire; he then departed and brought all the hens successively, laying them before the fire. It turned out that they had been benumbed by the frost, and in that situation had been discovered by the dog, who instinctively applied the proper remedy. The warmth of the fire soon brought them all to life and motion.

EXCELLENT RULES.

The following rules, from the private papers of Doctor West, were, according to his memorandum, thrown together, as general waymarks in the journey of life. They were advantageous to him, and, while they exhibit an honourable testimony to his moral worth, may be useful to others:—"Never to ridicule sacred things, or what others may esteem such, however absurd they may appear to me.—Never show levity where the people are professedly engaged in worship.—Never to resent a supposed injury, till I know the views and motives of the author of it. Nor on any occasion to retaliate.—Never to judge a person's character by external appearance.—Always to take the part of an absent person, who is censured in company, so far as truth and propriety will allow.—Never to think the worse of another on account of his differing from me in political or religious opinions.—Never to dispute, if I can fairly avoid it.—Not to dispute with a man more than seventy years old; nor with a woman; nor with an enthusiast.—Not to affect to be witty, or to jest, so as to wound the feelings of another.—To say as little as possible of myself and those who are near to me.—To aim at cheerfulness, without levity.—Not to obtrude my advice unasked.—Never to court the favour of the rich, by flattering either their vanity or their vices.—To respect virtue, though clothed in rags.—To speak with calmness and deliberation on all occasions; especially in circumstances which tend to irritate.—Frequently to review my conduct, and note my failings.—On all occasions to have in prospect the end of life and future state.—Not to flatter myself that I can act up

THE CASKET.

THE FLORENTINE LOVERS.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART I.

The groundwork of this story is in a late Italian publication, called the Florentine Observer, descriptive of the old buildings, and other circumstances of local interest in the capital of Tuscany.

At the time when Florence was divided into the two fierce parties of Guelphs and Ghibelines, there was great hostility between two families of the name of Bardi and Buondelmonti. It was seldom that love took place between individuals of houses so divided; but, when it did, it was proportionately vehement, either because the individuals themselves were vehement in all their passions, or because love, falling upon two gentle hearts, made them the more pity and love one another, to find themselves in so unnatural a situation.

Of this latter kind was an affection that took place between a young lady of the family of the Bardi, called Dianora d'Amerigo, and a youth of the other family, whose name was Ippolito. The girl was about fifteen, and in the full flower of her beauty and sweetness. Ippolito was about three years older, and looked two or three more, on account of a certain gravity and deep regard in the upper part of his face. You might know by his lips that he could love well, and by his eyes that he could keep the secret. There was a likeness, as sometimes happens, between the two lovers; and perhaps this was no mean help to their passion; for as we find painters often giving their own faces to their heroes, so the more excusable vanity of lovers delights to find that resemblance in one another, which Plato said was only the divorced half of the original human being rushing into communion with the other.

Be this as it may—and lovers in those times were not ignorant of such speculations—it needed but one sight of Dianora to make Ippolito fall violently in love with her. It was in church, on a great holiday. In the south, the church has ever been the place where people fall in love. It is there that the young of both sexes oftenest find themselves in each other's company. There the voluptuous that cannot fix their thoughts upon heaven, find congenial objects, more earthly, to win their attention; and there, the most innocent and devotional spirits, voluptuous also without being aware of it, and not knowing how to vent the grateful pleasure of their hearts, discover their tendency to repose on beings that can show themselves visibly sensible to their joy. The paintings, the perfumes, the music, the kind crucifix, the mixture of aspiration and earthly ceremony, the draperies, the white vestments of young and old, the boy's voices, the giant candles, typical of the seraphic ministrants about heaven's altar, the meeting of all ages and classes, the echoings of the aisles, the lights and shades of the pillars and vaulted roofs, the very struggle of day-light at the lofty windows, as if earth were at once present and not present—all have a tendency to confuse the boundaries of this world and the next, and to set the heart floating in that delicious mixture of elevation and humility, which is ready to sympathize with whatever can preserve to it something like its sensations, and save it from the hardness and definite fully of ordinary life. It was in a church that Boccaccio, not merely the voluptuous Boccaccio, who is but half known by the half-witted, but Boccaccio, the future painter of the Falcon and the Pot of Basil, first saw the beautiful face of his Fiammetta. In a church, Petrarch felt the sweet shadow fall on him that darkened his life for twenty years after. And the fond gratitude of the local historian for a tale of true love, has left it on record, that it was in the church of St. Giovanni, at Florence, and on the great day of Pardon, which falls on the thirteenth of January, that Ippolito de' Buondelmonte became enamoured of Dianora d'Amerigo.

[How delicious it is to repeat these beautiful Italian names, when they are not merely names. We find ourselves almost unconsciously writing them in a better hand than the rest; not merely for the sake of the printer, but for the pleasure of lingering upon the sound.]

When the people were about to leave church, Ippolito, in turning to speak to an acquaintance, lost sight of his unknown beauty. He made haste to plant himself at the door, telling his companion that he should like to see the ladies come out; for he had not the courage to say which lady. When he saw Dianora appear, he changed colour, and saw nothing else. Yet though he beheld, and beheld her distinctly, so as to carry away every feature in his heart, it seemed to him afterward that he had seen her only as in a dream. She glided by him like a thing of heaven, drawing her veil over her head. As he had not had the courage to speak of her, he had still less the courage to ask her name; but he was saved the trouble.

"Heaven bless her beautiful face!" cried a beggar at the door; "she always gives double of any one else."

"Curse her!" muttered Ippolito's acquaintance; "she is one of the Bardi."

The ear of the lover heard both these exclamations, and they made an indelible impression.

Being a lover of books and poetry, and intimate with the most liberal of the two parties, such as Dante Alighieri—afterward so famous—and Guido Cavalcanti, Ippolito, though a warm partisan himself, and implicated in a fierce encounter that had lately taken place between some persons on horseback, had been saved from the worst feelings attendant on political hostility; and they now appeared to him odious. He had no thought, it is true, of forgiving one of the old Bardi, who had cut his father down from his horse; but he would now have sentenced the whole party to a milder banishment than before; and to curse a female belonging to it, and that female Dianora!—he differed with the stupid fellow that had done it whenever they met afterward.

It was a heavy reflection to Ippolito to think that he could not see his mistress in her own house. She had a father and mother living as well as himself, and was surrounded with relations. It was a heavier still, that he knew not how to make her sensible of his passion; and the heaviest of all, that being so lovely, she would certainly be carried off by another husband. What was he to do? He had no excuse for writing to her; and as to serenading her under her window, unless he meant to call all the neighbours to witness his temerity and lose his life at once in that brawling age, it was not to be thought of. He was obliged to content himself with watching, as well as he could, the windows of her abode, following her about whenever he saw her leave it, and with pardonable vanity trying to catch her attention by some little action that should give her a good thought of the stranger; such as anticipating her in giving alms to a beggar. We must even record, that on one occasion he contrived to stumble against a dog and tread on his toes, in order that he might ostentatiously help the poor beast out of the way. But his day of delight was church-day. Not a fast, not a feast, did he miss; not a Sunday, nor a saint's-day.

"The devotion of that young gentleman," said an old widow lady, her aunt, who was in the habit of accompanying Dianora, "is indeed edifying; and yet he is a mighty pretty youth, and might waste his time in sins and vanities with the gayest of them."

And the old widow lady sighed, doubtless out of a tender pity for the gay. Her recommendation of Ippolito to her niece's notice would have been little applauded by her family; but, to say the truth, she was not responsible. His manœuvres and constant presence had already gained Dianora's attention; and, with all the unaffected instinct of an Italian, she was not long in suspecting who it was that attracted his devotions, and in wishing very heartily that they might continue. She longed to learn who he was, but felt the same want of courage as he himself had experienced.

"Did you observe," said the aunt one day, after leaving church, "how the poor boy blushed, because he did but catch my eye? Truly, such modesty is very rare."

"Learn aunt," replied Dianora, with a mixture of real and affected archness, of pleasure and of gratitude, "I thought you never wished me to notice the faces of young men."

"Not of young men, niece," returned the aunt, gravely; "not of persons of twenty-eight, or thirty, or so, nor indeed of youths in general, however young; but then this youth is very different; and the most innocent of us may look, once in a way or so, at so very modest and respectful a young gentleman. I say respectful, because when I gave him a slight courtesy of acknowledgment, or so, for making way for me in the aisle, he bowed to me with so solemn and thankful an air as if the favour had come from me, which was extremely polite; and if he is very handsome, poor boy, how can he help that? Saints have been handsome in their days, ay, and young, or their pictures are not at all like, which is impossible; and I am sure St. Dominic himself, in the wax-work, heaven forgive me! hardly looks sweeter and humbler at the madonna and child, than he did at me and you, as we went by."

"Dear aunt," rejoined Dianora, "I did not mean to reproach you, I'm sure; but, sweet aunt, we do not know him, you know; and you know!"

"Know!" cried the old lady, "I'm sure I know him as well as if he were my own aunt's son—which might not be impossible, though she is a little younger than myself; and if he were my own, I should not be ashamed."

"And who then," inquired Dianora, scarcely articulating her words, "who then is he?"

"Who?" said the aunt; "why the most edifying young gentleman in all Florence, that's who he is; and it does not signify what he is else, manifestly being a gentleman as he is, and one of the noblest, I warrant; and I wish you may have no worse husband, child, when you come to marry, though there is time enough to think of that. Young ladies, now-a-days, are always for knowing who every body is, who he is, and what he is, and whether he is this person or that person, and is of the grand prior's side, or the archbishop's side, and what not; and all this before they will allow him to be even handsome; which, I am sure, was not so in my youngest days. It is all right and proper, if matrimony is concerned, or they are in danger of marrying below their condition, or a profane person, or one that's hideous, or a heretic; but to admire an evident young saint, and one that never misses church, Sunday or saint's-day, or any day, for aught that I see, is a thing that, if any thing, shows we may hope for the company of young saints hereafter; and if so very edifying a young gentleman is also respectful to the ladies, was not the blessed St. Francis himself of his opinion in that matter? And did not the seraphical St. Teresa admire him the more for it? And does not St. Paul, in his very epistles, send his best respects to the ladies Tryphena and Tryphosa? And was there ever woman in the New Testament—with reverence be it spoken, if we may say women of such blessed females—was there ever woman, I say, in the New Testament, not even excepting Madonna Magdalen, who had been possessed with seven devils—which is not so many by half as some ladies I could mention—nor madonna, the other poor lady, whom the unforgiving hypocrites wanted to stone!—and here the good old lady wept, out of a mixture of devotion and gratitude—"was there one of all these women, or any other, whom our blessed Lord himself?"—and here the tears came into the gentle eyes of Dianora—"did not treat with all that sweetness, and kindness, and tenderness, and brotherly love, which, like all his other actions, and as the seraphical Father Antonio said the other day in the pulpit, proved him to be not only from heaven, but the truest of all nobles on earth, and a natural gentleman born?"

We know not how many more reasons the good old lady would have given, why all the feelings of poor Dianora's heart, not excepting her very religion, which was truly one of them, should induce her to encourage her affection for Ippolito. By the end of this sentence they had arrived at their home, and the poor youth returned to his. We say "poor" of both the lovers, for by this time they had both become sufficiently enamoured to render their cheeks the paler for discovering their respective families, which Dianora had now done as well as Ippolito.

A circumstance on the Sunday following had nearly discovered them, not only to one another, but to all the world. Dianora had latterly never dared to steal a look at Ippolito, for fear of seeing his eyes upon her; and Ippolito, who was less certain of her regard for him than herself, imagined that he had somehow offended her. A few Sundays before, she had sent him home bounding for joy. There had been two places empty where he was kneeling, one near him, and the other a little farther off. The aunt and the niece, who came in after him, and found themselves at the spot where he was, were perplexed which of the two places to choose; when it seemed to Ippolito, that by a little movement of her arm, Dianora decided for the one nearest him. He had also another delight. The old lady, in the course of the service, turned to her niece, and asked her why she did not sing as usual. Dianora bowed her head, and in a minute or two afterward, Ippolito heard the sweetest voice in the world, low indeed, almost to a whisper, but audible to him. He thought it trembled; and he trembled also. It seemed to thrill within his spirit, in the same manner that the organ thrills through the body. No such symptom of preference occurred afterward. The ladies did not come so near him, whatever pains he took to occupy so much room before they came in, and then make room when they appeared. However, he was self-satisfied as well as ingenious enough in his reasonings on the subject, not to lay much stress upon this behaviour, till it lasted week after week, and till he never again found Dianora looking even toward the quarter in which he sat: for it is our duty to confess, that if the lovers were two of the devotedest of the congregation, which is certain, they were apt also, at intervals, to be the least attentive; and, furthermore, that they would each pretend to look toward places at a little distance from the desired object, in order that they might take in, with the sidelong power of the eye, the presence and look of one another. But for some time Dianora had ceased even to do this; and though Ippolito gazed on her the most steadfastly, and saw that she was paler than before, he began to persuade himself that it was not on his account. At length, a sort of desperation urged him to get nearer to her, if she would not condescend to come near himself; and, on the Sunday in question, scarcely knowing what he did, or how he saw, felt, or breathed, he knelt right down beside her. There was a pillar next him, which luckily kept him somewhat in the shade; and, for a moment, he leaned his forehead against the cold marble, which revived him. Dianora did not know he was by her. She did not sing; nor did the aunt ask her. She kept one unaltered posture, looking upon her mass-book, and he thought she did this on purpose. Ippolito, who had become weak with his late struggles of mind, felt almost suffocated with his sensations. He was kneeling side by side with her; her idea, her presence, her very drapery, which was all that he dared to feel himself in contact with, the consciousness of kneeling with her in the presence of Him whom tender hearts implore for pity on their infirmities, all rendered him intensely sensible of his situation. By a strong effort, he endeavoured to turn his self-pity into a feeling entirely religious; but when he put his hands together, he felt the tears ready to gush away so irrepressibly, that he did not dare it.

At last the aunt, who had in fact looked about for him, recognised him with some surprise, and more pleasure. She had begun to suspect his secret; and though she knew who he was, and that the two families were at variance, yet a great deal of good nature, a sympathy with pleasures of which no woman had tasted more, and some considerable disputes she had lately with another old lady, her kinswoman, on the subject of politics, determined her upon at least giving the two lovers that sort of encouragement, which arises not so much from any decided object we have in view, as from a certain vague sense of benevolence, mixed with a lurking wish to have our own way. Accordingly, the well-meaning old widow lady, without much consideration, and loud enough for Ippolito to hear, whispered her niece to "let the gentleman next her read in her book, as he seemed to have forgotten to bring his own."

Dianora, without lifting her eyes, and never suspecting who it was, moved her book sideways, with a courteous inclination of the head, for the gentleman to take it. He did so. He held it with her. He could not hinder his hand from shaking; but Dianora's reflections were so occupied upon one whom she so little thought so near her, that she did not perceive it. At length the book tottered so in his hand, that she could not but notice it. She turned to see if the gentleman was ill; and instantly looked back again. She felt that she herself was too weak to look at him, and whispering to her aunt, "I am very unwell," the ladies rose and made their way out of the church. As soon as she felt the fresh air she fainted, and was carried home; and it happened, at the same moment, that Ippolito, unable to keep his feelings to himself, leaned upon the marble pillar at which he was kneeling, and sighed aloud. He fancied she had left him in disdain. Luckily for him, a circumstance of this kind was not unknown in a place where penitents would sometimes be overpowered by a sense of their crimes; and though Ippolito was recognised by some, they concluded he had not been the innocent person they supposed. They made up their minds in future, that his retired and bookish habits, and his late evident suffering, were alike the result of some dark offence; and among these persons, the acquaintance who had cursed Dianora when he first beheld her, was glad to be one; for without knowing his passion for her, much less her return of it, which was more than the poor youth knew himself, he envied him for his accomplishments and popularity.

Ippolito dragged himself home, and after endeavouring to move about for a day or two, and to get as far as Dianora's abode—an attempt he gave up for fear of being unable to come away again—was fairly obliged to take to his bed. What a mixture of delight with sorrow, would he have felt, had he known that his mistress was almost in as bad a state! The poor aunt, who soon discovered her niece's secret, now found herself in a dreadful dilemma; and the worst of it was, that being on the female side of the love, and told by Dianora that it would be the death of her if she disclosed it to him, or any body connected with him, or, indeed, any body at all, she did not know what steps to take. However, as she believed that at least death might possibly ensue if the dear young people were not assured of each other's love, and certainly did not believe in any such mortality as her niece spoke of, she was about to make her first election out of two or three measures which she was resolved upon taking, when, luckily for the salvation of Dianora's feelings, she was surprised by a visit from the person whom, of all persons in the world, she wished to see—Ippolito's mother.

The two ladies soon came to a mutual understanding, and separated with comfort for their respective patients. We need not wait to describe how a mother came to the knowledge of her son's wishes; nor will it be necessary to relate how delighted the two lovers were to hear of one another, and to be assured of each other's love. But Ippolito's illness now put on a new aspect; for the certainty of his being welcome to Dianora, and the easiness with which he saw his mother give way to his inclinations, made him impatient for an interview. Dianora was afraid of encountering him as usual in public; and he never ceased urging his mother, till she consented to advise with Dianora's aunt upon what was to be done. Indeed, with the usual weakness of those who take any steps, however likely to produce future trouble, rather than continue a present uneasiness, she herself thought it high time to do something for the poor boy; for the house began to remark on his strange conduct. All his actions were either too quick or too slow. At one time he would start up to perform the most trivial office of politeness, as if he were going to stop a conflagration; at another, the whole world might move before him without his noticing. He would now leap on his horse, as if the enemy were at the city gates; and next day, when going to mount it, stop on a sudden, with the reins in his hands, and fall a musing. "What is the matter with the boy?" said his father, who was impatient at seeing him so little his own master; "has he stolen a box of jewels?" for somebody had spread a report that he gambled, and it was observed that he never had any money in his pocket. The truth is, he gave it all away to the objects of Dianora's bounty, particularly to the man who blessed her at the church-door. One day his father, who loved a bitter joke, made a young lady, who sat next him at dinner, lay her hand before him instead of the plate; and upon being asked why he did not eat, he was very near taking a piece of it for a mouthful. "Oh the gallant youth!" cried the father, and Ippolito blushed up to the eyes; which was taken as a proof that the irony was well founded. But Ippolito thought of Dianora's hand, how it held the book with him when he knelt by her side; and, after a little pause, he turned and took up that of the young lady, and begged her pardon with the best grace in the world. "He has the air of a prince," thought his father, "if he would but behave himself like other young men." The young lady thought he had the air of a lover; and as soon as the meal was over, his mother put on her veil, and went to seek a distant relation, called Signora Veronica.

Signora Veronica was in a singular position with regard to the two families of Bardi and Buondelmonti. She happened to be related at nearly equal distances to them both; and she hardly knew whether to be prouder of the double relationship, or more annoyed with the evil countenances they showed her, if she did not pay great attention to one of them, and no attention to the other. The pride remained uppermost, as it is apt to do; and she hazarded all consequences for the pleasure of inviting now some of the young de Bardi, and now some of the young de Buondelmonti; hinting to them, when they went away, that it would be as well for them not to say that they had heard any thing of the other family's visiting her. The young people were not sorry to keep the matter as secret as possible, because their visits to Gossip Veronica were always restrained for a long time, if any thing of the sort transpired; and thus a spirit of concealment was sown in their young minds, which might have turned out worse for Ippolito and Dianora, if their hearts had not been so good.

SKETCHES FROM LIFE.

FROM THE SHEPHERD'S CALENDAR.*

NANCY CHISHOLM.

BY JAMES HOGG.

JOHN CHISHOLM, farmer of Moorlaggan, was, in the early part of his life, a wealthy and highly respectable man, and associated with the best gentlemen of the country; and in those days he was accounted to be not only reasonable, but mild and benevolent in his disposition. A continued train of unfortunate speculations, however, at last reduced his circumstances so much, that though, at the time when this tale commences, he still continued solvent, it was well enough known to all the country that he was on the brink of ruin; and, by an unfortunate fatality too inherent in human nature, still as he descended in circumstances, he advanced in pride and violence of temper, until his conduct grew so intolerable as scarcely to be submitted to even by his own family.

Mr. Chisholm had five daughters, well brought up, and well educated; but the second, whose name was Nancy Chisholm, was acknowledged to be the most beautiful and accomplished of them all. She was so buoyant of spirits, that she hardly appeared to know whether she was treading on the face of the earth, or bounding on the breeze; and before Nancy was eighteen, as was quite natural, she was beloved by the handsomest lad in the parish, whose proper christian name was Archibald Gillies, but who, by some patronymic or designation of whose import I am ignorant, was always called Gillespick.

Young Gillies was quite below Nancy in rank, although in their circumstances they were by this time much the same. His father being only a small sub-tenant of Mr. Chisholm's, the latter would have thought his child degraded, had she been discovered even speaking to the young man. He had, moreover, been bred to the profession of a tailor, which, though an honest occupation, and perhaps more lucrative than many others, is viewed, in the country places in Scotland, with a degree of contempt far exceeding that with which it is regarded in more polished communities. Notwithstanding of all this, Gillespick Gillies, the tailor, had the preference of all others, in the heart of pretty Nancy; and, as he durst not pay his addresses to her openly, or appear at Moorlaggan by day, they were driven to an expedient quite in mode with the class to which Gillies belonged, but as entirely inconsistent with that propriety of conduct which ought to be observed by young ladies like those of Moorlaggan—they met by night; that is, about night-fall in summer, and at the same hour in winter, which made it very late in the night.

Now it unluckily had so happened, that Gillies, the young dashing tailor, newly arrived from Aberdeen, had, at a great wedding the previous winter, paid all his attentions to Siobla, Nancy's eldest sister. This happened, indeed, by mere accident, owing to Nancy's many engagements; but Siobla did not know that; and Gillies being the best dancer in the barn, led her to the head every time, and behaved so courteously that he made a greater impression on her heart than she was willing to acknowledge. As all ranks mingle at a country wedding, the thing was noted and talked of, both among the low and high; but neither the high nor the low thought or said that young Gillies had made a very prudent choice. She was not, however, the tailor's choice; for his whole heart was fixed on her sister Nancy.

The two slept in one chamber, and it was impossible for the younger to escape to her lover without confiding the secret to Siobla, which, therefore, she was obliged to do; and from that moment jealousy—for jealousy it was, though Miss Siobla called it by another name—began to rankle in her bosom. She called Gillies every degrading name she could invent—a profligate, a libertine—and to sum up all, she called him a tailor, thereby finishing the sum of degeneracy, and crowning the climax of her reproaches.

Nancy was, nevertheless, exceedingly happy with her handsome lover, who all but adored her. She enjoyed his company perhaps the more on two accounts, one of which she might probably deduce from the words of a wise man, that "stolen waters are sweet, and bread eaten in secret is pleasant;" but another most certainly was, that Gillies having opened her eyes to the true state of her father's affairs, and by this led her to perceive that she was only "a penniless lass wi' a lang pedigree," she could not help drawing the conclusion that the tailor was as good as she, and that the course she was taking, besides being very agreeable to her own wishes, was the most prudent that could be conceived.

* A new work, in two volumes, just published.

This information preying on Nancy's mind, she could not help communicating it in confidence to one of her sisters—Siobla, it is to be supposed—who believing the report to be a malicious falsehood, went straight to her father with the news, as soon as he arrived from the market. Some vexatious occurrences connected with his depressed fortunes had put him sorely out of humour that night, and he had likewise been drinking a good deal, which made matters worse; so that when Siobla informed him of the country rumour, that he was about to become a bankrupt, his fury rose to an ungovernable pitch, and, seizing her by the arm, he adjured her forthwith to name her informer, against whom he at the same time avowed the most consummate vengeance. His daughter was frightened, and without hesitation told him that she had learnt the report from her sister Nancy. Nancy was a favourite with old Chisholm, but that circumstance seemed only to inflame him the more; that one so much cherished and beloved should make herself instrumental in breaking his credit, was, he thought, a degree of ingratitude that justified his severest resentment, and with a countenance of the utmost fury he turned on her, and demanded if what he had heard was true. With a face as pale as death, and trembling lips, she acknowledged that it was. But when desired to name her informer, she remained silent, trembled, and wept. On being further urged and threatened, she said, hesitatingly, that she did not invent the story; and supposed she had heard it among the servants.

"This will not do, Miss," exclaimed her father; "tell me at once the name of your informer; and, depend upon it, that person, whoever it is, had better never been born."

Nancy could not answer, but sobbed and wept.

Just at that unlucky moment a whistle was heard from the wood opposite the window. This was noticed by Mr. Chisholm, who looked a little startled, and inquired what or who it was; but no one gave him any answer.

It had been settled between the two lovers, that when Gillies came to see Nancy, he was to whistle from a certain spot, in a certain manner, while she was to open the window, and hold the light close to the glass for an instant, that being a token that she heard and understood the signal. In the present dilemma, the performance of her part of the agreement was impracticable; and, of course, when old Chisholm was once more rising into a paroxysm of rage at his daughter, the ominous whistle was repeated.

"What is this?" demanded he, in a peremptory tone. "Tell me instantly; for I see by your looks you know and understand what it is. Siobla, do you know?"

"Yes, I do," replied Siobla. "I know well enough what it is—I do not hear it so seldom."

"Well, then, inform me at once what it means," said her father.

"It is Nancy's sweetheart come to whistle her out—young tailor Gillies!" answered Siobla, without any endeavour to avert her father's wrath, by giving the information in an indirect way.

"Oho! is it thus?" exclaimed the infuriated father. "And Nancy always answers and attends to this audacious tailor's whistle, does she?"

"Indeed she does, sir; generally once or twice every week," replied the young woman in the same willing tone.

"The secret is then out!" said old Chisholm, in words that quavered with anger. "It is plain from whence the injurious report has been attained! Too fond father—alas, poor old man! have matters already come thus low with thee? And hast thou indeed nourished and cherished this favourite child, giving her an education fitting her for the highest rank in society, and all that she might throw herself away upon a—a—a tailor!—Begone, girls! I must converse with this degraded creature alone."

When her sisters had left the apartment, Nancy knelt, wept, prayed, and begged forgiveness; but a temporary distraction had banished her father's reason, and he took hold of her long fair hair, wound it round his left hand in the most methodical manner, and began to beat her with his cane. She uttered a scream; on which he stopped, and told her, that if she uttered another sound before he had done chastising her, it should be her last; but this causing her to scream only ten times louder, he beat her with such violence that he shivered the cane to pieces. He then desisted, calling her the ruin of her sisters, of himself, and all her father's house; opened the door, and was about to depart and leave her, when the tailor's whistle again sounded in his ears, louder and nearer than before. This once more drove him to madness, and seizing a heavy dog-whip that hung in the lobby, he returned into the parlour, and struck his daughter repeatedly in the most unmerciful manner. During the concluding part of this horrid scene, she opened not her mouth, but eyed her ferocious parent with composure, thinking she had nothing but death to expect from his hands.

Alas! death was nothing to the pangs she then suffered, and those she was doomed to suffer! Her father at last ceased from his brutal treatment, led her from the house, threw her from him with a curse, and closed the door with a force that made the casements of the house clatter.

There never was perhaps a human being whose circumstances in life were as suddenly changed, or more deplorable than Nancy Chisholm's were that night. But it was not only her circumstances in life that were changed: she felt at once that the very nature within her was changed also, and that, from being a thing of happiness and joy, approaching to the nature of a seraph, she was now converted into a fiend. She had a cup measured to her which nature could not endure, and its baneful influences had the instant effect of making her abhor her own nature, and become a rebel to all its milder qualities.

The first resolution she formed was that of full and ample revenge. She determined to make such a dreadful retaliation as should be an example to all jealous sisters and unnatural parents, while the world lasted. Her plan was to wait till after midnight, and then set fire to the premises, and burn her father, her sisters, and all that pertained to them, to ashes. In little more than an instant was her generous nature so far altered, that she exulted in the prospect of this horrid catastrophe.

With such a purpose the poor wretch went and hid herself until all was quiet; and there is no doubt that she would have put her scheme in execution, had it not been for the want of fire to kindle the house; for as to going into any dwelling, or seeing the face of an acquaintance, in her present degraded condition, her heart shrunk from it. So, after spending some hours in abortive attempts at raising fire, she was obliged to depart, bidding an eternal adieu to all that she had hitherto held dear on earth.

On the approach of daylight she retired into a thicket, and, at a brook, washed and bathed her bloated arms and face, disentangled and combed her yellow hair with her fingers, and when she thought she was unobserved, drew the train of her gown over her head, and sped away on her journey, whither she knew not. No distinct account of her escape, or of what became of her for some time, can be given; but the whole bent of her inclinations was to do evil; she felt herself impelled to it by a motive she could not account for, but which she had no power or desire to resist. She felt it as it were incumbent on her always to retaliate evil for good—the most fiendish disposition that the human heart could feel. She had a desire that the evil one would appear in person, that she might enter into a formal contract to do evil. She had a longing to impart to others some share of the torment she had herself endured, and missed no opportunity of inflicting such. Once, in the course of her wanderings, she met, in a sequestered place, a little girl, whom she seized, and beat her "within an inch of her life," as she called it. She was at this period quite a vagabond, and a pest wherever she went.

The manner in which she first got into a place was not the least remarkable of her adventures. On first coming to Aberdeen, she went into the house of one Mr. Simon Gordon, in the upper Kirkgate, and asked some food, which was readily granted her by the housekeeper; for, owing to her great beauty and superior address, few ever refused her any thing she asked. She seemed little disposed to leave the house again, and by no means could the housekeeper prevail upon her to depart, unless she were admitted to speak with Mr. Gordon.

This person was an old bachelor, rich and miserly; and the housekeeper was terrified at the very idea of acknowledging to him that she had disposed of the least morsel of food in charity; far less dared she allow a mendicant to carry her petition into her master's very presence. But the pertinacity of the individual she had now to deal with fairly overcame her fears, and she carried up to Mr. Simon Gordon the appalling message, that a "seeking woman," that is, a begging woman, demanded to speak with him. Whether it was that Mr. Simon's abhorrence of persons of that cast was driven from the field by the audacity of the announcement, I cannot pretend to say; but it is certain that he remitted in his study of the state of the public funds, and granted the interview. And as wonders, when they once commence, are, for the most part, observed to continue to follow each other for a time, he not only assented to the housekeeper by his ready assent to let the stranger have speech of him, but the poor woman had nearly sunk into the ground with dismay when she heard him, after the interview was over, give orders that this same wanderer was to be retained in the house in the capacity of her assistant. Here, however, the miraculous part of this adventure stops; for the housekeeper, who had previously been a rich old miser's only servant, did, in the first place, remonstrate loudly against any person being admitted to share her labours, or her power; and on finding all that could be said totally without effect, she refused to remain with her master any longer, and immediately departed, leaving Nancy Chisholm in full possession of the premises.

Being now in some degree tired of a wandering, unsettled life, she continued with Mr. Gordon, justifying her hatred of the world rather by a sullen and haughty apathy, than by any active demonstrations of enmity; and, what was somewhat remarkable, by her attention to the wants of the peevish and feeble old man her master, she gained greatly upon his good will.

In this situation her father discovered her, after an absence of three years, during which time his compunctious visitings had never either ceased or diminished from the time he had expelled her his house, while under the sway of unbridled passion. He never had more heart for any thing in the world. All his affairs went to wreck; he became bankrupt, and was driven from his ample possessions, and was forced to live in a wretched cottage, in a sort of genteel penury. But all his misfortunes and disappointments put together, did not affect him half so much as the loss of his darling daughter; he never doubted that she had gone to the home of her lover, to the house of old Gillies; and this belief was one that carried great bitterness to his heart. When he discovered that she had never been seen there, his next terror was that she had committed suicide; and he trembled night and day, anticipating all the horrid shapes in which he might hear that the desperate act had been accomplished. When the dread of this began to wear away, a still more frightful idea arose to haunt his troubled imagination—it was that of his once beloved child driven to lead a life of infamy and disgrace. This conclusion was but too natural, and he brooded on it, with many repentant tears, for the space of nearly two years, when he at last set out with a resolution either to find his lost daughter, or spend the remainder of his life in search of her.

It is painful to think of the scenes that he went through in this harassing and heart-rending search, until he at length discovered her in the house of Mr. Simon Gordon. For a whole week he had not the courage to visit her, though he stole looks of her every day; but he employed himself in making every inquiry concerning her present situation.

One day she was sitting, in gay attire, sewing, and singing the following rhyme, in crooning of which she spent a part of every day:

I am lost to peace, I am lost to grace,
I am lost to all but death and sin;
I have lost my way in the light of day,
And the gates of heaven I will never win.
If one sigh would part from my burning heart,
Or one tear would rise in my thirsty eye,
Through woe and pain it might come again—
The soul that fled from deep injury.
In one hour of grief I would find relief,
One pang of sorrow would ease my pain;
But joy or woe, in this world below,
I can never never know again!

Whilst she was thus engaged, old Chisholm, with an agitated heart and trembling frame, knocked gently at the door, which was slowly and carelessly opened by his daughter; for she performed every thing as if she had no interest in it. The two gazed on one another for a moment, without speaking; but the eyes of the father were beaming with love and tenderness, while those of the daughter had that glazed and joyless gleam which too well bespoke her hardened spirit. The old man spread out his arms to embrace her; but she closed the door upon him. He retired again to his poor lodgings, from whence he sent her a letter fraught with tenderness and sorrow, which produced no answer.

There was another besides her father who had found her out before this time, though he had never ventured to make himself known to her; and that was her former lover, Gillespick Gillies, the tailor. He had traced her in all her wanderings, and though it had been once his intention to settle in Edinburgh, yet, for her sake, he hired himself to a great clothier and tailor in the city of Aberdeen. After her father's ineffectual application to her, young Gillies ventured to make his appearance; but his reception was far from what he hoped. She was embarrassed and cold, attaching blame to him for every thing, particularly for persuading her out to the woods by night, which had been the means of drawing down her father's anger upon her. He proffered all the reparation in his power; but she would not hear him speak, and even forbade him ever to attempt seeing her again.

The tailor's love was, however, too deeply rooted to be so easily overcome. He would not be said nay, but waited upon her evening and morning; still she remained callous and unmovable, notwithstanding of all his kind attentions.

The frame of her spirit at this period must have been an anomaly in human nature; she knew no happiness, and shunned, with the utmost pertinacity, every avenue leading toward its heavenly shrine. She often said afterward, that she believed her father's rod had beat an angel out of her, and a demon into its place.

But Gillespick, besides being an affectionate and faithful lover, was a singularly acute youth. He told this perverse beauty again and again that she was acknowledged the flower of all Aberdeen, saving a Miss Marshall, who sat in the college church every Sunday, to whom some gentlemen gave the preference; and then he always added, "But I am quite certain that, were you to appear there dressed in your best style, every one would at once see how much you outshine her." He went over this so often, that Nancy's vanity became interested, and she proffered, of her own accord, to accompany him one day to the college kirk.

From the time that Gillies got her to enter the church-door again, although she went from no good motive, he considered the victory won, and counted on the certainty of reclaiming his beloved from despair and destruction. All eyes were soon turned on her beauty, but hers sought out and rested on Mary Marshall alone. She was convinced of her own superiority, which added to the elegance of her carriage and gayety of her looks; so that she went home exceedingly well pleased with—the minister's sermon!

She went back in the afternoon, the next day, and every day thereafter; and her lover noted that she sometimes appeared to fix her attention on the minister's discourse. But one day in particular, when he was preaching on that divine precept, contained in St. Luke's Gospel, "Bless them that curse you, and pray for them which despitefully use you," she seemed all the while enrapt by the most ardent feelings, and never for one moment took her eyes from the speaker. Her lover perceived this, and kept his eyes steadfastly fixed on her face. At last the reverend divine, in his application of this doctrine to various characters, painted her own case in such a light that it appeared drawn from nature. He then expatiated on the sweet and heavenly joys of forgiveness with such ardour and devotion, that tears once more began to beam in those bright eyes, whose fountains seemed long to have been dried up; and ere the preacher concluded, she was forced to hide her face, and give free vent to her feelings, weeping abundantly.

Her lover conducted her home, and observed a total alteration in her manner toward him. This change on her seared and hardened spirit was more, however, than her frame could brook. The next day she was ill, and she grew worse and worse daily; a strange disease was hers, for she was seized with stubborn and fierce paroxysms, very much resembling those possessed of devils in the dawning of Christianity. It appeared exactly as if a good spirit and an evil one were contending for the possession of her person as their tabernacle, none of the medical faculty being able to account for these extraordinary changes in a natural way. Her lover hired a sick nurse, who attended both on her and the old man, which pleased the latter well, and he thought there was not such a man in the city of Aberdeen as the young tailor.

Nancy's disease was at length mastered, but it left her feeble and emaciated, and from that time forth, she showed herself indeed an altered woman. The worthy divine who first opened her eyes to her lost condition, had visited her frequently in her sickness, and repeated his exhortations. Her lover waited on her every day; and not only this, but being, as I before observed, an acute youth, he carried to the house with him cordials for the old miser, and told or read him the news from the stock-exchange. Nancy was now attached to Gillespick with the most ardent and pure affection, and more deeply than in her early days of frolic and thoughtlessness; for now her love toward him was mel- lowed by a ray from heaven. In few words, they were married. Old Simon Gordon died shortly after, and left them more than half his fortune, amounting, it was said, to eleven thousand pounds; a piece of generosity to which he was moved, not only by the attention shown him in his latter days by the young pair, but, as he expressed it in his will, "being convinced that Gillies would take care of the money." This legacy was a great fortune for an Aberdeen tailor and clothier. He bought the half of his master's stock and business, and in consequence of some army and navy contracts, realized a very large fortune in a short time.

Old Chisholm was by this time reduced to absolute beggary; he lived among his former wealthy acquaintances, sometimes in the hall, sometimes in the parlour, as their good or bad humour prevailed. His daughters, likewise, were all forced to accept situations as upper servants, and were, of course, very unhappily placed, countenanced by no class, being too proud to associate with those in the station to which they had fallen. The company of lowlanders that had taken Moorlaggan on Chisholm's failure, followed his example, and failed also. The farm was again in the market, and nobody to bid any thing for it; at length an agent from Edinburgh took it for a rich lady, at half the rent that had been paid for it before; and then every one said, had old John Chisholm held it at such a rent, he would have been the head of the country to that day. The whole of the stock and furniture were bought up from the creditors, paid in ready money, and the discount returned; and as this was all done by the Edinburgh agent, no one knew who was to be the farmer, although the shepherds and servants were hired, and the business of the farm went on as before.

Old Chisholm was at this time living in the house of a Mr. Mitchell, on Spey, not far from Pitmain, when he received a letter from this same Edinburgh agent, stating, that the new farmer of Moorlaggan wanted to speak with him on very important business relating to that farm; and that all his expenses would be paid to that place, and back again, or to what other place in the country he chose to go. Chisholm showed Mr. Mitchell the letter, who said, he understood it was to settle the marches about some disputed land, and it would be as well for him to go, and make a good charge for his trouble, and at the same time offered to accommodate him with a pony. Mr. Mitchell could not spare his own saddle-horse, having to go a journey; so he mounted Mr. Chisholm on a small shaggy highland nag, with crop ears, and equipped with an old saddle, and a bridle with hair reins. It was the evening of the third day after he left Mr. Mitchell's house before he reached Moorlaggan; and as he went up Coolen-aird, he could not help reflecting with bitterness of spirit on the alteration of times with him. It was not many years ago when he was wont to ride by the same path, mounted on a fine horse of his own, with a livery servant behind him; now he rode a little shabby nag, with crop ears and a hair bridle, and even that diminutive creature belonged to another man. Formerly he had a comfortable home, and a respectful family to welcome him; now he had no home, and that family was all scattered abroad. "Alas!" said he to himself, "times are indeed sadly altered with me; ay, and I may affect to blame misfortune for all that has befallen me; but I cannot help being persuaded that the man who is driven by unmanly passions to do that of which he is ashamed both before heaven and man, can never prosper. Oh, my child! my lost and darling child! What I have suffered for her, both in body, mind, and outward estate!"

In this downcast and querulous mood did the forlorn old man reach his former habitation. All was neat and elegant about the place, and there was a chaise standing at the end of the house. When old Chisholm saw this, he did not venture up to the front door, but alighted, and led his cropeared pony to the back door, at which he knocked, and having stated the errand upon which he came, was, after some delay, ushered into the presence of a courtly dame, who accosted him in proud and dignified language, as follows:

"Your name is Mr. John Chisholm, I believe?"

"It is, madam; at your service."

"And you were once farmer here, I believe?"—A bow.

"Ay. Hem. And how did you lose your farms?"

"Through misfortunes, madam, and by giving too much credit to insufficient parties."

"Ay—so! That was not prudent in you to give so much credit in such quarters—eh?"

"I have been favoured with a letter from your agent, madam," said Chisholm, to whom this supercilious tone of cross-questioning was far from being agreeable, "and I beg to know what are your commands with me."

"Ay. True. Very right. So you don't like to talk of your own affairs, don't you? No; it seems not. Why, the truth is, that my agent wished me to employ you as factor or manager of these lands, as my husband and I must live for the greater part of the year at a great distance. We are willing to give a good salary; and I believe there is no man so fit for our purpose. But I have heard accounts of you that I do not like—that you were an inexorable tyrant in your own family, abusing and maltreating the most amiable of them in a very unmanly manner. And I have heard, but I hope not truly, that you drove one daughter to disgrace and destruction."

Here Chisholm turned his face towards the window, burst into tears, and said, he hoped she had not sent for a miserable and degraded old man to torture his feelings by probing those wounds of the soul that were incurable.

"Nay, I beg your pardon, old gentleman; I sent for you to do you a service. I was only mentioning a vile report that reached my ear, in hopes you could exculpate yourself."

"Alas, madam, I cannot."

"Dreadful!—dreadful! Father of heaven, could thy hand frame a being with feelings like this! But I hope you did not, as is reported. No—you could not—you did not strike her, did you?"

"Alas! alas!" exclaimed the agonized old man.

"What! beat her—scourge her—throw her from your house at midnight, with a father's curse upon her head?"

"I did! I did! I did!"

"Monster!—monster! Go, and hide your devoted and execrable head in some cavern in the bowels of the earth, and wear out the remainder of your life in praying to thy God for repentance; for thou art not fit to herd with the rest of his creatures!"

"My cup of sorrow and misery is now full," said the old man as he turned, staggering, toward the door. "On the very spot has this judgment fallen on me."

"But stop, sir—stop for a little space," said the lady. "Perhaps I have been too hasty, and it may be you have repented of that unnatural crime already?"

"Repented! Ay, heaven is my witness, not a night or day has passed over this gray head on which I have not repented; in that bitterness of spirit, too, which the chief of sinners only can feel."

"Have you indeed repented of your treatment of your daughter? Then all is forgiven on her part. And do you, father, forgive me too!"

The old man looked down with bewildered vision, and, behold, there was the lady of the mansion kneeling at his feet, and embracing his knees! She had thrown aside her long flowing veil, and he at once discovered the comely face of his beloved daughter.

That very night she put into her father's hand the new lease of all his former possessions, and receipts for the stock, crop, and furniture. The rest of the family were summoned together, and on the following Sabbath they went all to church, and took possession of their old family seat, every one sitting in the place she occupied formerly, with Siobla at the head. But the generous creature who had thus repaid good for evil, was the object of attraction for every eye, and the admiration of every heart.

This is a true story, and it contains not one moral, but many, as every true portraiture of human life must do. It shows us the danger of youthful imprudence, of jealousy, and of unruly passions; but, above all, it shows, that without a due sense of religion there can be no true and disinterested love.

The Shepherd's Calendar.—A number of entertaining stories, from the pen of James Hogg, the Ettrick Shepherd, heretofore given to the world in Blackwood's Magazine, have been this week republished in this city, in two volumes, bearing the above title. We have selected one of these narratives in the present number, which has excluded all the other editorial lucubrations. We have not room for another word.

MY HEART AND LUTE.

ARRANGED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY WILLIAM WOOD, JR.

MODERATO.

I give thee all—I can no more, Tho' poor the off'-ring be; My heart and lute are all the store That I can bring to thee: A lute whose gen-tle song reveals The soul of love full well, And bet-ter far, a heart that feels Much more than lute could tell. I give thee all—I can no more, Tho' poor the off'-ring be; My heart and lute are all the store That I can bring to thee.

Tho' love and song may fail, alas!
To keep life's clouds away;
At least 'twill make them lighter pass,

Or gild them if they stay.
If ever care his discord flings
O'er life's enchanted strain,

Let love but gently touch the strings,
'Twill all be sweet again!
I give thee all—I can no more,

Though poor the off'-ring be;
My heart and lute are all the store
That I can bring to thee.

REFLECTIONS IN A STORM.

I LOVE to watch the tempest's deepening gloom,
While on the mountain-height the forest's pride
Bends low, as awed by that resistless power
Which bids the whirlwind rage—while all around
Of nature animate, in silence hushed,
Await their Author's will. This is the hour
To muse on life's vain dreams, and vainer toil;
This is an hour when mortal pride must bow,
And, humbled, own its weak, its frail support,
When nought is heard save the wild murmuring storm:
It speaks a language which the musing mind
Must own, in spite of towering pride: it tells,
In life's tempestuous path how insecure!
Its fairest hours are like the fitful rays
That brighter shine when clouds are gathering round,
Lighting with transient joy the varying scene;
Or like the white foam on the troubled wave.
Place not thy hopes on earth—the soul enchained
By loves and pleasures centred here below,
Anxious and wearied with the vain turmoil
Of disappointment and opposing cares,
Is like the trembling reed by tempest riven.
The storm is o'er!—the azure light of heaven
Smiles through dispersing clouds, like gentle hope
On sorrow's brow, or mild religion's light,
Soothing each wildering passion into peace.
The orb of day, in glorious lustre bright,
Now smiles serene, and nature wakes again
To life and beauty in its dazzling beams.
And shall not man beyond life's tempest wake
To life, and bliss, in mercy's heavenly ray?
To never-ending bliss? It is not given
To mortal here, the power his fate to scan,

Or future being; yet all nature speaks,
In language eloquent, a power supreme
In the wild storm, or in the sunny smile
Of renovated nature: in mental joy,
Or in the heart's deep woe, alike we trace
The footsteps of a God; and equal all
Deeply impress upon the grateful heart,
A God of love—we bow, and we adore.

ANACREONTIC.

Come, mingle the tide of song
With the wine-cup's rosy sea,
For few of the blessings it yields, ere long,
Shall sparkle or shine for thee.
And sweet are the notes that flow
From beauty's seraph mouth,
As on summer eves the winds that blow
O'er a flower-bank, from the south.
And as he who dwells by the shore
Which the green sea-waters lave,
Must dive through its depths, the pearly store
To win from the yielding wave;
So he who wishes to lay
Life's glittering treasures up,
Must boldly cleave his luminous way
To the depths of the vintage-cup.

SONNET.

There is a blight which falls upon the heart
In its young spring-time, withering in the bud
Hope's fragrant sweets. Oh life has nought
Of fair, and beautiful, and lovely, then,

To charm the wearied eye; hope's young fond light
Expires, and life one dreary waste presents,
Save memory's momentary saddened ray.
Nay, ask not why that pulse beats heavily;
Dream not that smile is still to nature true:
Look on the languid eye, the listless gaze,
The pallid cheek oft flushed with wasting care,
The lip compressed, in scorn and weariness
Of all around, and say if this is not
A blight which knows no renovating morn.

TO MARY.

When heaven unchains this prisoned soul,
And earth receives this kindred clay,
What is't to me whose tear may roll,
Whose heart may heave, whose lip may pray?
There is a green sequester'd spot,
That sleeps beneath yon willow's shade;
And there, by all but thee forgot,
Be my unmarbled relics laid.
Let not the world's unhallow'd breath
Disturb the sleep of him who wills
That thou alone, in life or death,
Should'st share its joys, and sooth its ills.
There be my rest; and when thy tear
Shall dew the flowers that o'er it wave,
Fond fancy whispers me 'twill bear
Love to this heart, e'en in the grave.

THE GATE OF GOLD.

SHE read:—and again the dark clouds came,
And wrapp'd in their strength the letters of flame;
And again was the darkness rent asunder,
With a crash more sudden and loud than thunder.
And the fear of her spirit passed away,
And she felt in her breast a dreamy pleasure,
While she read the words that before her lay
In a mellow flame and a lighter measure:

"Daughter of beauty! the Gate of Gold,
That has never before been backward rolled,
For mortal step, now opens for thee;
And the diamond piles that within it shine,
And the ocean of life that flows in wine;
All these—all these are for thee—for thee.

"And the gardens of beauty that daily shoot,
From their branches, ripe and fragrant fruit;
And the bow'rs that within them be;
Where the midnight moon falls gently round,
And the fountain sends its silvery sound;
All these—all these are for thee—for thee.

"And the lake, and the barge, and the light guitar,
And the sweet song warbled to beauty's star,
By him thou hast wandered to see;
And—but think of all that can flow from love,
And think of all that is bright above,
And more than these are for thee—for thee!"

She read—and again the dark cloud came,
And robed in its strength the letters of flame;
And slowly opened the gate of pearls,
And showed in the vista a group of girls;
Oh! they were lovely as summer dawn,
When it looks in blushes on lake and lawn:
And a long bright fetter of flowers ran round
Their beautiful limbs, and each playful bound
Tightened or loosened the chain, and showed
How the form through the thin white vesture glowed;
And the wave of the arm, and the heave of the breast,
Like a round summer moon through her silvery vest;
And the footsteps light as the dewfall's rain,
And the curls whose links were Cupid's chain;
And the eye with that luscious lustre fraught,
Which charms the soul from all other thought
The cheek of rose, and the lip of blisses,
Seeking to bathe in a shower of kisses:—
She saw all these as they danced along
To the sound of tabor, and lute, and song;
Binding, unbinding the chain of flowers,
And wooing one more to their happy bowers;
And as backward the pearly portal rolled,
They led her on through the "Gate of Gold." ALPHA.

MY AUNT DEBORAH.

A MOST remarkable woman was my old Aunt Deborah! Yet she was not exactly my aunt either, but my mother's; sister to my grandfather. She was an Englishwoman, and therefore full of whims, and prejudices, and odd notions from her birth, like all Englishwomen; and these, though subdued and kept in the back-ground while youth bloomed in her cheek and sparkled in her eyes, as age came on, and brought with it firmness to her character and decision to her feelings—as age is very apt to do—these grew with her growth and strengthened with her strength, and came to be visible in every action, and to stamp a peculiar expression even upon every thought. My Aunt Deborah was a favourite with her father, and her grandfather doted upon her—that is, when she was young; and they were both of what is called a literary turn, in a small way. Novels, and romances, and pretty pathetic stories, with about as much nature in them as there is of valour in a sucking-dove, were not so prevalent in those days as they are at present; but still there were enough of them, and, in all supposable probability, by far too many; and these valuable productions of human wisdom did my venerated ancestors, the father and grandfather of my Great-aunt Deborah, much incline to love, and ponder over. In fact, her first reading lessons were taken from a tender story, in six enormous volumes, entitled the "Mysterious Menace, or the Romance of Castle Crackbrain," or some other veritable history with a cognomen of similar dimensions. It is not, therefore, by any means astonishing that, as my Great-aunt Deborah advanced in years, her predilection for this species of light reading—so misnamed—should have kept pace with her growth, and become, in time, an appetite as absolute as those which prompted her, at certain regular intervals of the day, to exercise the indispensable functions of mastication and deglutition. Thus it happened that, by force of reading nothing but fictitious narratives, full of improbable incidents and impossible characters, and taking no manner of notice of the incidents that were passing, and the characters that were existing around her, in course of time my Great-aunt Deborah grew up to womanhood, as ignorant of the world and all its ways, as utterly unconscious of the fashions and desires, the contrivances and schemes, the rogueries and littlenesses of that most heterogeneous mixture, man, as though her life had been passed within the walls of one of those dismal convents that figured so largely in her miscellaneous reading. In fact, the world she lived in was one of her own contriving, and a very queer concern it was. According to her notions, every man she met with, possessing a decent figure and a handsome face, was either a disguised nobleman predestined to become her worser half, or the afflicted lover of some other lovely lady, and therefore entitled to all her sympathy; or, at the very least, a most amiable, upright, and accomplished being, the hero, or, at all events, worthy to be the hero of some other equally ingenious hypothesis—and by the same rule of judgment, every ill-favoured unfortunate was infallibly set down for a rogue, or a tyrant, or an assassin. Her time was divided between reading, imagining adventures similar to those of which she read, and dreaming. Now, with all this perversion of reason and imagination, my excellent and amiable aunt was, as I have already intimated, brimful of prejudices; the first and grandest of which was a firm conviction that, out of England, her native land, there was nothing decent or endurable, either in character, manners, climate, soil, or, to sum up all in three most comprehensive words, in any thing. Who would have supposed that, with such notions and such habits, my Great-aunt Deborah would have married a creditable, reputable, industrious, painstaking man, as decided a creature of matter-of-fact as she was of fancy; would have emigrated with him to America; become a sharer with him in all the comforts and enjoyments of increasing wealth; and finally have died at the age of seventy, a widow of some twenty years standing, and left behind her half-a-dozen fortunes for her nephews, nieces, and others nearest of kin, as the lawyers said, who picked up some small morsels in the division? Yet all these things came to pass; and every one of my readers will, I doubt not, join with me in thinking my Aunt Deborah a most remarkable woman.

But, after all, it is not upon account of these singularities that I have bestowed that epithet upon her; but it is in consideration of one most extraordinary and almost incredible feature in her character, to which I have not as yet in the slightest degree alluded. This was—and I almost fear to venture upon making the assertion, lest my readers set me down incontinently as one that says the thing which is not—a disposition to taciturnity, such as was perhaps never before witnessed in one of her darling sex—at least history makes no mention of any such, and it cannot be supposed that a fact so wonderful would have been passed over in silence, had it ever occurred—and probably—to a degree of probability not less striking than would justify a man in wagering all Wall-street to a farthing—never will. Words are actually wanting to express the extent to which my aunt was sparing in the use of them; perhaps I cannot hope to accomplish this desideratum more successfully than by declaring the fact, that she once staid a week in one of the hotels at Albany, waiting for a sloop to come down the river, and left the whole household, landlord, landlady, waiters, cook, and chamber-maid, in the full conviction that she was dumb by nature, utterly incapable of speech. I had this fact from mine host himself, and therefore its authenticity is beyond dispute.

It is inconceivable to me how my Aunt Deborah managed to preserve her powers of locution, using them so rarely. No intreaty, no insinuation, no subject however interesting, no event however extraordinary, not even contradiction, could prevail upon her to talk with any thing like fluency. I verily believe that her death was occasioned solely by an examination which she was forced to undergo before a master, in a ten years' suit in chancery, wherein she was called upon to testify concerning sundry transactions of her deceased husband, in the purchase and sale of various tracts of land, of all which the good lady knew no more than Hannibal, the Carthaginian. Her ignorance unhappily availed her nothing. She was worried with questions and cross-questions, and, what was worse, compelled to answer them. I am sure it killed her. A very remarkable woman was my Great-aunt Deborah.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

HOME.

"My next desire is, void of care and strife,
To lead a soft, secure, inglorious life:
A country cottage near a crystal flood,
A winding valley and a lofty wood.
Some god conduct me to the sacred shades,
Where bacchanals are sung by Spartan maids;
Or lift me high to Hemus' billowy crown,
Or in the plains of Tempe lay me down;
Or lead me to some solitary place,
And cover my retreat from human race."

I do not know one who has been more unfortunate in his dealings with the world than Arthur Vallette; many successive griefs have already met him, and he is spoken of by his acquaintance in terms of compassion. But they do not comprehend his character and feelings. Perhaps there is no one less in need of commiseration: I think he is the happiest man I ever saw; and he finds all this happiness in the bosom of his family. By the failures which recently agitated the commercial world, he has been reduced from wealth to a very moderate competency; and his family have yielded, without a murmur, all the splendours of fashion, for the simplicity and seclusion which the strictest economy could suggest. I spent an hour with him the other evening. We walked up to his place together, from the dust and confusion of the city. It is situated a short distance out of town; and as the fields and woods gradually appeared around us, and the breeze became purer, and the sultriness of the crowded and unhealthy streets was exchanged for the fresh air and nameless scents which came blended together with such agreeable influence from the meadow and wood, the traces of care left his brow, and his step quickened with the elasticity of pleased expectation. His abode, however deficient in the improvements with which riches decorate the mansions of the great, had yet an air of simple and natural loveliness pleasanter to gaze on; and as we entered its little winding walk, and trod beneath the over-hanging branches of its budding trees, and his children came forth to meet him with kisses, I thought their rosy cheeks and sparkling eyes were richer ornaments than statues and columns, and the sound of their young voices, in the utterance of pure and careless feelings, more grateful to the heart than the pealing anthems of heroes and kings. His wife also ran out, and, blushing at the sight of a stranger, paused, with a slight though graceful embarrassment, which warranted the suspicion that, but for me, her greeting would have been more free and warm-hearted. Among the furniture which my friend had saved from the rapacity of creditors, was a picture—the work of some of those inspired Italian artists whose imaginations are imbued with the spirit which in their country pervades all nature's creation. It was the image of a Swiss soldier in the act of leaving his native land. The sun is setting—the sky, all lighted up with his melancholy and expiring glory, reflects its hues upon the mountain, the meadow, the wood and the stream. The quiet scene is pencilled with surpassing beauty upon the bosom of a lake, on whose shore a cottage arrests the wanderer's gaze; for his wife and children are before the door, and looking after him.

"Poor fellow," said Arthur; "his manly heart is swelling now. Thousands, like him, have torn themselves from their homes, to find a gory and a nameless grave upon the field of battle."

I left my friend soon, but the picture yet hung in my imagination. The image of the husband and father, thus breaking away from his quiet abode, to mingle in the brutal scenes of war, led me to reflect upon the value of a home, and the miseries of those who are without one. I regard with sincere sympathy the many whom circumstances have banished from their native land. The commotions of Europe have driven thousands to our shores, and I never can see these, especially the poorer class, with their strange accent and foreign style of dress, taking their solitary rambles among the crowds of beings here connected together by the ties of relationship and affection, without yielding them the passing feeling of sympathy.

The kindest gift of nature is our affections: all others are valuable only as auxiliary to this. I am convinced it is in their rational cultivation that we are to look for content, and that all the ambition which would tempt us away upon foreign enterprise, is a vain and dangerous feeling. Whatever, therefore, contributes to render home attractive, possesses a value infinitely above that which it could claim on any other consideration; and a thousand little trifles in manners and accomplishments, contemptible if cherished only for vanity, when shedding their influence over that most delightful of all pictures, an affectionate and happy family, assume importance, and beauty, and rank among the virtues.

To a man immersed in the cares of business, yet who retains sufficient purity of mind to estimate properly the many false amusements and melancholy scenes of a great city like this, his home is a subject of powerful interest. In the labours of the day he has in a great measure to conceal his real character, and bend himself to occupations calculated neither to improve his mind nor his heart. He mingles with his fellow-men without any ties of affection. It is his business to suspect, and sometimes to deceive. He enters a great arena where all are striving to take advantage of each other, and in the ordinary course of affairs he sees the worst traits of human nature; scenes of fraud are developed which he cannot expose, and wretchedness he is unable to relieve. It is necessary for him to become often callous to the voice of sorrow; to endure his own disappointments without sympathy, and often accompanied by the triumphs of those who have profited by his losses. The generous romance of youth and the fine impulses of feeling would be out of place, and despised in the great crowd of avaricious and unfriendly beings pressing on to their own designs; and he, in many instances, beholds the impudent and heartless grasping rewards denied to modest merit and generous frankness. All private interests and helpless virtue are crushed on the mighty thoroughfare; eager and careless feet tread even upon the graves of beings he has loved, and others are continually shuffled off the scene, and go down time's ceaseless stream among the wrecks of departed things, with as little notice as the dried leaf falls from the tree in autumn.

From the anxious and wearisome struggles of such a scene, where shall the labourer turn when the hum dies away, and the shadows of night come down around him? He who has a home knows well enough the consolation which awaits him: his feet conduct him where his heart has ever been—to the pure atmosphere of his own domestic circle. Perhaps he is a son, and he hastens to the only spot on the face of the wide earth where he knows he may fling away suspicion. Kind parents and affectionate sisters are around him; his mind is disentangled from the thousand irksome ties which have bound him down to the grovelling earth, and the feelings and affections long frozen up in his heart, gush out like fountains at the coming on of spring. Or if he be a husband and a father, the well-known voices of his children come upon his ears like the warblings of birds, and the affection of their mother is visible every where around him, as if he were already the inhabitant of a better world. Here he rests from his labours, and becomes invigorated for the trials that are to come. His anxieties and his enjoyments are so nicely balanced, that his happiness is without satiety, and new exertions are agreeable. In seeking success, here he has nature to aid him: all other enterprises are fraught with doubt and danger; and even the unmixed delights he meets with elsewhere, pall upon the taste, and their stimulants are only the harbingers of subsequent despondency. But the charms of home are the wholesome and natural pleasures of the heart: instead of corrupting, they strengthen and improve it. Many a noble fellow has been ruined for the want of a home: he has no one to dissipate the gloom which the day gathers around the soul, and his wandering affections seek repose in vain, till he allows them to settle upon forbidden objects.

The city teems with young men of excellent minds, and gifted with all the sources of happiness, which need only cultivation to render them a blessing; to whom those refreshing shades of evening, which fall upon others with a thousand consoling influences, bring danger, and perhaps ruin. They are either strangers in town, whose families reside abroad, or their homes are rendered disagreeable by some secret and pernicious spell—the bad passions or neglect, in which many indulge, unconscious of the consequences to which they lead. A tyrannical father, a heartless wife, or even the carelessness of a family, who have not the intelligence or the inclination to render home pleasant, drive many a man forth into the haunts of vice, where disease, and sin, and wretchedness accomplish his destruction. I cannot believe that the crowds of fine young men whom I have seen thronging around the bars of taverns, or parading through the streets, with all the fatal marks of recklessness and debauchery—I cannot believe that these have thus abandoned wantonly the pure and sweet pleasures of happy homes. There is a secret in this, which wives, mothers and sisters can unravel. There are clouded faces and ungentle words, where all should be cheerfulness and love. There cannot be many so coarse in their tastes, so dull in their understandings, so corrupt and bad in their hearts, as to plunge into the absorbing vortexes of dissipation which, in every part of this city, are dragging down so many healthy bodies and lofty minds into ruin, without some private cause. The whole sum of sensual gratifications which all such enjoy during the period of their lives, is nothing when compared with one calm happy hour of domestic peace.

I cannot picture any scene more pleasing than family groups: there is nothing else in nature like them. If I were a painter, it should be my joy often to study fine subjects in the physical world. The glorious sunset, or the breaking of day; the quiet green wood, with its gushing brook and many-coloured flowers, or the silvery river stealing and winding along by its fringed and shaded shores—my conception of all these I should glory to embody upon canvass; but I have never lingered around the cheerful hearth of one pure happy family without dreaming of pictures surpassing them all. There is a want of worldliness in these scenes which wins upon the fancy. I have known men for years, in the mere way of business, without the slightest esteem for their characters or interest in their fortunes, who, after having seen them in their own homes, mingling in the familiar and graceful pleasures of their families, discovered a thousand good qualities, that raised them in my estimation.

It is, however, to women that we must look for the charms of home: their gentle attentions and winning ways must steal upon the gloom of man's thoughts, and reveal his lighter and pleasanter feelings. How important it is, then, that the education of females should be adapted to this end! It is for this that I would have them value the fashionable accomplishments of the day; not to astonish a party with a waltz or a finely-executed piece of music. I am but half satisfied with a dashing belle who sings in a crowded drawing-room, and can scarcely unite in the warm compliments with which she is so profusely greeted; but I have stood aside to gaze with admiration deeper than I chose to utter, when a happy wife and mother was singing to her husband his favourite airs, and the voices of her children came in mingling with the music.

If, then, a man's home exerts so important an influence upon his character and destiny, it cannot be amiss to inquire what will cause it to be the centre of his thoughts. Is it fashion? He may meet crowds of the fairest and gayest, and yet be alone. Is it splendour? His apartments shall be decorated with all that wealth can purchase, and his eye still find nothing but misery. Is it luxury? You may treat his senses with ambrosial perfumes, and tempt his palate with the feast of kings, and he will soon turn away coldly and sick at heart. Not even leisure and opportunity to devise and execute great enterprises will give the lustre of real cheerfulness to his cheek, and its buoyancy to his bosom: nothing but the communion of gentle feelings will ever awaken him to all life's real blessings. Fashion and splendour, luxury and fame, derive their fictitious value from the caprice of the world; their triumphs are cold and brief; they are ethereal intoxications, and pass away like light fevers of the soul, leaving it weaker for their exhilarations. But the indulgence of the affections is the vivacity of health and virtue; you drink pleasure from a natural spring, whose fountain is in the heart. Providence has guarded the dazzling ways which ambition and the passions of mankind generally prompt them to pursue with innumerable perils, as if to show they were forbidden ground; while along the humbler path of domestic life peace and pleasure come unbidden, unattended with danger, and almost without pain. From the soil of the first, art and labour can raise no plants but what are without colour or fragrance, and soon fade away; while along the latter, natural flowers spring up exuberantly, and scent the air with wholesome fragrance.

In all the public stations of life, the very best and most fortunate have generally failed to secure their own happiness, unless such as they snatched during the intervals of their traffic with the world. There is a fine fellow of my acquaintance, who set out early in life to be rich. He resolved to sacrifice all pleasures which interfered with his favourite design, and to devote himself entirely to the acquisition of wealth and eminence in his profession. He resolved to live a single life, for a wife and children would make stronger calls both upon his time and purse than he could conveniently answer. He continued his career for a considerable time, and as he possessed much talent and many friends, his advances were rapid. His fortune has already exceeded his former wishes, and his fame is equal to his fondest hopes; but he himself is a sulky and peevish being, who will never again enjoy a single true blessing in life. He boards at a splendid hotel, but spends his evenings at theatres, balls, or taverns, wondering that other men who have not half his riches, are so merry in the occupations to which their necessity drives them.

I remember another, whom I consider a still greater object of commiseration. He also had conceived the desire of wealth; but he was volatile and free-hearted, and never thought of persevering industry and economy: he was to be rich by some dashing speculation. He deemed the world intolerable to a poor man; and once told me, that, without elegant horses and a fine house, with plenty to carry him through all the varieties of fashionable pleasures, he should never know what it was to be happy. I shook my head sagely at his mad-cap opinions, and attempted to moralize a little, but it would not do; even while I was holding him by the button and instilling, or striving to instil into him some of those wise precepts which every body has at his tongue's end, his eye caught an acquaintance riding by in a gig; Tom stopped, and Bob jumped in; and seizing the reins, he gave a crack of the whip that made the horse leap forward, and off they dashed for Cato's, leaving me to pursue my solitary ramble. I knew him well enough to have learned his affection for a charming girl, who, I believe, fully returned it; but she was poor, and could not promote my friend Bob's dreams of wealth. He crushed therefore his own passion without much difficulty, and soon after paid his addresses to a rich, ugly, and bad-tempered woman, who now renders him the very personification of mortification and misery. His wish for money, therefore, is realized, but he has no longer any tie to bind him to his true interest: he has no home. His spacious dwelling is full of magnificence, and possesses all that is calculated to gratify the idlest taste, but it has neither intellect nor affection. He spends all his days in wandering carelessly about, and at night he has whist-clubs and billiard-tables to beguile the hours, which, with the additional aid of segars and wine, pass at length away. I saw him the other night, while the full moon was in the middle sky, reeling from the theatre to his cheerless dwelling, and I could not, while I shook my head again at his sad miscalculations, refrain from the thought of how much better and happier his destiny would have been, had he but given up all the splendour of wealth and fashion for a happy home. DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

GENTLENESS.

WHOEVER understands his own interest, and is pleased with the beautiful, rather than the deformed, will be careful to cherish the virtue of gentleness. It requires but a slight knowledge of human nature to convince us that much of happiness in life must depend upon the cultivation of this virtue. The man of a wild, boisterous spirit, who gives loose reins to his temper, is, generally speaking, a stranger to happiness; he lives in a continual storm; the bitter waters of contention and strife are always swelling up in the soul, destroying his peace, and imparting their baneful influence to all with whom he is connected. He excites the disgust and ill will of those who are acquainted with his character, and but few can be found to wish him success in any of his undertakings. Not so is the influence of gentleness. This virtue will assist its possessor in all his lawful undertakings; it will often render him successful when nothing else could; it is exceedingly lovely and attractive in its appearance; it wins the hearts of all; it is even stronger than argument, and will often prevail when that would be powerless and ineffectual; it shows that man can put a bridle upon his passions, that he is above the ignoble vulgar, whose characteristic is to storm and rage like the troubled ocean, at every little adversity or disappointment that crosses their path; it shows that he can soar away in the bright atmosphere of good feeling, and live in a continual sunshine, when all around him are enveloped in clouds and darkness, and driven about like maniacs, the sport of their own passions. The most favourable situations in life, the most lovely objects in nature, wealth, and all that is calculated to increase the happiness of man, lose their charm upon a heart destitute of this virtue.

FEMALE EDUCATION.

Vocal music should never be neglected in the education of a young lady. Besides preparing her to join in that part of public worship which consists in psalmody, it will enable her to sooth the cares of domestic life; and even the sorrows that will sometimes intrude into her own bosom, may all be relieved by a song, where sound and sentiment unite to act upon the mind. I here introduce a fact which has been suggested to me by my profession, and that is, the exercise of the organs of the breast, by singing, contributes very much to defend them from those diseases to which the climate and other causes expose them. The Germans are seldom afflicted with consumptions, nor have I ever known but one instance of spitting blood among them. This, I believe, is in part occasioned by the strength which their lungs acquire by exercising them frequently in vocal music, for this constitutes an essential branch of their education. The music-master of our academy has furnished me with an observation still more in favour of this opinion. He informed me that he had known several instances of persons who were strongly disposed to consumption, who were restored to health by the exercise of their lungs in singing.

AN INGENIOUS THIEF.

A considerable wager was laid by a gentleman that he would procure an Indian chief who would steal the sheet from under a person without waking him. The thing was effected in the following manner: the chief approached the person, who lay on his side, from behind, carefully folded up the sheet in small compact plaits till it reached his back; then taking a feather, he tickled the ear of the sleeper, who immediately scratched his face and rolled over on the other side, when, with a slight effort, he completely released the sheet, and bore it off in triumph.

THE FORCE OF IMAGINATION.

A Lucchese peasant, shooting sparrows, saw his dog attacked by a strange and very ferocious mastiff. He tried to separate the animals, and received a bite from his own dog, which instantly ran off through the fields. The wound was healed in a few days, but the dog was not to be found; and the peasant, after some time, began to feel symptoms of nervous agitation. He conceived that the dog, from his disappearing, was mad, and within a day or two after this idea had struck him, he began to feel symptoms of hydrophobia. They grew hourly more violent; he raved, and had all the evidences of the most violent distemper. As he was lying, with the door open, to let in the last air that he was to breathe, he heard his dog bark. The animal ran up to the bed-side, licked his hand, and frolicked about the room. It was clear that he, at least, was in perfect health. The peasant's mind was relieved at the instant; he got up with renewed strength, dressed himself, plunged his head in a basin of water, and, thus refreshed, walked into the room to his astonished family. The statement is made in a memoir, by Professor Barbantini; and it is not improbable that many attacks of a disease so strongly dependent on the imagination, might be equally cured by ascertaining the state of the animal by which the bite was given.

ANECDOTE OF AN EAGLE.

A boatman, while engaged in conveying salt on the Onondaga lake, a few years since, saw a large gray eagle cutting his gyrations in the air, apparently noticing some prey in the lake beneath. In a moment he poised, and darted from his altitude into the water, from which he was unable to rise. A continued flapping with his broad and extended pinions kept him from being drawn under, and proved that his diamond eyes had not mistaken their object. He approached the land slowly, the unknown creature below acting as propellant and helmsman. The boatman grew interested in the affair and landed. The eagle, on touching terra firma, showed himself fastened to a fine salmon. Our hero, thinking it time to take his share of the plunder, cut himself a stout cudgel, and approached the imperial bird of Jove; which, having his talons fast, was unable to rise, advance, or recede. Three times was the club raised to strike, but the noble bearing of the regal bird, and his undaunted front, made even the boatman quail. He could not assault imprisoned majesty. The eagle exhibited no signs of fear, but occasionally nibbled the gills of his prize, and indignantly glanced at the intrusive boatman. At length the talons of one leg became released, and, by a dextrous turn, those of the other, when he soared away to his thunder-clouds on high, leaving the much-coveted salmon to the boatman, who, on weighing it, found it to balance twenty-six pounds. ORIGIN OF THE WORD COCKNEY.

Cockney is the distinguishing appellation by which those gentlemen are honoured who, being natives of the metropolis, are supposed never to have very far exceeded the vibrative limits of St. Paul's clock or Bow-bell. A citizen of London making an excursion with his son to the neighbourhood of Highgate, the lad—who had never before taken a journey of such magnitude and extent—happening to hear a horse neigh—which was quite new to him—hastily exclaimed, "How that horse barks, daddy!" "Barks! you booby," replied the father; "neighs, you mean. A dog barks, a horse neighs!" They had not proceeded far, when the youth, finding his ears assailed by the sudden crowing of a cock, was so fascinated with the shrill and unexpected sound, that he instantly attracted his companion's attention with "Hark, daddy, how that cock neighs!" To which happy effusion of fancy the citizens of London will probably stand indebted for the name of cockney to the end of time.

A DILEMMA.

A man the other day speaking of the backwardness of the spring, said, "We shall never have warm weather as long as the snow continues on the mountains—and I'm certain the snow will never get off the mountains till it is warm weather."

This world were but a dreary waste
To the lone child of sorrow,
Did not memory gild the past,
And hope light up to-morrow.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

London, April 10, 1839.

MY DEAR M.—You have so often, and so perseveringly assailed me with importunities to write to you, that I have resolved at last, in utter despair, despite my abhorrence of pen, ink, and letter-paper, to comply with your request; premising, however, that you must endure yourself with fortitude to meet the consequences, let them be as disastrous as they may. I have long resisted all your entreaties, and even reproaches; I have told you again and again, that it was no more possible for me to concoct an interesting document for you, than it would be for my Lord Eldon to look with any thing like complacency upon a measure which savours of an increase of intelligence or liberty to the plebeian vulgar; and you have as often desired me not to put myself to any unnecessary trouble in watching over your welfare, but simply to do as I was bid, and leave all questions connected with your gratification, so far as that was to be affected by my compliance, entirely to your own consideration. I have found this answer of yours, at last, unanswerable; so my latest conclusion in the matter is, to spare myself all further trouble in inventing, and you in refuting excuses for not writing, and, as the cheapest mode of settling the dispute, to write at once. If the tax upon your time proves ultimately onerous, remember that it is not of my inflicting; you have insisted that I shall devote sundry of my leisure hours to the task of spoiling good paper, and I, in return, shall expect that what I have written you will read.

I shall not occupy myself and you, and this first spotless sheet, in giving you a long description of my sensations and emotions upon landing in this marvellous country; nor yet in striving to present you with any notion of my impressions on my arrival in this overgrown den, or, in popular phrase, metropolis. If you feel any resistless curiosity to know what those impressions were, turn to almost any wandering American's first letter, or, if you have such a thing at hand, to any book of travels perpetrated by some ambitious Yankee, and the chances are considerably in favour of your finding a chapter exclusively devoted to this subject, under the head of "first day in London," or "reflections on arrival at London," or something of similar import; read this—after you have found it—and then consider wherein your friend, by reason of some peculiarities of disposition with which you are tolerably familiar, would be likely to think or feel differently, and you will have as good an account as I could give; and I shall be spared the trouble. Allow me, however, to suggest one additional feature in the picture, one very general feeling in the minds of strangers on their first visit to this monstrous city, which, although every one must have been conscious of during the first few days, I do not recollect to have seen mentioned in any book, or heard from the lips of any traveller—I mean the withering sense of loneliness, of desolation, in fact, that weighs upon the mind and spirits of the stranger, until he has formed acquaintances, and become, in some measure, familiarized to the scenes and faces that surround him. I have been conscious of this feeling before, when I have visited remote cities in my own country, but never in so appalling a degree. The Johnny Newcome here feels himself indeed to be in the midst of a most populous desert; he wanders along, jostled by crowds of people, of whom he knows nothing, and with whom he scarcely feels himself to have any thing in common; faces innumerable encounter him wherever he turns his eyes, and all are strange, and full of occupation in which he has no interest; every thing, and every body, appears to be distinct from him; to whatsoever quarter he directs his steps, there is no hope of meeting a familiar countenance, or a smile of friendly greeting. Of the thousands whose unobtrusive glance he meets—of the hundreds of thousands whom he knows to be existing all around him, there is not one that knows or cares any thing concerning him; to whom his life would be matter for a moment's consideration. It cannot appear very dreadful to you, sure as you are, that you cannot look out from your second story window, are you still in that narrow dirty lane, where the workmen dignify with the title of Nassau-street, catching the wind, when you happen to pop off in a hurry on some moonlight night, the melancholy occurrence would be known, and sighed over, by half the population of the city, by breakfast-time the next morning. But if you have any curiosity to know what it really is to feel lonesome, come here, and the first six days will enlighten you sufficiently upon that subject, to keep you from all inclination to try the experiment again so long as you live, if it were a thousand years.

But revenons à nos moulons; which, being interpreted, signifies, let us quit this idle rambling, and say something more touching the manner in which I propose to conduct the correspondence your perseverance has wrung from me. In the first place, then, it is not my intention to favour you with any description of this country, or of any towns, cities, villages, roads, bridges, churches, palaces, or other edifices thereunto belonging, or in anywise appertaining; if you want to know aught concerning these things, come and see them yourself; and if you do, by the way, pray bear it in mind to line your pockets abundantly before you commence your pilgrimage. In the second place, I am not going to instruct your ignorance by any solemn dissertations upon English character, general or particular; every writing man that has ever migrated from Yankee land, or elsewhere, into this foggy atmosphere, has done that thing before me, to any requisite extent; and if you are in want of any edification concerning the same, read, read. Thirdly; I am by no means in the mind at present, to convert my valuable self into a gatherer of news for your special delectation. If you desiderate "late intelligence," make arrangements to have some half dozen papers transmitted to you by the packets; or insinuate yourself into the good graces of some one of your fraternity in your own abiding-place, who has "files coming to hand" by every arrival, and let him yield unto you the revision of his bundles after the scissors have done their work. Fourthly, and lastly, my intention is to write to you just so often as it is my humour so to do, and to fill my letters with all manner of rambling cogitations, out-of-the-way facts, and irregular notions, such as may come into my head in the course of my various wanderings in and among the thoroughfares, and show-places, and odd corners of this modern Babylon. If the fit is upon me, you may have a sheet brimful of sober soliloquizings upon men, manners, and things in general; if I am in a merry mood, I will not promise not to be comical; in short, you shall have letters filled with just such matter as my conversations with you would consist of, were I comfortably established, on some long and merry winter's night, in my old arm-chair, by your chimney-corner, with yourself in propria persona opposite, the cat upon my knee, and that snug round table that you wot of, happily disposed at equidistance between us, and laden, as usual, with Stoppani's segars, and any body's wine, provided only that it be good. Thus, then, you have my proposition; if it likes you not, let me know speedily by the first conveyance. And now that I have possessed you of the particulars, and being somewhat sleepy, I shall come to a full stop, so soon as I have given you to understand that in my next I may perhaps tell you something of the late debates upon the catholic relief bill, which will no doubt soon become part and parcel of the "law of the land" Yours ever, J. H.

THE CASKET.

THE FLORENTINE LOVERS.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART II.

BUT here was a situation for Gossip Veronica! Dianora's aunt had been with her some days, hinting that something extraordinary, but, as she hoped, not unpleasant, would be proposed to the good gossip, which, for her part, had her grave sanction; and now came the very mother of the young Buondelmonte to explain to her what this intimation was, and to give her an opportunity of having one of each family in her house at the same time! There was a great falling off in the beatitude, when she understood that Ippolito's presence was to be kept a secret from all her visitors that day, except Dianora; but she was reconciled, on receiving an intimation that, in future, the two ladies would have no objection to her inviting whom she pleased to her house, and receiving a jewel from each of them as a pledge of their esteem. As to keeping the main secret, it was necessary for all parties.

Gossip Veronica, for a person in her rank of life, was rich, and had a pleasant villa at Monticelli, about half a mile from the city. Thither, on a holiday in September, which was kept with great hilarity by the peasants, came Dianora d'Amerigo de' Bardi, attended by her aunt Madonna Lucrezia, to see, as her mother observed, that no "improper persons" were there; and thither, before daylight, let in by Signora Veronica herself, at the hazard of her reputation and of the furious jealousy of a young vine-dresser in the neighbourhood, who loved her good things better than any thing in the world except her waiting-maid, came the young Ippolito Buondelmonte de' Buondelmonti, looking, as she said, like the morning-star.

The morning-star hugged and was hugged with great good will by the kind gossip, and then twinkled with impatience, from a corner of her chamber-window, till he saw Dianora. How his heart beat when he beheld her coming up through the avenue! Veronica met her near the garden-gate, and pointed toward the window, as they walked along. Ippolito fancied she spoke of him, but did not know what to think of it, for Dianora did not change countenance, nor do any thing but smile good-naturedly on her companion, and ask her apparently some common question. The truth was, she had no suspicion he was there; though the gossip, with much smirking and mystery, said she had a little present there for her, and such as her lady-mother approved. Dianora, whom, with all imaginable respect for her, the gossip had hitherto treated, from long habit, like a child, thought it was some trifle or other, and forgot it next moment. Every step which Ippolito heard on the stair-case he fancied was her's, till it passed the door, and never did morning appear to him at once so delicious and so tiresome. To be in the same house with her, what joy! but to be in the same house with her, and not to be able to tell her his love directly, and ask her for hers, and fold her into his very soul, what impatience and misery! Two or three times there was a knock of some one to be let in; but it was only the gossip, come to inform him that he must be patient, and that she did not know when Madonna Lucrezia would please to bring Dianora, but most likely after dinner, when the visitors retired to sleep a little. Of all impertinent things, dinner appeared to him the most tiresome and unfit. He wondered how any thinking beings, who might take a cake or a cup of wine by the way, and then proceed to love one another, could sit round a great wooden table, patiently eating of this and that nicety; and, above all, how they could sit still afterward for a moment, and not do any thing else in preference—stand on their heads, or toss the dishes out of window. Then the festival! Heaven only knew how happy the peasantry might choose to be, and how long they might detain Dianora with their compliments, dances, and songs. Doubtless, there must be many lovers among them; and how they could bear to go jigging about in this gregarious manner, when they must all wish to be walking two by two in the green lanes, was to him inexplicable. However, Ippolito was very sincere in his gratitude to Gossip Veronica, and even did his best to behave handsomely to her cake and wine; and after dinner his virtue was rewarded.

It is unnecessary to tell the reader, that he must not judge of other times and countries by his own. The real fault of those times, as of most others, lay, not in people's loves, but their hostilities; and if both were managed in a way somewhat different from our own, perhaps neither the loves were less innocent, nor the hostilities more ridiculous. After dinner, when the other visitors had separated here and there to sleep, Dianora, accompanied by her aunt and Veronica, found herself, to her great astonishment, in the same room with Ippolito; and in a few minutes after their introduction to each other, and after one had looked this way and the other that, and one taken up a book and laid it down again, and both looked out of the window, and each blushed, and either turned pale, and the gentleman adjusted his collar and the lady her sleeve, and the elder ladies had whispered one another in a corner, Dianora, less to her astonishment than before, was left in the room with him alone. She made a movement as if to follow them, but Ippolito said something she knew not what, and she remained. She went to the window, looking very serious and pale, and not daring to glance toward him. He intended instantly to go to her, and wondered what had become of his fierce impatience; but the very delay had now something delicious in it. Oh, the happiness of those moments!

oh, the sweet morning-time of those feelings! the doubt which is not doubt, and the hope which is but the coming of certainty! Oh, recollections enough to fill faded eyes with tears of renovation, and to make us forget we are no longer young—the next young and innocent beauty we behold! Why do not such hours make us as immortal as they are divine? Why are we not carried away, literally, into some place where they can last for ever, leaving those who miss us to say, "they were capable of loving, and they are gone to heaven!"

Reader. But, sir, in taking these heavenly flights of yours, you have left your two lovers.

Author. Surely, madam, I need not inform you that lovers are fond of being left to themselves.

Reader. But, sir, they are Italians; and I did not think Italian lovers were of this bashful description. I imagined that the moment your two Florentines beheld one another, they would spring into each other's arms, sending up cries of joy, and—and—

Author. Tumbling over the two old women by the way. It is a very pretty imagination, madam; but Italians partake of all the feelings common to human nature; and modesty is really not confined to the English, even though they are always saying it is.

Reader. But I was not speaking of modesty, sir; I was only alluding to a sort of—what shall I say—a kind of irrepressible energy, that which in the Italian character is called violence.

Author. I meant nothing personal, madam, believe me, in using the word modesty. You are too charitable, and have too great a regard for my lovers. I was not speaking myself of modesty in any particular sense, but of modesty in general; and all nations, not excepting our beloved and somewhat dictatorial countrymen, have their modesties and immodesties too, from which perhaps their example might instruct one another. With regard to the violence you speak of, and which is energy sometimes, and the weakest of weaknesses at others, according to the character which exhibits it, and the occasion that calls it forth, the Italians, who live in an ardent climate, have undoubtedly shown more of it than most people; but it is only where their individual character is most irregular, and education and laws at their worst. In general it is nothing but pure self-will, and belongs to the two extremes of the community—the most powerful, whose passions have been indulged, and the poorest, whose passions have never been instructed. True energy manifests itself, not in violence, but in strength and intensity; and intensity is by its nature discerning, and not to be surpassed in quietness, where quietness is becoming. Besides, in the age we are writing of, there was as much refinement in love matters with some, as there was outrage and brutality with others. All the faculties of humanity, bad and good, may be said to have been making their way at that period, and trying for the mastery; and if on the one hand we are presented with horrible spectacles of tyranny and revenge, on the other we find philosophy and even divinity refining upon the passion of love, and emulating the most beautiful subtleties of Plato in rendering it a thing angelical.

Reader. You have convinced me, sir; pray let us proceed.

Author. Your us, madam, is flattering; I fancy we are beholding the two lovers in company. We are like Don Cleofas and his ghostly friend, in the Devil on Two Sticks, when they saw into the people's houses; I, of course, the devil; and you the young student, only feminine—Donna Cleofasia, studying humanity.

Reader. Well, sir, as you please; only let us proceed.

Author. Madam, your sentiments are engaging to the last degree; so I proceed with pleasure.

We left our two lovers, madam, standing in Signora Veronica's parlour, one at the window, the other at a little distance. They remained in this situation about the same space of time in which we have been talking. Oh! how impossible it is to present to ourselves too grave and happy lovers trembling with the approach of their mutual confessions, and not feel a graver and happier sensation than levity resume its place in one's thoughts!

Ippolito went up to Dianora. She was still looking out of the window, her eyes fixed upon the blue mountains in the distance, but conscious of nothing outside the room. She had a light green and gold net on her head, which enclosed her luxuriant hair without violence, and seemed as if it took it up that he might admire the white neck underneath. She felt his breath upon it; and beginning to expect that his lips would follow, raised her hands to her head, as if the net required adjusting. This movement, while it disconcerted him, presented her waist in a point of view so impossible not to touch, that taking it gently in both his hands, he pressed one at the same time upon her heart, and said, "It will forgive me, even for doing this." He had reason to say so, for he felt it beat against his fingers, as if it leaped. Dianora, blushing and confused, though feeling abundantly happy, made another movement with her hands as if to remove his own, but he only detained them on either side. "Messer Ippolito," said Dianora, in a tone as if to remonstrate, though suffering herself to remain a prisoner, "I fear you must think me"—"No, no," interrupted Ippolito, "you can fear nothing that I think, or that I do. It is I that have to fear your lovely and fearful beauty, which has been ever at the side of my sick bed, and I thought looked angrily upon me—upon me alone, of the whole world." "They told me you had been ill," said Dianora in a very gentle tone, "and my aunt perhaps knew that I—thought that I—Have you been very ill?" And without thinking, she drew her left hand from under his, and placed it upon it. "Very," answered Ippolito; "do not I look so?" and saying this, he raised his other hand, and venturing to put it round to the left side of her little dimpled chin, turned her face toward him. Dianora did not think he appeared so ill, by a good deal, as he did in the church; but there was enough in his face, ill or well, to make her eyesight swim as she looked at him; and the next moment her head was upon his shoulder.

There was a practice in those times, generated, like other involuntary struggles against wrong, by the absurdities in authority, of resorting to marriages, or rather plightings of troth, made in secret, and in the eye of heaven. It was a custom liable to great abuse, as all secreties are; but the harm of it, as usual, fell chiefly on the poor, or where the condition of the parties was unequal. Where the families were powerful and on an equality, the hazard of violating the engagement was very great, and seldom encountered; the lovers either foregoing their claims on each other upon better acquaintance, or adhering to their engagement the closer for the same reason, or keeping it at the expense of one or the other's repentance for fear of the consequences. The troth of Ippolito and Dianora was indeed a troth; they plighted it on their knees, before a picture of the Virgin and Child, and over a mass-book which lay open upon a chair. Thus were they secretly married. Ippolito then, for the pleasure of revenging himself of the pangs he suffered when Dianora knelt with him before, took up the mass-book and held it before her, as she had held it before him, and looked her entreatingly in the face; and Dianora took and held it with him as before, trembling as then, but with a perfect pleasure; and Ippolito kissed her twice and thrice out of a sweet revenge.

[We find we are in the habit of using a great number of ands on these occasions. We do not affect it, though we are conscious of it. It is partly, we believe, owing to our recollections of the good faith and simplicity in the old romances, and partly to a certain sense of luxury and continuance which these ands help to link together. It is the fault of "the accursed critical spirit," which is the bane of these times, that we are obliged to be conscious of the matter at all. But we cannot help not having been born six hundred years ago, and are obliged to be base and reviewatory like the rest. To affect not to be conscious of the critical in these times, would itself be a departure from what is natural; but we notice the necessity only to express our hatred of it, and hereby present the critics—ourselves included, as far as we belong to them—with our hearty commendations.]

The thoughtless old ladies, Donna Lucrezia, and the other—for old age is not always the most considerate thing in the world, especially the old age of one's aunts and gossips—had now returned into the room where they left the two lovers; but not before Dianora had consented to receive her bridegroom at home, that same night, by means of that other old good-natured go-between, yclept a ladder of ropes. The rest of the afternoon was spent, according to laudable custom, in joining in the diversions of the peasantry. They sung, they danced, they ate the grapes that hung over their heads, they gave and took jokes and flowers, they flaunted with all their colours in the sun, they feasted with all their might under the trees. You could not say which looked the merriest. In Tuscany they have had, from time immemorial, little rustic songs or stanzas that turn upon flowers: one of these, innocently addressed to Dianora by way of farewell, put her much out of countenance—"Voi siete un bel fiore," sung a peasant girl, after kissing her hand:

You are a lovely flower. What flower? The flower
That shuts with the dark hour:—
Would that to keep you awake were in my power!

Ippolito went singing it all the way home, and ran up against a hundred people.

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM A LATE LONDON PERIODICAL WORK.

WHAT SHALL I DO?

"WHAT shall I do?" exclaimed Lady Emily to me the other day, as I entered her apartment, and found her reclining negligently on an ottoman, with a most languishing air; "What shall I do, Charles," she exclaimed, laying a strong emphasis on the shall, "to expel ennui, and recover my lost spirits? All the world seems to have deserted town, and left me to enjoy my own company; positively, Charles, you are the only rational being my eyes have had the pleasure of seeing this month; and now do be a good creature, and get me from the circulating library Scott's last novel; it is scarcely two, and old Lady Jervis's card says seven for dinner this evening, where I believe you are going." She accompanied this request with such a bewitching smile as would have melted a much harder heart than Charles Bellamy's. I readily promised, and we soon after parted; Lady Emily to her toilet, and I to execute my commission. But by some fairy impulse or other, Lady Emily's "What shall I do?" had taken entire possession of my thoughts, much to the detriment of Scott's last novel. "Such a lovely creature as this!" said I inwardly, "formed to be the ornament of society, forced to such an exclamation! But," continued I, in the same train of consideration, "by whom are they not uttered? In every station these few words will be heard with more or less meaning. The wealthy heir, revelling in all the pleasures and delights of luxury, and snatching with hasty hand every sweet life can afford, like the bee, culling honey from every flower, in the midst of all his joys and festivity will cast his weary listless limbs on the nearest couch, with the exclamation of 'What shall I do?' The miserable offspring of poverty, dragging on his existence through hardships and difficulties, utters the same exclamation from his straw pallet: the shuddering victim of sorrow, while the unconscious tear trickles down his care-worn cheeks, will clasp his hands in agony, and sigh forth the scarcely-articulate sounds from his agitated and bursting bosom. It is alike connected with the soft melting accents of pity and the tumultuous fury of anger; it is often to be found in the last desperate address of the discarded lover, and the broken ejaculations of my old grandfather during a twinge of the gout. The philosopher has often broken out into a similar expression while demonstrating some hidden problem, or unravelling the secrets of nature; and as often has it come to the aid of the dismayed countryman, as, with one hand employed in scratching his head and the other in collecting the fragments of the broken milk-jug, he planned the best mode of avoiding the anger and broomstick of Betty the housemaid. As my thoughts were hurrying thus rapidly on, my feet were not slow in accompanying them; and I had made some progress in the park, when, to my amazement, I heard the identical subject of my meditations uttered in the deepest tones of distress. I mechanically turned to the sound, and beheld a tattered aged figure, in the habiliments of a soldier, hanging in silent agony over a poor dog, which, after having apparently been the faithful companion of his wanderings, now lay dead at his feet; his long gray locks floated in the cold air, and, as he dropped the tear of affection over his lost favourite, the old man's countenance, expressive of despair, and at the same time attempted resignation, touched me as feelingly as Lady Emily's smile. I slid gently up to the aged veteran, and slipped some money into his hand. He at first stared at me and my offering with a senseless gaze, like a person just recovering from the effects of some horrible dream!—his eye then glanced upon his poor dog, and, as he recalled his scattered thoughts, the hectic of a moment passed over his furrowed cheek, and a tear stood trembling in his eye; he indignantly brushed it off, and, looking steadfastly at me, attempted to speak, but it was in vain—the words died away in his throat, and he covered his face with his hand. There was no need of thanks, no need of words; that single look was sufficient; it was as precious to me then as the sweetest smile that ever played over the cheek of beauty. Oh! ye thoughtless sons of luxury, ye would give the choicest pleasures of art to be able to enjoy the thrill of delight that single silent look bore with it to my soul: it spoke volumes; and, in my idea, said as feelingly as the old man could have ever wished, "What shall I do to requite you?" I turned away from the affecting scene, and hurrying rapidly on, endeavoured, by the swiftness of my motions, to avoid too open a display of the indescribable feelings that succeeded one another in the mastery of my whole bosom; but, in my haste, stumbling over something in the road, and, on casting my eyes downwards, finding them to be a little boy's playthings, I set about repairing my error; and upon looking out for the little fellow, found him by my side, standing in a most ludicrous attitude of rage, and the look which he directed at the dispersed objects of his amusement was amply expressive of "What shall I do to revenge myself?" The contrast between this and my former adventure was too striking to be unobserved. "Here are two circumstances immediately to corroborate my observations," was my remark, as I walked more slowly onwards, "and a hundred more would perhaps occur in the space of an hour: these go well to prove how often those four expressive monosyllables are every where uttered," continued I, resuming the broken thread of my observations. "Sir Felix Patient, while yielding to the overwhelming torrent of her ladyship's tongue, stretches out his limbs, good easy man, before the parlour fire, and, as his dirty shoes afford new subjects for his cara sposa's eloquence, solaces himself with the conciliating 'Lord, lord! my dear, what shall I do to please you?' The county member, while lowering his purse-proud haughtiness to the apron of some greasy rogue, often owes his vote to the overpowering 'What shall I do for your son Samuel, or that little chubby-face darling, Sally?' Amidst, too, the transactions of our own miniature world, to enumerate the various repetitions of these four words would bid defiance to the calculating powers of a Burton. How often has some unhappy youngster, running in breathless, and finding himself too late for school, deliberated at the door, whether he should trust his fate to the master's clemency, or return, with a sick headach, to his dame's; how often has he then appealed, with tears in his eyes, to some companion, in the emphatical, impressive, much meaning 'What shall I do?' Thou thyself, Charles, hast often been inclined to try the force of these monosyllables amid the various jeopardies in which you have been involved by love, or a romantic disposition." Little did I at this moment suspect that the fates were preparing a new jeopardy for me; but unfortunately the hour had already arrived which attracts all the butterflies of fashion into the park, and in the midst of my cogitations I found myself crossing the ride, and there appeared, within a few yards of me, a horseman advancing at a most tremendous rate, and to all appearance one of those hair-brained gentlemen that pay very little regard to humble foot-passengers, though even of the honourable Charles Bellamy's rank. As I wheeled round on my retreat, to my utter dismay, a moving phalanx of carriages appeared in the rear, blocking up my escape. My only outlet lay through a part of the road, from which, as I perceived the mud with which it was environed, I turned with horror; but what was to be done? carriages approaching one way, my friend on his bit of blood splashing and dashing at a devil of a rate on the other, like Obadiah on his coach-horse; I was in almost as bad a predicament as Dr. Slop. "Heavenly Trivia!" I exclaimed, "what shall I do?" and I was on the point of forcing a passage through the aforesaid palisade of mud, which had been scraped up with most officious industry, when a well-known voice arrested my progress with "Well, Charles, have you been looking for the fair maid of Perth in the park?" I looked up; it was Lady Emily's carriage that had been my opponent that way, and she was negligently leaning with her well-turned arm over the door.

For the first time I recollected my promise, and the novel, and immediately began stammering out a list of excuses; but I was evidently at a loss; I felt myself quite entitled to say, "What shall I do?" "Any thing but stand staring there, with such a beautiful creature before you," replied youth and love. I thought the reproof just. Fortunately her old uncle, the companion of her ride, had just been summoned away; in a moment the door was opened, and I offered my lovely cousin the services of a penitent, willing to atone in every way for his forgetfulness.

It was accepted; and, pardon me, gentle reader, if, while she pronounced my forgiveness, another of Lady Emily's bewitching smiles totally banished from my thoughts the recollection of "What shall I do?"

NOT AT HOME.

"Not at home," said her ladyship's footman, with the usual air of nonchalance, which says, "You know I am lying, but—n'importe!"

"Not at home," I repeated to myself, as I sauntered from the door in a careless fit of abstractedness. "Not at home!" how universally practised is this falsehood! Of what various, and what powerful import! Is there any one who has not been preserved from annoyance by its adoption? Is there any one who has not rejoiced, or grieved, or smiled, or sighed, at the sound of "Not at home?" No! every body—that is, every body who has any pretensions to the title of somebody—acknowledges the utility and advantages of these three little words. To them the lady of ton is indebted for the undisturbed enjoyment of her vapours; the philosopher, for the preservation of solitude and study; the spendthrift, for the repulse of the importunate dun.

It is true, that the constant use of this sentence savours somewhat of a false French taste, which I hope never to see engrafted upon our true English feeling. But in this particular who will not excuse this imitation of our refined neighbours? Who will so far give up the enviable privilege of making his house his castle, as to throw open the gates upon the first summons of inquisitive impertinence or fashionable intrusion? The "morning calls" of the dun and the dandy, the belle and the bailiff, the poet and the petitioner, appear to us a species of open hostility, carried on against our comfort and tranquillity; and, as all stratagems are fair in war, we find no fault with the ingenious device which fortifies us against these insidious attacks.

While I was engaged in this mental soliloquy, a carriage drove up to Lady Mortimer's door, and a footman in a most appallingly splendid livery roused me from a reverie by a thundering knock. "Not at home!" was the result of the application. Half-a-dozen cards were thrust from the window; and, after due inquiries after her ladyship's cold, and her ladyship's husband's cold, and her ladyship's lap-dog's cold, the carriage resumed its course, and so did my cogitations. "What," said I to myself, "would have been the visitor's perplexity, if this brief formula were not in use?" She must have got out of her carriage; an exertion which would ill accord with the vis inertiae of a lady; or she must have given up her intention of leaving her card at a dozen houses to which she is now hastening, or she must have gone to dinner even later than fashionable punctuality requires! Equally annoying would the visit have proved to the lady of the house. She might have been obliged to throw the "Abbot" into the drawer, or to call the children from the nursery. Is she taciturn? She might have been compelled to converse. Is she talkative? She might have been compelled to hold her tongue; or, in all probability, she sees her friends to-night; and it would be hard indeed if she were not allowed to be "not at home" till ten at night, when from that time she must be "at home" till three in the morning.

A knock again recalled me from my abstraction. Upon looking up, I perceived an interesting youth listening with evident mortification to the "Not at home" of the porter. "Not at home!" he muttered to himself, as he retired. "What am I to think? She has denied herself these three days!" and, with a most loverlike sigh, he passed on his way. Here again, what an invaluable talisman was found in "Not at home!" The idol of his affections was perhaps at that moment receiving the incense of adoration from another, possibly a more favoured votary: perhaps she was balancing, in the solitude of her boudoir, between the vicar's band and the captain's epaulettes; or weighing the merits of gout with a plum, on the one side, against those of love with a shilling, on the other. Or, possibly, she was sitting unprepared for conquest, unadorned by cosmetic aid, wrapt up in dreams of to-night's assembly; where her face will owe the evening's unexpected triumph to the assistance of the morning's "Not at home."

Another knock! Another "Not at home!" A fat tradesman, with all the terrors of authorized impertinence written legibly on his forehead, was combating with pertinacious resolution the denial of a valet. "The captain's not at home," said the servant. "I saw him at the window,"

* Every one knows the gradations of vis, visit, and visitation; vis inertiae, therefore, signifies an idle visit.

cried the other. "I can't help that," resumed the laced Cerberus, "he's not at home."

The foe was not easily repulsed, and seemed disposed to storm. I was in no little fear for the security of "the castle," but the siege was finally raised. The enemy retreated, sending forth from his half-closed teeth many threats, intermingled with frequent mention of a powerful ally in the person of Lawyer Shark. "Here," said I, resuming my meditations, "here is another instance of the utility of my theme. Without it, the noble spirit of this disciple of Mars would have been torn away from reflections on twenty-pounders, by a demand for twenty pounds; from his pride in the king's commission, by his dread of the king's bench. Perhaps he is at this moment entranced in dreams of charges of horse and foot! He might have been roused by a charge for boots and shoes. In fancy, he is at the head of serried columns of warriors! His eyes might have been opened upon columns of shillings and pence. In fancy, he is disposing of crowns! Horrible thought! he might have been awakened to the recollection that he has not half a crown in the world!"

I had now reached the door of a friend, whom, to say the truth, I designed to dun for an article. Coming in the capacity of a dun, I ought not to have been surprised that I experienced a dun's reception. Nevertheless, I was a little nettled at the "Not at home" of my old friend. "What," said I, recurring to my former ideas, "what can be Harry's occupation that he is thus inaccessible? Is he making love, or making verses? studying Euclid or the Sporting Magazine? meditating on the trial of Queen's last October, or the trial for King's next July?" For surely no light cause should induce one gentleman to be "not at home" to another.

As is usual with persons in my situation, who are more accustomed to speculate upon trifles, from which no fixed principle can be deduced, I negated the theory of one moment by the practice of the next. For, having returned from my perambulations, I seated myself in my study, with pen, ink, and a sheet of foolscap before me; and, finding myself once more "at home," enjoined the servant to remember that I was "not at home" for the rest of the day.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Anniversaries of Religious and Moral Societies.—The events of the last week, as connected with these institutions, offer a striking commentary on the boasted spread of infidelity and atheism. The audiences which attended to hear the annual reports, were more numerous than they had been for several years, and the announcement of the transactions during the past year, evinced an increased and extended ardour in the public mind to promote the great objects of virtue and piety. We are not disposed, more than others, to foster sectarian or bigotted prejudices, and we are particularly hostile to whatever tends to promote the views of those who would introduce a national religion into this now free and happy country, or, in other words, connect church and state. But while we are thus earnest on this vital point, while we shall ever hold ourselves in readiness to sound the first alarm at the approach, or even threat of an approach of the evil we deprecate, we cannot be blind to the great benefit conferred by the societies to which we refer, and whose prosperity is identified, so long as they are restricted to their proper objects, with the happiness and improvement of the community at large. We deem it, therefore, our duty to notice their proceedings so far as to preserve a record of their usefulness in our pages, and lend the feeble tribute of our testimony to their success.

The Honorable Richard Varick presided at the annual meeting of the "American Bible Society," and a number of eloquent speakers addressed a crowded and gratified assembly. The report stated that the receipts for the last year had amounted to one hundred and forty-three thousand one hundred and eighty-four dollars and thirty-three cents; the expenditures to one hundred and forty-seven thousand and eighty-one dollars and sixty-eight cents. The number of books printed, or otherwise procured by the society, during the year, amounts to three hundred and sixty-two thousand four hundred and ninety-two; one hundred and ninety-one thousand one hundred and seventy-four books were issued for sale, and nearly nine thousand gratuitously distributed.

The "American Seamen's Friend Society" was formed in January, 1827. A permanent agent is now engaged to promote its interests. A Sailors' Magazine has been commenced, and a Seaman's Saving Bank established. This last institution is not connected with any society, nor should it be; it should be open to all classes, worthy and unworthy, as being admirably calculated to confirm the former in their virtuous habits and intentions, redeem the latter from their deviations from the paths of rectitude, and to guard both against the temptations to which improvidence and ignorance too often render this useful class of men so peculiarly obnoxious. To the east and south, schools and places of worship have been erected to accommodate them. We sincerely hope that the efforts now making to unite the hardy tar in ties of moral fellowship with his brother-citizens, from whom he has too long been severed, may prove availing, and produce benefits that shall operate to the mutual benefit of both.

"New-York Sunday School Union." Our eye was arrested the other afternoon, as we were carelessly strolling up Broadway, by a singular spectacle, at once imposing and delightful. A large concourse of boys and girls crowded the park, in front of the city-hall, arrayed in neat attire, and on the point of forming a procession, of nearly eight thousand in force, for the castle-garden. The utmost decorum marked the behaviour of this hopeful multitude, on whom much of the future good or wo of this community must of necessity depend, and after having been reviewed by their teachers, they formed, and marched in order to the destined place of meeting. Here a large concourse of spectators awaited their coming, and seemed highly gratified at their appearance. Their young voices rose in choral strains of praise to their great Creator, and a blessing was then invoked upon them by Dr. Milnor. The number of scholars has very much increased during the last year, as well as the number of schools and teachers. Forty-seven libraries belong to the schools, containing upwards of thirteen thousand volumes. It is impossible to contemplate the prosperity of this institution, without experiencing delightful anticipations of the future good to society at large with which it is fraught. The improved moral condition, the useful knowledge, and active habits of the coming generations of man, might be secured by a universal extension of these humble but efficient instruments; and sorry, indeed, are we to perceive that a want, an extensive want, still obtains in this enlightened state, of the means of instruction. Sorry are we to confirm the charge made by an able and accomplished writer at Philadelphia, that our own deficiencies are too much neglected for the quixotic object of supplying those which exist in the most distant regions, and which have no claims upon us whatever. Children who have no access to school, are still numerous amongst us; and the probability is in favour of their ignorance exposing them to become easy victims to the temptations of vice, and the seduction of corruption. Remove this reproach, wipe out this foul stain; give your every spare penny to the instruction of the needy in knowledge and the abject in morals, and then, when you have effected this imperative object, it will be time enough to seek objects upon whom to pour forth the excess of your charity abroad, ay, and to blazon it forth to the four ends of the earth.

"New-York City Temperance Society." A very excellent address was pronounced before this association, on Tuesday evening of last week, by Hugh Maxwell, esq. who, to his natural eloquence, added all the force which the nature of his subject would admit, and drew the stronger attention from the known fact of his being about to resign the responsible station he has so long and so ably filled. He dwelt on the necessity and obligation imposed upon all men possessing authority and influence, to attempt the eradication of an evil to which alone much of the misery, the pauperism, the immorality, the crime, and the diseases of the present day, and of our city in particular, might be safely imputed. He alleged that three-fourths of the five thousand criminals that were annually brought to the bar of justice, owed their degradation to intemperance. Half of the witnesses, say thirty-thousand in all, who are more or less engaged with the principals in crime, were generally intoxicated at the time of commission. Out of twenty trials for murder at which he had assisted, all the convicts had been proved to be drunk when they perpetrated the horrid acts for which they stood indicted. A strong instance was furnished by Richard Johnson, who lately underwent the sentence of the law for the murder of a woman to whom he had been wrongly, but ferrely attached. This unfortunate man confessed to the district attorney, that he had drunk repeatedly before he committed the awful deed. Mr. M. commented in severe, but just terms, on the conduct of the corporation. This body, that fears to do evil, that is so scrupulous about the rights of the people that it cannot even allow them to extend these very rights, lest some individual privilege be encroached upon, this excellent, virtuous, and discreet body, dares not refuse to any one a license to retail spirits, be it in Broadway or on the Collect. When shall we have a responsible body of men to act and legislate for us, and not merely to talk and sip tea, and quaff champagne? We are happy to hear that the "Temperance Society" is doing well. Some of the most sanguine already prophesy that, in a few years hence, even wine will be utterly banished from the tables of gentlemen!—always excepting the members of the corporation in their collective capacity.

Grant Thorburn.—Reader, art thou subject to the dumps?—that is, anglicised—art thou apt to feel weary of the world around thee, and of every thing in it, not excepting even thyself? Dost thou ever think, with Hamlet, that "this goodly frame, the earth, is a sterile promontory, and this brave o'erhanging firmament, the air, this majestical roof, fretted with golden fire, is a foul and pestilent congregation of vapours?" Dost thou ever feel as if man delighted thee not, nor woman neither? then betake thee straight to Thorburn's, and there scent the fragrance of the new-blown rose, or

"But sweeter than the lids of Juno's eyes,
"Or Cytherea's breath."

there gaze upon the deep and lasting verdure of the tropic shrub, the cactus serpentine, or lemon, tapering in beauty, and giving forth blossom, fruit, and the sere leaf withal—three seasons joined in one—and there breathe in holy influences drawn from the concentrated beauties of nature, as she appears the richest, and the fairest, and the most promising, in all her pride of vegetation, and all her glow of fruitage, and thou must indeed be made of impenetrable stuff, if thou yieldest not thy sternness and thy gloom of spirit to the enchantment that surrounds thee. But, gentle reader, if all this beauty of verdure, if all this freshness of spring, awake thee not from thy slumbering mood, then get thee into the parterre within. There the objects that will greet thine eye, will also awaken hallowed feelings in thy heart. There is the identical table on which thy country's benefactor, thy own great Washington, was wont to lean, as his sincere aspirations for his country's welfare burst forth from his pure heart, and ascended to heaven. This table occupied his pew in Trinity church, and simple as it is, how numerous and full of interest are the associations which it is calculated to call up! There, too, thou wilt find numerous articles to stimulate thy antiquarian taste and curiosity for antique novelty. The laws of this state in 1656; the first directory ever published in Gotham; the chair in which the venerable Dr. Rogers was wont to sit preaching to his congregation; the quaint lines of Grant Thorburn himself, written underneath the picture of good old Mary Simpson, the faithful servant of Washington, and his home-thrusts at doctors, and lawyers, and divines—but go, good reader, and see for thyself—thou'lt thank us for the hint that sends thee there. While recommending friend Thorburn's floral theatre, we deem it appropriate to furnish the visitor with some beautiful lines—extracted from a late London paper—which will readily associate with the genius of the place:

FIRST FLOWERS.

First flowers of the spring-time,
Bright gems of the year,
All lovely and blooming,
How fresh ye appear!
Springing up in the garden,
The hedge-row and vale,
Enriched by the showers,
And fanned by the gale.
Your beauty is transient,
But, oh, it is sweet,
As the deep-felt emotion
When absent friends meet;
After dangers surmounted,
And miseries flown,
Their lips and looks telling
Of days—that are gone:
Your herald—the tempest;
Your bed—the cold earth;
Unsheltered and sunless
The place of your birth:
The snow-drift is sweeping,
And dimly the morrow
From the eastward is stealing
To hail your return.
I have lov'd your young blossoms,
They ever brought joy,
By regret unimbittered,
Unchecked by a sigh!
But now, whilst I gaze on
Your pale tender flowers,
Each leaf tells the tale
Of happier hours:

Of friends smiling round me,
Now laid in the tomb!
Of friendships—all withered;
Hearts—stript of their bloom;
Loved eyes, whose expression
Time never can steal,
Whilst your blossoms the coming
Of spring-time reveal!
Still, still, ye are welcome!
In sorrow or bliss:
Remorse never mingles
With feeling like this—
As first love to the boom,
So you, to the year,
In your innocent beauty
And freshness appear!
The summer may bring us
Its sunshine and flowers,
Perfuming the valleys,
Entwining the bowers;
O'er beds of sweet roses
The zephyrs may fly,
And breathe on each flow'ret
The same balmy sigh.
In loneliness bending
Beneath the rough blast,
Your gentle forms raising,
When danger is past,
Shining on! shining on!
Like hope, ye appear,
First flowers of the spring-time,
Bright gems of the year.

Resignation of Mr. Maxwell.—It is equally as necessary to the pure administration of justice, that public officers should be men of talents, skill, and integrity, as that the laws themselves should be good. We cannot, therefore, refrain from expressing our regret at the resignation of Mr. Maxwell. The duties of the district attorney are of a peculiar nature; they require more character than most public occupations; and he who would discharge them faithfully, must possess firmness, discretion, and honesty, blended with benevolent feeling. He must comprehend the disadvantages of the wretched, without yielding too much to sympathy, and investigate affairs, involving the interests of the wealthy and powerful, uninfluenced by promises or threats. This delicate and laborious station Mr. Maxwell has long filled in such a manner as to make his retirement a subject of sincere and universal regret. His persevering zeal, his powerful talents, and fearless and manly independence, rank him among the highest ornaments of the bar; and if any thing could diminish our sorrow at beholding him abandon the office he has ornamented, it is, that he yet remains among us in a retirement which cannot fail to add to the advantages he has already obtained. In offering his resignation, at the close of the May term of the court of sessions, he made the following observations: "As it regards the presiding magistrate of this court, I can freely say, that in his hands justice has not lost its purity, or been administered without mercy; and, as far as my feelings are enlisted in the declaration, I am most happy in making it." We believe this sentiment came from the heart of Mr. Maxwell, and the compliment is as well merited as any we have ever heard pronounced. Although the career of Mr. Riker has been beset with political enemies, who have spared neither labour nor ingenuity to injure his reputation, every intelligent and disinterested mind can distinguish between the calumnies engendered in the warmth of party spirit and the cool and just charges of reason and truth. These ungenerous reports have been most industriously circulated, and we have watched their progress with mingled regret and indignation; but, whenever they assumed a palpable shape, and could be traced to any responsible authority, they have uniformly vanished before investigation, and left their object yet more firmly established in the respectful esteem of his fellow-citizens. It is one of the advantages of a free press, that while its independence sometimes degenerates into licentiousness, the public mind, from habits of discerning, perceives when it extends beyond the limits of truth; and vague accusations, which surround every individual elevated above the common level, float about, like the light clouds in the sky, which, when left to themselves, pass away with the idle wind.—Ogden Hoffman, esq. is named as the successor of Mr. Maxwell.

Trinity Church.—The wooden paling which has so long disfigured this venerable edifice, has been removed some paces back, and is to have its place supplied by a light and graceful iron railing. Availing ourselves of a suggestion made by the editor of the American, we recommend the still farther removal of the new enclosure, so that it shall range with the front of the body of the church, and throw forward the portico, in bold relief, upon the pavement, which will then form a noble sidewalk and promenade, fit for the most commanding site in the most elegant highway in the United States.

Catholic Emancipation.—Seldom has it fallen to our lot to perform a more grateful duty than the one now imposed upon us, to congratulate our Irish friends on the immeasurable victory which justice and enlightenment have achieved for them at home, under the auspices of a vigorous administration. Nature, and nature's God, entitled them to freedom from the galling chain and the yoke that depresses to earth, and this freedom they have obtained. They are as their fellow-citizens—their foreheads no longer branded with the marks of servitude, their minds no longer fettered by the disabilities of a cruel and oppressive exclusion. They can now go forth and exert their faculties in political and moral improvement. They have once more a country for which to live, for which to die. Their souls are once more on fire, ready on eagle wings to fly aloft, and mingle with kindred genius and intellect. The wrongs of Ireland are avenged—the voice of Sheridan is heard even now that the lips which gave it birth have mouldered into dust. Green Erin rejoices throughout her glad valleys, and her sons, as they receive the glad tidings of liberty and equality, assume the port of men.

"Fierce in their eyes the fire of valour burns,
"And as the slave departs, the man returns."

COME, REST IN THIS BOSOM.

ARRANGED FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR, BY WILLIAM WOOD, JR.

ANDANTE.

Come, rest in this bo - som, my own strick - en deer; Though the herd have fled from thee, thy home is still here; Here still is the smile that no cloud can o'er - cast, And the heart, and the hand, all thy own to the last!

O! what was love made for, if 'tis not the same, Thro' joy and thro' torments, thro' glory and shame? | I know not, I ask not, if guilt's in that heart; I but know that I love thee, whatever thou art! | Thou hast called me thy angel, in moments of bliss— Still thy angel I'll be, 'mid the horrors of this: | Thro' the furnace, unshrinking, thy steps to pursue, And shield thee, and save thee, or perish there too!

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

ON THE PORTRAIT OF A DEAD FRIEND.

PAINTED BY INMAN.

EARTH holds thee not, thou bright and beautiful:
The living play of that fair countenance,
The lip's bright smile, and the eye's sunny glance,
Which no dark thought could dull,
Are over now, for death, the mighty one,
Hath changed the face we loved to look upon.

Yet there thou smilest still—oh! is there not Something of high and holy in the art
Which thus can keep alive, within the heart,
Looks, else perchance forgot?
For those once wont our light of life to be,
Come dimly oft upon the memory.

Yet by the painter's magic—blessed power!—
We see thee still: the look, the smile are there,
The bland expression thou wert wont to wear,
When, in the social hour,
Thou mad'st home's circle sweet a fairy ring—
Alas! e'en then its flowers were withering!

We feel thy presence when around the hearth
We gather, and the twilight's mellow gloom
Throws its dim shadows o'er the darkened room—
The hallowed hour of earth!
And the faint firelight glances on the walls,
And on the pictured semblance softly falls.

How vivid the illusion!—thou art there,
The cheek's faint glow, the eye's benignant glance;
We gaze upon the noble brow's expanse,
The dark and glossy hair,
The sweetness of thy half-formed smile, and thou,
E'en in life's beauty, art before us now!

But ne'er before didst thou, in silence chill,
Listen to mirthful speech or repartee;
And now, while converse flows unchecked and free,
Why art thou silent still?
Alas! the dream is broken!—on the ear
No longer fall the tones it thirsts to hear.

Yet still thy looks are eloquent, and while
Thine eye looks down upon us, mild and sweet,
Yet with a searching glance, and while we meet
Thy bland and gentle smile,
We feel a spirit's presence, and we fear
To utter aught unworthy of thine ear.

PYRAMUS AND THISBE.

Quam Deus amat, moritur adolescens.—Horace.

In the far chambers of the radiant west,
Was sinking to repose the golden sun;
His red glance lingered on Euphrates' breast,
And trembled on the fanes of Babylon,
With beams that gladdened all they gazed upon:
Thro' fragrant gardens stole the south wind's sigh;
Mild as a thought of some rich vision gone;
A spell seemed cast upon the o'er-arching sky,
Lit by the magic power of sunset's alchemy!

At such an hour, the mind's creative charm
Sheds over earth a halo of delight;
The heart, with rapture and with glory warm,
As the day yields unto the calm twilight,
Thrills, while young fancy soars on pinions bright;
And hope is lingering with her music there,
With her dreams pictured to the spirit's sight—
Earth then seems Eden; heaven is clear and fair;
And hallowed stars look out from the blue fields of air.

Yet unto hearts which have been stirred by love,
Like fount by wild-bird on its purple wing,
How must the green earth's breast, the sky above,
At such an hour, to their imagining
A rapt delirium to the spirit bring!

All things have gladness for the bounding soul;
The world is brightening with the hues of spring;
As passion-tides through ardent bosoms roll,
Spurning the bonds of clay, despising their control.

And thus it was, when gentle Thisbe came,
Musing in bliss, that golden evening-tide;
With sighs of fragrance, and with heart of flame,
To early love's devotedness allied—
A maid in beauty, destined for a bride!
How thronged glad fancies to her ardent brain,
As young birds, flower-like, in the air will glide,
When leaves make music to the west wind's strain!
Thus was her spirit fill'd with hopes and yearnings vain.

Where was the loved one, while that maiden stood
In her meek loneliness beside the tomb;
While dread and fear, like an o'erpowering flood,
Swept o'er her young heart with a sense of gloom;
While from her rose-leaf lip had passed the bloom,
And the light from her enkindled eye;
Which no fond accent ever might relume:
As the dun clouds when autumn-winds are high,
Shut out the crimson ray that gilds the evening sky?

Oh, love! thine image is a shadow vain;
An unsubstantial and delusive ray;
Once beaming kindly o'er youth's fresh domain,
And then for ever passing hence away,
Leaving the spirit shut in walls of clay!
Why should young hearts e'en bow them at thy shrine,
Wedded to dust, united to decay?
Yet let the soul that loveth, not repine—
Such was thy fate, fond Thisbe!—such is mine! C.

BALLAD.

"La rose cueille et le cœur gagné ne plaisent qu'un jour."

THE maiden sate at her busy wheel,
Her heart was light and free,
And ever in cheerful song broke forth
Her bosom's harmless glee.
Her song was in mockery of love,
And oft I heard her say,
"The gathered rose, and the stolen heart,
"Can charm but for a day."

I looked on the maiden's rosy cheek,
And her lip so full and bright,
And I sighed to think that the traitor love,
Should conquer a heart so light:
But she thought not of future days of wo,
While she carolled in tones so gay;
"The gathered rose, and the stolen heart,
"Can charm but for a day."

A year passed on, and again I stood
By the humble cottage-door;
The maiden sate at her busy wheel,
But her look was blithe no more:
The big tear stood in her downcast eye,
And with sighs I heard her say,
"The gathered rose, and the stolen heart,
"Can charm but for a day."

Oh! well I knew what had dimmed her eye,
And made her cheek so pale;
The maid had forgotten her early song,
While she listened to love's soft tale;
She had tasted the sweets of his poisoned cup,
It had wasted her life away:
And the stolen heart, like the gathered rose,
Had charmed but for a day.

THE BURIAL.

It was September. Day had dawned on the happy valley where the pomp and fashion of the city, and the beauty and simplicity of the country were assembled to witness the most interesting scene of college life. That scene had passed, and the varied groups, on the morning succeeding commencement, were leisurely departing for their several homes. I sat in my attic window pensively looking after the crowded vehicles as they rolled rapidly away from the village, and were lost behind the autumn-tinted copses of maple or birch, or among the undulations of the far-off green hills that skirted the charming vale. There was much bustle in the halls and on the college-green. The echo of light feet and happy voices rung out at intervals. Now and then I could hear, "Farewell, remember me to, you know whom," mutually exchanged; and then succeeded a catch of "parting friends," or "home, sweet home;" as friend after friend walked rapidly away. Many a student paused on the green, looked smilingly back to his second home, waved his hat or hand to those who observed him from the windows, and hurried off. At length all became silent, for all had departed except myself: and such, said I—but I will spare the reader all my moralizings: brushing the ashes from my segar, I arose, and walked thoughtfully along the deserted halls. The initials of many a cherished name, penciled during some listless moment, offered a theme for reflection, while waiting the stage that was to carry me home. As I slowly turned an angle of the wall, the name of "Gordon Hall, 1807," broke on my view. In a moment the image of that great and good man was before me, associated with all that is venerable and sublime in Christian philanthropy; with the darkness and degradation of unhappy India, and the temples, and the idols, and the countless multitudes that perish there. Thought followed thought in rapid succession, till my mind was absorbed in an infinitude of associations without end or order, and became, as it were, dizzied under their perplexing influence. At that moment the coachman's whip broke my reverie, and we were soon gliding down the college-avenue toward my distant home. The white chimneys, around which the smoke of a hundred deserted fires lazily curled, grew small and smaller by degrees, till they faded from my sight in the blue distance. We rode leisurely along the bank of a charming little river that beautifully winds through the valley of W—, and near the middle of the afternoon approached the precincts of my native village. The objects grew more and more familiar as we advanced, awakening a thousand recollections of my younger years. I am no enthusiast, reader, but is there aught so lovely as home, "sweet home?" There is very music in the name, when we have long been absent. Where are the vales, and the streams, and the hills, and the mountains, and the garniture of forests, and the billowy wave of golden harvests, and the varied imagery of clouds, and stars and suns, so beautiful as around our boyhood's home? There the flowers exhibit a brighter hue, the birds a fairer plumage, and their song comes upon the ear in a richer and more pleasing melody. To a fanciful view, the whole landscape wears a living expression, only surpassed in loveliness by the smiles of those who await us there. In my imagination I was already grasping the proffered hand of parents and beloved ones, and listening to their kindly greetings, when the solemn toll of a knell rung through the peaceful valley, and died away in innumerable echoes among the neighbouring mountains. There was an involuntary shudder among the passengers when that monitory sound broke upon their ears. A second succeeded, and every eye was turned toward the various buildings that compose the little village of S—. As mine glanced rapidly along from dwelling to dwelling, it fell upon a group assembled around the mansion of my aged friend. The truth flashed upon my mind. He had an only daughter, who was the companion and solace of his declining years. She was the pride of the whole village, and the joy of every heart. As I bade her adieu a few months before, I marked a hectic-like tinge upon her cheek; but affection whispered that it was but a temporary indisposition. The vehicle now halted at the inn, and without waiting to return the kindly salutation of its worthy proprietor, I hurried across the green, and was soon mingled with the crowd that was collected beneath the lofty elms which canopied the door-yard. Under the most leafy stood the bier, and as I closed the white gate, the coffin and the corpse of the lovely maiden were brought forth and placed on the melancholy car. A low deep sigh broke from the assembly as the afflicted parent, the aged and only kindred mourner of the dead, followed the silent and sorrowing procession and seated himself near the coffin. The venerable minister of the parish then ascended a temporary pulpit, erected for the occasion beneath the spreading tree, and, while a tear glistened in his eye, portrayed, in striking, yet simple colours, the worth and Christian loveliness of the "beautiful and the dead." Her character was above comment, but he failed not in the delineation! His eloquence was beautifully simple, and of that cast which thrills the heart from its very simplicity. Every eye bore testimony to the power and the pathos of his language. The countenance of the widowed parent grew brighter and brighter as his venerable friend proceeded; and when he exclaimed, in the language of Him who spake as never man spake, "the damsel is not dead, but sleepeth," a visible smile played for a moment over his furrowed features.

For myself, I cannot cry. It is not in language or in suffering to draw a tear from me. I am no stoic, but the luxury of tears was never mine. Whether it is constitutional, I cannot tell. I have known many such, who, amid the keenest sufferings, could never weep. There is a sorrowing of the soul, a heaving of the bosom, a difficulty of respiration, and an indescribable suffocation in the throat; yet, amidst all this tempest of emotion, no drop of sorrow falls. I have often envied those whose grief is mitigated by the effusion of tears. I could not weep, though the deceased was the playmate of my early and brightest years. But, let that pass. The funeral hymn succeeded, and as the last solemn notes of the requiem died away, there was a momentary silence, as if the pulse of nature had ceased to beat. It was but for a moment, and the hawk resumed his fitful shriek, as he wheeled his circling mazes over a neighbouring grave, the crow screamed from her distant perch on the scathed and branchless pine, and the autumn breeze sighed among the waving elms, sweeping down leaf after leaf, fit emblem of the beautiful and faded one who reclined beneath. The lid was raised for the last farewell view of the village favourite. The melancholy assembly gathered around the bier. All eyes were bent on the pale features of the dead, in the last lingering gaze of an affectionate adieu. It was a sight incomparably affecting. She whose step, but a few short months before, was so elastic, whose cheek was ever dimpled with smiles of innocent gladness, or moistened by the tear for others' wretchedness, lay chill and motionless as the clod of the valley which was, ere long, to roof her narrow dwelling. There was a slight perspiration on her marble brow, that appeared beautiful as the white lily empearled by the summer shower. The crowd respectfully retired as the bereaved parent and the affianced partner of the deceased maiden drew near. The old man stood up, and looked for a moment on the beautiful features of the last of his once-promising offspring. At first he wept not, but soon the stern and the better thoughts of an earthly adieu vanquished the Christian firmness of his soul and wrung the big drops from his eye. He bowed himself and retired. Such a parting sufficed not the overwhelming emotions of the affectionate youth. He knelt beside the coffin, and gazed with fondness on the betrothed of his bosom. "Death," exclaimed he, "thou must not, shalt not, have all;" and as he spoke, he severed a rich auburn curl from among the ringlets that clustered around her snowy forehead. At length, recollecting himself, he arose, printed a kiss on the yet smiling cheek of his Emily, and withdrew. The procession was then formed, and the bier, borne on the shoulders of four young men, moved slowly to the grave-yard. Not a sound was heard save the echoing knell.

Whoever has been in the grave-yard at S——, will recollect two aged pines that spread their long arrowy branches over the white tombs, as if to protect them from the inclemencies of the seasons. I have sat for hours under their mournful shade, and while the moonbeams reposed along the grassy mounds that swelled up around me, listened to the sighing breeze or the whippoorwill, while musing on the loved ones that were resting there. Often have I wished that my own worthless form might repose with them, after the consummation of my earthly pilgrimage. I am not superstitious, but I have shuddered at the thought of lying down among the promiscuous assemblage of a city cemetery, far from my father's dust. It is of but little consequence what niche in earth's crowded Golgotha these limbs may occupy; but still I would rest in the grave-yard of my native village, beside the companions of my childhood, beneath the grass, and the flowers, and the pines that murmur there; where the sun and stars, and the mountain breeze could greet my grave; and not in the city's charnel-house, to mingle with that fearful mass of human corruption, or be disinterred by the spade of the reckless sexton. Oh, did we know the precise spot where our wearied forms shall repose after the toils, and tumults, and troubles of life, how often should we visit there, and pluck away the springing weeds, and enclose it with flowers of our own rearing, and shade it with the cypress, and learn lessons of loneliness and abasement, from the reflection of our melancholy destination!

But I have wandered from my path. The sun was just setting as the procession entered the cemetery. Beneath one of the pines of which we have spoken, I observed a little heap of fresh mould. It betokened the maiden's grave. She had chosen the spot a few weeks previous, and requested to be buried there. Her request was granted, and ere the last carmine tints had faded from the western clouds, the sexton had spread the green grass turf over the silent dwelling of the loved and lovely Emily. ARION.

DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

LIFE.

LIFE is but a sickly and feverish dream. Its highest enjoyments are transient and fluctuating, and its realities painful and vapid. The poet of nature has, with truth, exclaimed, "How dull, stale, and unprofitable, are all the uses of this life!" To him who has passed its meridian, and descended into the vale of years, its uses are indeed stale and unprofitable. He looks back upon the irregular path he has trodden, and perhaps remembers with regret the few flowers he has seen and left behind, and looks forward to the barren waste that lies before him. He may remember the joyous feelings of his youth—when fancy dipped her pinions in the rainbow-hues of hope—when all the breathing scenes and living pictures of this world were "beauty to his eye, and music to his ear;" but while he remembers, he sickens to think that they were but the "baseless fabrics of a vision"—the glittering baubles of ideal bliss, that have "Gone glimmering through the dream of things that were."

And what is life? To the majority of mankind, a mere struggle for existence—a constant effort to obtain a modicum of food and raiment. To this end man labours through life; passes off, and is followed by those who pursue the same uniform path. In civilized, as well as savage life, man is driven by the same impulse, and struggles for the same object. Those, indeed, who are born to wealth, are not influenced by the same necessity, but they are propelled to action by another motive—the love of pleasure, power, or fame. To all, the Deity has issued his mandate, that virtuous action is indispensable to happiness. The motionless and unagitated lake may please the eye by its apparent placidness, while its waters are putrid, and its particles pregnant with the seeds of pestilence and death.

He who labours for mere subsistence, gives strength and activity to his body and employment to his mind; and he who seeks fame, or wealth, or power, must be intellectually, if not physically, employed. He feels the stimulus which gives him pleasure, and he bounds forward from cliff to cliff, in his ascent, till life closes his exertions and his hopes. Disappointment does not always check his career, but sometimes adds new ardour to his pursuit, and fresh vigour to his exertions:

"Man never is, but always to be blest."

He lives and acts in the anticipation of future good; and when all the sickly realities of life have been enjoyed, and have passed away, he still looks forward to more substantial and enduring happiness beyond the tomb. All human pursuit, and human exertion, terminate in this common boundary—

"The paths of glory lead but to the grave."

And when, at the close of life, he is about to plunge into the eternal world, he casts back his eye upon the varied scenes through which he has passed—the toilsome march he has made—the unsubstantial pageants he has sighed for—and the ruins of blasted hope, or wild ambition—he must exclaim, in the language of Pindar—

"We are shadows, and dreams of shadows are all our fancies imagine."

Abdulraman III. caliph of Cordova, had experience of the vanity of the world when he pronounced the memorable summary of the days of happiness he had enjoyed:—

"I have now reigned above fifty years, in victory or peace, beloved by my subjects, dreaded by my enemies, and respected by my allies; riches and honours, power and pleasures, have waited on my call, nor does any earthly blessing appear to have been wanting to my felicity. In this situation I have diligently numbered the days of pure and genuine happiness which have fallen to my lot; they amount to fourteen. Oh, man! place not thy confidence in this present world."

How very few can say even this! fourteen days of happiness, out of fifty years of existence, are more than fall to the share of the great mass of mankind. Let man, then, regard the world as merely a preparatory stage to a future and eternal state of existence. Let him consider his miseries, misfortunes, and sufferings, as merely intended to prepare him for a world of glory and happiness; and let him persevere in a course of virtue, in despite of the malignity of his enemies, and the storms of adversity that howl around him, and he will infallibly attain this great object, the only true end and aim of all human exertion and pursuit.

Washington City Chronicle.

HEALTH AND BEAUTY.

A Vermont lady, the papers say, lately cured herself completely of a very uncomfortable liability to take cold, by bathing her face, neck, and arms, early every morning with pure cold water, profusely applied. Besides guarding her health, the application, it is averred, greatly heightened her beauty; and we understand it is getting to be generally believed in many parts of the country—and we do not see why it should not be equally efficacious in town—that soft, cold, clean water, applied early in the morning, is one of the finest cosmetics ever used. Rouge, pearl powder, cold cream, and all the knicknackery of the perfumer, are said to be nothing at all to pure water for clearing the complexion and brightening the eyes. The hint is supposed to have been taken from a garden, or meadow, by some lady, who accidentally observed the effect of the cool dew of the morning upon the roses and lilies; the glow and the fragrance it gave to their blossoms, and the firmness and freshness it imparted to their stalks and leaves. We have no great faith in catholicons and panaceas, but we do think this looks more like one than any we have seen noticed; and if, as advised in other cases, its application be accompanied with a little attention to regimen, just enough to secure temperate meals, regular exercise in the free air, and sleep o' nights, from ten or eleven till five or six o' the clock, we believe it would come as near to an universal specific as any thing may come, in a world so remarkable as this is for adversity of circumstance and vicissitude.

TALEBEARING.

Keener than the assassin's dagger, deleterious as the poisoned bowl, are the baneful effects of an uncurbed disposition for talebearing. The noble few who conscientiously avoid "talebearing, backbiting, and spreading evil reports," merit and obtain the approbation of the wise and good; and happy would it be for the community at large, if the number of these worthies could be augmented. The ladies have it in their power to discourage or abet this propensity to detraction, either in their own, or our sex; and as the helpless female is often a sufferer by the indulgence of this unprincipled conduct, it becomes an imperious duty in them to make common cause, and with one accord discourage it. Never let the soft lip of beauteous woman unclose to utter a tale of injurious tendency, or her affectionate bosom be the depository for the dark whisperings of evil report. Let her spurn with high-souled dignity the miscreant who would pollute her ear with the failings or follies of another, and thus do her part toward banishing from society this pest of social life. But this determination to promulge the faults of others, is by no means to be understood as confined to the fairer part of the creation. Observation and daily experience confirm us in the belief, that the evil complained of is to be traced too often to those who have been tempted to boast their proud prerogative in the scale of nature, and whose time would be much better employed in the steady pursuit of their own daily avocations, than in dwelling on the weakness or wickedness of their neighbours: let them with manly firmness combine to "discourage talebearing, backbiting, and spreading evil reports."

AN IRISH INNKEEPER.

The following dialogue recently took place between an English gentleman and the landlord of an Irish hotel:—"Hollo! house."—"I don't know any one of that name hereabouts."—"Are you the master of this inn?"—"Yes, sir, when my wife is not at home."—"Have you a bill of fare?"—"Yes, surely; the fair of Kilderry is next week."—"Tut, tut! how are your beds?"—"Very well, I thank you, sir."—"Is your cellar good?"—"Oh, never fear that, sir; I only want the buyers to make me seller."—"Is your port fine?"—"Never a finer port in the three kingdoms, sir, than Cork harbour; and sure I'm quite convenient to it."—"Have you any mountain?"—"Yes, sir, plenty; the whole country is full of mountains."—"Have you any porter?"—"Have I? oh, by the powers, I'll engage Pat is one of the best porters in the world."—"But I mean porter to drink."—"Oh, sir, he'd drink the ocean dry; not a doubt of that."—"Have you any fish?"—"Yes, they call me a fish—an odd fish, sir."—"I think you are; but I hope you're not a shark."—"Not I, sir; I'm not a lawyer."—"Have you any sole?"—"For your boots and shoes, sir?"—"Pshaw! Have you any plaice?"—"No; but I was promised one, if I'd only vote the way I did not, at the last election."—"Have you any wild fowl?"—"They're tame enough now, for that matter, for they have been killed these ten days."—"I must see myself."—"And welcome, sir; I'll bring you my Mirror in a minute."

AMUSEMENT.

Amusement is the natural and inseparable companion of leisure and affluence. Moralists may declaim, cynics may sneer, bigots may grate their teeth, but the active spirit of man will never be content without amusement. We envy not the feelings of that man who can wrap around him the mantle of indifference, and stalk through life, regardless of those delights which the lavish hand of nature is every where presenting for his enjoyment. Those principles, however sacred their pretensions, which never permit the smile of festivity to unbend the brow, should be distrusted; nay, more, they should be eschewed.

Amidst the charms of social amusement, the anxieties of life release, for a time, their painful hold upon the thoughts; the feelings go forth from the open heart to mingle with the flowing feelings of those around us; and the spirit is inspired with fresh elasticity and vigour, to resume the severer duties of society.

The passions are the main springs, which give impulse and energy to man. For these, the most proper food is well-regulated amusement. You may, indeed, enslave them to the drudgery of money-making, but they will ever be constrained and unwilling servants, if not permitted now and then to play at large beyond the narrow routine of business. And it well becomes those who would coerce our natural propensities within the most scanty limits, and who set up to reform the manners of the age, to consider well the innate strength of the human passions, and to inquire with caution whether they can manage the leviathan, before they attempt to put a ring in his nose.

To the casuist we leave the province of determining what amusements best suit the economy of human nature, and by what chilling formalities self-denial may require that all our enjoyments should be adulterated. We are not the keepers of our neighbour's conscience. Content to direct our own license by the dictates of a conscientious morality, when that share of life's duties which falls to our department is honestly discharged, we have yet to learn, by what authority another is authorized to say to us: "The insipid flowers on the common of life you may be indulged to crop, but venture not to extend your hand to those fairer, more fragrant, and richer blossoms which Providence has, indeed, placed apparently for the gratification of man, but which we have discovered are pregnant with ruin."

Free to avow ourselves, on all proper occasions, the friends of rational and well-regulated amusement, we cannot sit silently by, when the most innocent enjoyments are arraigned and condemned by those sour temperaments, who would mingle their own acidity with the sweet cup of every fellow-being's pleasures.

AMERICA.

Our country has been described abroad as sterile of moral interest. We have, it is said, no monuments, no ruins, none of the colossal remains of temples, and baronial castles, and monkish towers; nothing to connect the heart and the imagination with the past; none of the dim recollections of the gone-by associate the past with the future. We have not travelled in other lands. But in travelling over our ancient forests, planted by nature, and nurtured only by ages; when we have seen the sun rising over a boundless plain where the blue of the heavens, in all directions, touched and mingled with verdure and the flowers; when our thoughts have traversed rivers a thousand leagues in length; when we have seen the ascending steam-boat breasting the surge, and gleaming through the verdure of the trees; we have imagined the happy multitudes, that from the shores will contemplate this scenery in the days to come; and have thought, that our country might at least compare with any other in the beauty of its natural scenery. When, on an uninhabited prairie, we have fallen at nightfall upon a group of cemeterial mounds, and have thought of the human bones that moulder beneath; when the heart and the imagination recall the busy multitude that have strutted through "life's poor play," and ask the phantoms who and what they were, and why they have left no memorials but these mounds—we have found ample scope for reflections and associations of the past with the future. We should not highly estimate the mind, or the heart of the man, who could behold these prairies without deep thought.

POWER OF SONG.

Farinelli was a celebrated Italian singer. After three years of supremacy in England, he, in 1737, prepared to make a tour of the continental courts, scarce more in the style of a candidate for musical honours, than of a coequal with their royal masters in the distinctions due the public pre-eminence. In passing through Paris, he made a conquest of the ears of the capital, charmed the French king, and even extorted from Parisians some acknowledgments of the possible beauty of music not composed within the boundaries of France. From Paris he went to Madrid, where he arrived just in time to save the state; for Philip the Fifth had refused to change his linen, have his face washed, or be shaved. The whole empire was at a stand; and the wisdom of the council was wasted on devices to make the monarch submit to the razor. But the wit of woman at last prevailed. The queen placed Farinelli in an apartment adjoining the closet where the unshorn monarch sat, resolute not to part with his beard. The song began, the monarch listened, and successively was surprised, touched, and enraptured; he ordered the enchanter to appear, and bade him demand what he would. Farinelli demanded only that his majesty would condescend to be shaved, change his linen, and appear in council. What the kneeling world could not have done, was done by a song; and the washed monarch of both the Indies appeared another man. Such are the fates of nations.

A SECRET.

An auld Scotch wife, having heard an advertisement read from a newspaper, which ended with this intimation, "Not to be repeated," exclaimed, "Hush! my dear sirs, that must be a great secret!"

ANECDOTES OF DOGS.

Many stories of the sagacity, &c. of dogs, are new, and illustrative of the extraordinary character of that animal, improved as it has been by its companionship with man. We copy two or three examples.

"In London, within these few years, the use of dogs in dragging light vehicles has become very general; and though their strength is rarely employed in combination, as is the case with the Esquimaux sledge dogs, their energy makes them capable of moving very considerable weights. There is scarcely a baker, in the more populous parts of London, who has not his travelling shop upon wheels, drawn by one or two stout mastiffs or bull-dogs. But the venders of cats' meat appear to have derived the largest benefit from this application of animal power. The passenger through the narrow streets and lanes of London, is often amused by the scenes between the consumers of the commodity and those who bring it to the houses. At the well-known cry of the dealer, all the cats of a whole district are in activity, anxiously peeping out of the doors for the expected meal, and sometimes fearlessly approaching the little cart without apprehension of their supposed enemy who draws it. The dogs attached to those carts appear to have no disposition to molest the impatient groups of cats who gather around them. The habit of considering dogs and cats as natural enemies, has tended to the production of a great deal of cruelty. It is true that dogs will, by instinct, pursue any thing which flies from them; and puppies will thus run after, and frequently kill chickens. But dogs, by chastisement, may be made to comprehend that nothing domestic must be molested. Beckford, a writer on hunting, alludes to the circumstance of buckhounds playing with deer on a lawn, within an hour or two after a chase of the same species. There is, at present, a tame doe in the streets of London, belonging to some person near St. Clement's church-yard, which the passing dogs never affront; and we have seen, some years ago, at Goodwood, the seat of the duke of Richmond, a pack of foxhounds, on their way to cover, go close to a fox chained at the outer gate of their kennel, without taking the slightest notice of him. This, at any rate, shows that dogs have their instincts under subjection to the commands of their friend and master, man.

"All dogs can swim, although some dislike the water, and take to it with difficulty, at the bidding of their masters. The bull-dog would appear the least likely to combat with a heavy sea, as the Newfoundland dogs often do; and yet the following circumstance is well authenticated: On board a ship, which struck upon a rock near the shore during a gale, there were three dogs, two of the Newfoundland variety, and an English bull-dog, rather small in growth, but very firmly built, and strong. It was important to have a rope carried ashore; and as no boat could live for an instant in the breakers towards the land, it was thought that one of the Newfoundland dogs might succeed; but he was not able to struggle with the waves, and perished. The other Newfoundland dog, upon being thrown overboard with the rope, shared a similar fate. But the bull-dog, though not habituated to the water, swam triumphantly to land, and thus saved the lives of the persons on board. Among them was his master, a military officer, who still has the dog in his possession.

"Many of the inferior animals have a distinct knowledge of time. The sun appears to regulate the motions of those which leave their homes in the morning, to return at particular hours of the evening. The Kamtschatka dogs are probably influenced in their autumnal return to their homes, by a change of temperature. But in those animals possessing the readiest conceptions, as in the case of dogs in a highly civilized country, the exercise of this faculty is strikingly remarkable. Mr. Southey, in his Omniana, relates two instances of dogs who had acquired such a knowledge of time as would enable them to count the days of the week. He says, "My grandfather had one which trudged two miles every Saturday, to cater for himself in the shambles. I know another more extraordinary and well authenticated example. A dog which had belonged to an Irishman, and was sold by him in England, would never touch a morsel of food upon Friday." The same faculty of recollecting intervals of time exists, though in a more limited extent, in the horse. We knew a horse—and have witnessed the circumstance—which, being accustomed to be employed once a week on a journey with the newsman of a provincial paper, always stopped at the houses of the several customers, although they were sixty or seventy in number. But further, there were two persons on the route who took one paper between them, and each claimed the privilege of having it first on the alternate Sunday. The horse soon became accustomed to this regulation; and, although the parties lived two miles distant, he stopped once a fortnight at the door of the half-customer at Thorpe, and once a fortnight at that of the other half-customer at Chertsey, and never did he forget this arrangement, which lasted several years, or stop unnecessarily when he once thoroughly understood the rule.

"Dr. Gall says, that dogs 'learn to understand not merely separate words, or articulate sounds, but whole sentences expressing many ideas.' Dr. Elliotson, the learned translator of Blumenbach's Physiology, quotes the following passage from Gall's treatise sur les Fonctions du Cerveau, without expressing any doubt of the circumstance: 'I have often spoken intentionally of objects which might interest my dog, taking care not to mention his name, or make any intonation or gesture which might awaken his attention. He, however, showed no less pleasure or sorrow, as it might be; and, indeed, manifested by his behaviour that he had perfectly understood the conversation which concerned him. I had taken a bitch from Vienna to Paris: in a very short time she comprehended French as well as German, of which I satisfied myself by repeating before her whole sentences in both languages. We have heard an instance of this quickness in the comprehension of language which is very remarkable. A mongrel, between the shepherd's dog and terrier, a great favourite in a farm-house, was standing by while his mistress was washing some of her children. Upon asking a boy whom she had just dressed, to bring his sister's clothes from the next room, he pouted and hesitated. 'Oh, then,' said the mother, 'Mungo will fetch them.' She said this by way of reproach to the boy, for Mungo had not been accustomed to fetch and carry. But Mungo was intelligent and obedient, and without further command he brought the child's frock to his astonished mistress. This was an effort of imagination in Mungo, which dogs certainly possess in an eminent degree. He had often observed, doubtless, the business of dressing the children; and the instant he was appealed to, he imagined what his mistress wanted. Every one knows the anxiety which dogs feel to go out with their masters, if they have been accustomed so to do. A dog will often anticipate the journey of his owner; and guessing the road he means to take, steal away to a considerable distance on that road, to avoid being detained at home. We have repeatedly seen this circumstance. It is distinctly an effort of the imagination, if, indeed, it be not an inference of reasoning.

"Linnæus has made it a characteristic of dogs, that 'they bark at beggars;' but beggars are ragged, and sometimes have that look of wildness which squalid poverty produces; and then the imagination of the dog sees, in the poor mendicant, a robber of his master's house, or one who will be cruel to himself—and he expresses his own fears by a bark. A dog is thus valuable for watching property in proportion to the ease with which he is alarmed. One of the greatest terrors of a domesticated dog is a naked man, because this is an unaccustomed object. The sense of fear is said to be so great in this situation, that the fiercest dog will not even bark. A tan-yard at Kilmarnock, in Ayrshire, was, a few years ago, extensively robbed by a thief, who took this method to overcome the courage of a powerful Newfoundland dog, who had long protected a considerable property. The terror which the dog felt at the naked thief was altogether imaginary—for the naked man was less capable of resisting the attack of the dog than if he had been clothed. But then the dog had no support in his experience. His memory of the past did not come to the aid of that faculty which saw an unknown danger in the future. The faculties of quadrupeds, like those of men, are of course mixed in their operation. The dog, who watches by his master's grave, and is not tempted away by the caresses of the living, employs both his memory and his imagination in this act of affection. In the year 1827, there was a dog constantly to be seen in St. Bride's church-yard, Fleet-street, which for two years had refused to leave the place where his master was buried. He did not appear miserable; he evidently recollected their old companionship, and he imagined that their friendship would again be renewed. The inhabitants of the houses round the church daily fed the poor creature, and the sexton built him a little kennel. But he would never quit the spot—and there he died."

STANZAS.

'Tis spring—the early leaves and buds
Are bursting into verdure now;
A chant is heard, of shouting floods—
Of joyous birds on many a bough:
The earth seems kindled with delight;
A hallowed azure decks the sky;
All things are eloquent and bright,
As if a festival were nigh.

And at this hour, when nature wears
A softened and a winning smile,
And every soul in being shares
The dreams that can the heart beguile;
I turn me from the verdant bough,
From the young blossoms of the tree,
To hours when joy lit up my brow,
And life was happiness to me.

I turn in memory to that hour
When first my bosom burned with love,
Ere death had snatched the brightest flower
Earth ever bore to heaven above;
Ere yet the pall had spread its fold
Above that blue and folded eye,
As the dark cloud, in storm, is rolled
Above the chambers of the sky.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

London, April 16, 1839.

MY DEAR M.—In my first letter I told you that if you persisted in letting the stream of my correspondence loose, there was no telling how long, or how fast, it might run; and you already see the verification of my intelligence; for that letter was dated the tenth, or ninth, or eleventh, if I remember rightly, and now, upon this sixteenth day of April, in the year of grace 1839, I am inditing another attack upon your sensibilities. It is by no means established in the decrees of fate, that I shall not be guilty of another, to-morrow. My recollection of the contents of that first epistle is not the most distinct; but it is, nevertheless, borne upon my mind, that, among other things, I did hint to you that, in my next, I should probably have something to say upon the subject of the catholic relief bill, which was then the prevailing lion of the day; and which, I gave you to understand, was rapidly approaching its foredoomed consummation in the house of lords. Last night the finishing touch was given by an affirmative vote in the house of lords—or “upper house,” as it is denominated here—of something more than a hundred majority; a fact, of which you will probably be cognizant before this letter reaches you. The only wonderful thing to me in all this is, the amazing energy that has been exerted by the opponents of emancipation, in throwing obstacles in the duke's way, knowing, as they must have done, that all their toil would be of no avail. For my own part, I have never had a moment's doubt of the ultimate passage of the bill. Wellington is one of those remarkable men of whom it is difficult to say whether their success is most owing to fortune or their own sagacity and talents. You may safely say of him, that he will never undertake any enterprise of moment without having the certain means of its accomplishment within his grasp; and it should seem that he had entered into a compact with destiny, and bargained for the fulfilment of all his undertakings. I wish you could see him, for he is a remarkable man to the eye, as well as to the imagination and understanding. But the very thing for which he is so remarkable, is the entire absence of any thing peculiar or frappant in his exterior organization. Of all the plain unpretending personages who constitute that rare show of fancy to us republicans, who come into the world and are nurtured in the firm persuasion that a lord must have something grand about him by nature, to distinguish him from the common herd, perhaps there is not one upon whom the eye of a stranger would be so unlikely to rest, or in whom his curious glance would detect a lion. In stature he is rather small, or, to speak perhaps more correctly, middle-sized; thin and light, having no superfluous flesh or fat to obstruct his movements; with a meagre face, rather dull gray eyes, and a very prominent aquiline nose. The predominating expression of his physiognomy—at least to me—is always that of mildness, with a slight dash of indolence, that yet is not exactly indolence, but rather what the French word insouciance more accurately conveys. In short, he has much the look of a quiet, peaceable, country gentleman, addicted rather to meditative than active pursuits, and filling very reputably the unimportant station of a mere good citizen. His dress is always plain, and generally consists of a blue frock coat, black pantaloons, and very nicely polished boots, white waistcoat and cravat, and neatly-brushed hat. I have seen him but once in regimentals, and then he wore the gorgeous habiliments of a field-marshal. There is one peculiarity about him that is worth noticing. His dress has always that exquisite fitness of look, which I do not know how to express in any better fashion than by saying that the individual suit which he has on at any given moment, always seems to suit his person best—to be the neatest costume in which it is possible for him to array himself. This you may, perhaps, be disposed to think the consequence of his having a good tailor; but although I am fully aware of the wonderful effect to be produced in a man's character, as well as his costume, by the possession of so supreme a blessing, yet I cannot suffer you to remain the slave of that great error; for I am assured that the feature in the duke's history which I have just pointed out to you, has been always observable; and you are, of course, aware of the utter impossibility of any man's having a good tailor all his life—to say nothing of foreign schneiders, French, Russian, Belgian and Italian, each of whose manufacture his grace has worn, and always with the same becoming effect. But I may as well be candid with you at once, and save myself the trouble of writing half a letter to persuade you of a certain fact, when proof positive is within my reach, and may be brought to bear upon you in half-a-dozen lines—know, then, that, smitten with the exquisite look of fitness which struck me as appertaining to a very beautiful blue frock upon the shoulders of his grace, and secretly lamenting, as I ever have, and ever must—unhappy that I am—the slouching, awkward, bag-like air with which the most perfect specimens of sartorial art surround, but not adorn my unfortunate person, I ascertained the name and residence of his “undertaker”—the fashionable epithet at present for a tailor—and solicited his good offices in my behalf; he promised to employ his utmost skill and science, and I have no doubt that he kept his word; yet did the article assume a hang-dog look, far different from the neat and exquisite appropriateness of the duke's unrivalled togger. I suppose your sage remark upon all this will be, that the duke is a well, and I am ill made man—perhaps that is the amount of my long dissertation—but let us change the subject. As you are a literary man, I suppose you take some little interest in the doings of the swarms of writing people who actually characterize the present age. The last month gave birth to some dozens of new novels, but nothing has produced a sensation since the coming of “Pelham” and the “Disowned.” Mr. Grattan has just brought out another trio of volumes, entitled “Traits of Travel, or Tales of Men and Cities.” I cannot say that I have read them, but I have looked at them, and think them quite equal to his “Highways and By-ways.” Grattan is a clever man, and would be a superior writer, if he could but cure himself of his verbosity, and infuse a little more of the vis viva of Hook or Croker in his narratives. He is making money by his books, at least so they—that is every body in general, and nobody in particular—pretend. Next to these tales, we, in this critical metropolis, rank Mr. St. Leger's “Tales of Passion,” which I suppose you have either had already, or soon will have: they are written with much power, and some originality. After these come the “Chelsea Pensioners,” by Mr. Greig, and then an indiscriminate swarm of most dull duodecimos, whose only quality is mediocrity, that thing “abhorred of gods and men.” “Yesterday in Ireland,” “Tales of Military life,” “Tales of a Voyager to the Arctic Ocean,” the “Carbonaro,” the “Naval Officer,” “Restalrig, or the Forfeiture,” which might, perhaps, be promoted to a more honourable station, were it not for its too servile imitation of an author whose writings are too familiar to every class of readers, to admit of even an attempt at imitation without immediate detection; “Something new on Men and Manners,” which unfortunately contains nothing either new or entertaining, and many more of about equal pretensions, foredoomed to a quick and not unmerited oblivion. Meantime, the all-devouring public is comforted with the promise of an approaching Waverley, which we expect with lively interest; and the rumour of another gem from Mr. Bulwer, author of “Pelham” and the “Disowned.”

But it is time for me to close this rambling missive, for, although not exhausted—of matériel, I mean—I am sufficiently weary. So, fare you well.

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM A LATE LONDON PERIODICAL WORK.

THOUGHTS ON THE WORDS TURN OUT.

“We all in our turns turn out!”

TURN OUT! There are in the English language no two words which act so forcibly in exciting sympathy and compassion. There is in them a melancholy cadence, beautifully corresponding with the sadness of the idea which they express: they awaken, in a moment, the tenderest recollections, and the most anxious forebodings: there is in them a talismanic charm which influences alike all ages and all dispositions; the church, the bar, and the senate, are all comprised in the range of its operation: indeed, we believe that in no profession, in no rank of life, we shall find the man who can meditate, without an inward feeling of mental depression, on the simple, the unstudied, the unaffected pathos of the words “turn out.”

Is it not extraordinary, that when the idea is, in itself, so tragic, and gives birth to such sombre sensations, Melpomene should have altogether neglected the illustration of it? Is it not still more extraordinary that her sportive sister Thalia should have dared indecorously to jest with a subject so entirely unsuited to her pen? To take our meaning from its veil of metaphor, is it not extraordinary that Mr. Kenney should have written a farce on the words “turn out?” We regard Mr. Kenney's farce as a sacrilege, a profanation, a burlesque of the best feelings of our nature; and in spite of the ingenuity of the writer and the talents of the performers, humanity, and its attendant prejudices, revolt in disgust from the scene which endeavours to raise a laugh by a parody of so melancholy a topic.

It is not difficult to account for the pensive feelings which are excited by these words: they recall forcibly to our mind the uncertainty of all human concerns; they bid us think on the sad truth, that from power, from affluence, from happiness, we may be “turned out” at a minute's warning; they whisper to us that the lease of life is held on a precarious tenure, subject to the will of a Providence which we can neither control nor foresee; they oblige us to look forward to that undiscovered country, from whose dark limits we would fain avert our eyes; they convince us of the truth of the desponding expression, “Man is but a thing of nought, his time passeth away like a shadow.”

Are not these the reflections of every thinking mind? If they are not, we must entreat the indulgence of our readers for the melancholy pleasure we take in the discussion of the subject. The words may indeed be more than ordinarily affecting to us, inasmuch as they remind us of a friend who, in his life, was “turned out” from every thing that life can bestow, but who, in his death, shall never be “turned out” from that consolatory tribute to his manes—the recollection of a sincere friend. Poor Gilbert! the occurrences of his eventful existence would indeed furnish materials for the poet or the moralist, for a tragedy of five acts, or a homily of fifty heads. His father always prophesied he would turn out a great man; and yet the poor fellow did nothing but turn out, and never became a great man. At fourteen he turned out with a bargeman, and lost an eye; at seventeen he was turned out from college, and lost an education; at three-and-twenty he was turned out of his father's will, and lost a thousand a-year; at four-and-twenty he was turned out of a tandem, and lost the long odds; at five-and-twenty he was turned out of a place, and lost all patience; at six-and-twenty he was turned out of the affections of his mistress, and lost his last hope; at seven-and-twenty he was turned out of a gaming-house, where he lost his last farthing. Gilbert died about a year ago, after existing for some time in a miserable state of dependence upon a rich uncle. To the last, he was fond of narrating to his friends the vicissitudes of his life, which he constantly concluded in the following manner: “So, gentlemen, I have been turning out during my whole life; you now see me on the brink of the grave, and I don't care how soon I turn in.”

We had not heard from him for a considerable space of time, and were beginning to wonder at his protracted silence, when a friend, who was studying the newspaper, apprised us of his decease by the following exclamation—“Oh, heavens! old Gilbert's dead! here's a quaint turn out!”

Alas! how often does it happen that we are not aware of the value of the blessings we enjoy, until chance or destiny has taken them from us. This has been the case in our acquaintance with our lamented companion. How bitterly do we now regret that we did not, while his life was spared, make use of his inestimable experience to collect some instructions on the art of turning out, both in the active and the neuter signification of the words. For surely no two things are more difficult, than the giving or receiving of a dismissal. To go through the one with civility, and the other with firmness, is indeed a rare talent, which every man of the world should study to attain.

When we consider the various chances and vicissitudes which await the citizens of our little commonwealth in their progress through life; when we recollect that some of them will enter into political life, in order to be turned out of their places; others will enjoy the titular distinction of M. P. that they may be turned out of their seats the next election; while others again, by an attachment to chancery expedition, will endeavour to get turned out of their estates; it is surely worth while to bestow a little attention upon the most proper mode of behaving under these unfortunate circumstances.

Mr. Monxton receives a turn out better than any political man of our acquaintance. It was of him that Sir Andrew Freeman, a Hertfordshire independent, who, to do him justice, would be witty if he could, broached the celebrated remark, "He has turned out so often, that I should think he's turned wrong side out by this time." Mr. Monxton is indeed a phenomenon in his way. The smile he wears on coming into office differs in no respect from that which he assumes on resigning all his employments. He departs from the enjoyment of place and power, not with the gravity of a disappointed minister, but with the self-satisfied air of a successful courtier. The tact with which he conceals the inward vexation of spirit beneath an outward serenity of countenance, is to us a matter of astonishment. When we have heard him discussing his resignation with a simper on his face and a jest on his lip, we have often fancied that Mr. Kemble would appear to us in the same light, were he to deliver Wolsey's soliloquy with the attitudes and the gestures of a harlequin in a pantomime. Juvenile politicians cannot propose to themselves, in this line of their profession, a better model than Mr. Monxton.

Nor is this art less worthy the attention of the fair sex. There are very few ladies who have the talent of dismissing a lover in proper style. There are many who reject with so authoritative a demeanour, that they lose him as an acquaintance, whom they only wish to cast off as a danger; there are many again who study civility to such an extent, that we know not whether they reject or receive, and have no small difficulty in distinguishing their smile from their frown. The deep and sincere interest which we feel in all matters relating to the advantage or improvement of the fair sex, induces us to suggest that an academy, or a seminary, or an establishment, should be forthwith instituted for the instruction of young ladies, not exceeding thirty years of age, in the most approved method of saying "Turn out." So far, indeed, has our zeal in this laudable undertaking carried us, that we have actually communicated our ideas upon the subject to a lady, who, to quote from her own advertisement, "enjoys the advantages of an excellent education, an unblemished character, and an amiable disposition." We are happy to inform our friends, and the public in general, that Mrs. Simkins has promised to devote her attention to this branch of female education. By the end of next month, she hopes to be quite competent to the instruction of pupils in every mode of expressing "turn out"—the distant hint—the silent bow—the positive cut—the courteous repulse—and the absolute rejection. We trust that due encouragement will be given to a scheme of such general utility.

In the meantime, until such academy, or seminary, or establishment shall be opened, we invite our fair readers to the study of an excellent model in the person of Caroline Mowbray. Caroline has now seven-and-twenty lovers, all of whom have successively been in favour, and have been successively turned out. Yet so skillfully has she modified her severity, that in most cases she has destroyed hope without extinguishing love: the victims of her caprice continue her slaves, and are proud of her hand in the dance, although they despair of obtaining it at the altar. The twenty-seventh name was added to the list of her admirers last week, and was—with the most heartfelt regret we state it—no less a personage than the Hon. Gerard Montgomery. Alas, unfortunate Gerard!

"Quanta laboras in Charybdi,
"Digne puer meliore damna."

He had entertained us for some time with accounts of the preference with which he was honoured by this miracle of obduracy, and at last, by dint of long and earnest entreaty, prevailed upon us to be ourselves witness to the power he had obtained over her affections. We set out, therefore, not without a considerable suspicion of the manner in which our expedition would terminate, and inwardly anticipated the jests which would infallibly occur upon the subject of Gerard's "turn out."

Nothing occurred of any importance during our ride: Gerard talked much of Cupid and Hymen; but inasmuch as we were not partakers of his passion, we could not reasonably be expected to partake of his inspiration.

Upon our arrival at Mowbray lodge, we were shown into a room so crowded with company that we almost fancied we had been ushered into the earl's levee, instead of his daughter's drawing-room. The eye of a lover, however, was more keen. Gerard soon perceived the goddess of the shrine receiving the incense of adulation from a crowd of votaries. Amongst these he immediately enrolled himself, while we, apprehensive that our company might be troublesome to him, hung back, and became imperceptibly engaged in conversation with some gentlemen of our acquaintance. To speak the truth, on our way to "the lodge," these "thoughts on turn out" had been the subject of our reveries, and whatever expressions or opinions we heard around us, appeared to coincide with the cogitations with which we were occupied. We first became much interested in the laments of an old gentleman, who was bewailing the "turn out" of a friend at the last election for the county of —. Next we listened to an episode from a dandy, who was discussing the extraordinary coat "turned out" by Mr. — at the last ball. Finally, we were engaged in a desperate argument with a Wiccamist, upon the degree of talent "turned out" from each of the public schools during the last ten years. Of course, we proceeded to advocate the cause of our foster-mother, against the pretensions of our numerous and illustrious rivals. Alas! we felt our unworthiness to stand forward as Eton's panegyrist, but we made up in enthusiasm what we wanted in ability. We ran over with volubility the names of those thrice-honoured models, whose deserved success is constantly the theme of applause, and the life-spring of emulation among their successors. We had just brought our catalogue down to the names of our more immediate forerunners, and were dwelling with much complacency on the abilities which have, during the last few years, so nobly supported the fair fame of Eton at the universities, when our eye was caught by the countenance of our honourable friend, which, at this moment, wore an appearance of such unusual despondence, that we hastened immediately to investigate the cause. Upon inquiry, we learned that Montgomery was most romantically displeased, because Caroline had refused to sing an air of which he was passionately fond. We found we had just arrived in time for the finale of the dispute. "And so you can't sing this, to oblige me?" said Gerard. Caroline looked refusal. "I shall know better than to expect such a condescension again," said Gerard with a low sigh. "Tant mieux!" said Caroline, with a low courtesy. The audience were unanimous in an unfeeling laugh, in the midst of which Gerard made a precipitate retreat, or, as O'Connor expresses it, "ran away like mad," and we followed him as well as we could, though certainly not "passibus æquis." As we moved to the door, we could hear sundry criticisms on the scene. "Articles of ejection!" said a limb of the law. "The favourite distanced!" cried a Newmarket squire. "I did not think the breach practicable!" observed a gentleman in regimentals. We overtook the unfortunate object of all these comments about a hundred yards from the house. His wo-begone countenance might well have stopped our malicious disposition to jocularity; nevertheless, we could not refrain from whispering in his ear, "Gerard, a decided turn out!" "I beg your pardon," said the poor fellow, mingling a smile for his pun with a tear for his disappointment, "I beg your pardon—I consider it a decided take in."

ON SPENDING TIME.—The celebrated Lord Coke wrote the subjoined distich, which he religiously observed in the distribution of his time:

Six hours to sleep—to law's grave study six—
Four spend in prayer—the rest to nature fix.

But Sir William Jones, a wiser economist of the fleeting hours of life, amended the sentiment as follows:

Seven hours to law—to soothing slumber seven—
Ten to the world allot—and all to heaven.

THE CASKET.

THE FLORENTINE LOVERS.

BY LEIGH HUNT.

IN THREE PARTS.—PART III.

IPPOLITO had noticed a ladder of ropes which was used in his father's house for some domestic purposes: to say the truth, it was an old servant, and had formerly been much in request for the purpose to which it was now about to be turned by the old gentleman himself. He was indeed a person of a truly orthodox description, having been much given to hair-breadth escapes in his younger days, being consigned over to avarice in his older, and exhibiting great submission to every thing established, always. Accordingly, he was considered as a personage equally respectable for his virtues, as important from his rank and connexions; and if hundreds of ladders could have risen up in judgment against him, they would only have been considered as what are called in England "wild oats;"—wild ladders, which it was natural for every gentleman to plant.

Ippolito's character, however, being more principled, his privileges were not the same; and on every account he was obliged to take great care. He waited with impatience till midnight, and then letting himself out of his window, and taking the ropes under his cloak, made the best of his way to a little dark lane which bordered the house of the Bardi. One of the windows of the great hall looked into the lane, the others into the garden. The house stood in a remote part of the city. Ippolito listened to the diminishing sound of the guitars and revellers in the distance, and was proceeding to inform Dianora of his arrival, by throwing up some pebbles, when he heard a noise coming. It was some young men taking a circuit of the more solitary streets, to purify them, as they said, from sobriety. Ippolito slunk into a corner. He was afraid, as the sound opened upon his ears, that they would turn down the lane; but the hubbub passed on. He stepped forth from his corner, and again retreated. Two young men, loiterers behind the rest, disputed whether they should go down the lane. One, who seemed intoxicated, swore he would serenade "the little foe," as he called her, if it was only to vex the old one, and "bring him out with his cursed long sword." "And a lecture twice as long," said the other. "Ah, there you have me," quoth the musician; "his sword is—a sword; but his lecture's the devil; reaches the other side of the river—never stops till it strikes one sleepy. But I must serenade." "No, no," returned his friend; "remember what the grand prior said, and don't let us commit ourselves in a petty brawl. We'll have it out of their hearts some day." Ippolito shuddered to hear such words, even from one of his own party. "Don't tell me," said the pertinacious drunken man; "I remember what the grand prior said. He said, I must serenade; no, he didn't say I must serenade—but I say it; the grand prior said, says he—I remember it as if it was yesterday—he said—gentlemen, said he, there are three good things in the world, love, music, and fighting; and then he said a cursed number of other things by no means good; and all to prove, philosophically, you rogue, that love was good, and music was good, and fighting was good, philosophically, and in a cursed number of paragraphs. So I must serenade." "False logic, Vanni," cried the other; "so come along, or we shall have the enemy upon us in a heap; for I hear another party coming, and I am sure they are none of ours." "Good again," said the musician; "love and fighting, my boy, and music; so I'll have my song before they come up." And the fellow began roaring out one of the most indecent songs he could think of, which made our lover ready to start forth and dash the guitar in his face; but he repressed himself. In a minute he heard the other party come up. A clashing of swords ensued, and to his great relief the drunkard and his companion were driven on. In a minute or two all was silent. Ippolito gave the signal—it was acknowledged; the rope was fixed, and the lover was about to ascend, when he was startled with a strange diminutive face, smiling at him over a light. His next sensation was to smile at the state of his own nerves; for it was but a few minutes before, that he was regretting he could not put out a lantern that stood burning under a little image of the Virgin. He crossed himself, offered up a prayer for the success of his true love, and again proceeded to mount the ladder. Just as his hand reached the window, he thought he heard other steps. He looked down toward the street. Two figures evidently stood at the corner of the lane. He would have concluded them to be the two men returned, but for their profound silence. At last one of them said out loud, "I am certain I saw a shadow of somebody by the lantern; and now you find we have not come back for nothing. Who's there?" added he, coming at the same time down the lane with his companion. Ippolito descended rapidly, intending to hide his face as much as possible in his hood and escape by dint of fighting, but his foot slipped in the ropes, and he was at the same instant seized by the strangers.

The instinct of a lover, who, above all things in the world, cared for the stainless reputation of her he adored, supplied our hero with an artifice as quick as lightning. "They are all safe," said he, affecting to tremble with a cowardly terror; "I have not touched one of them." "One of what?" said the others; "what are all safe?" "The jewels," replied Ippolito; "let me go, for the love of heaven, and it shall be my last offence, as it was my first. Besides, I meant to restore them." "Restore them!" cried the first spokesman; "a pretty jest truly! This must be some gentleman gambler, by his fine would-be conscience; and by this light we will see who he is, if it is only for your sake, Filippo, eh?" for his companion was a pretty notorious gambler himself, and Ippolito had kept cringing in the dark. "Curse it," said Filippo, "never mind the fellow; he is not worth our while in these stirring times, though I warrant he has cheated me often enough." To say the truth, Messer Filippo was not a little afraid the thief would turn out to be some inexperienced desperado, whom he had cheated himself, and perhaps driven to this very crime; but his companion was resolute, and Ippolito finding it impossible to avoid his fate, came forward into the light. "By all the saints in the calendar," exclaimed the enemy, "a Buondelmonte! and no less a Buondelmonte than the worthy and very magnificent Messer Ippolito Buondelmonte!—Messer Ippolito, I kiss your hands; I am very much your humble servant and thief-taker. By my faith, this will be fine news for to-morrow."

To-morrow was indeed a heavy day to all the Buondelmonti, and as merry a one to all the Bardi, except poor Dianora. She knew not what had prevented Ippolito from finishing his ascent up the ladder; some interruption it must have been, but of what nature, she could not determine, nor why he had not resumed his endeavours. It could have been nothing common. Was he known? Was she known? Was it all known? And the poor girl tormented herself with a thousand fears. Madonna Lucrezia hastened to her the first thing in the morning, with a full, true, and particular account. Ippolito d' Buondelmonte had been seized, in coming down a rope-ladder from one of the front windows of the house, with a great drawn sword in one hand and a box of jewels in the other. Dianora saw the whole truth in a moment, and from excess of sorrow, gratitude, and love, fainted away. Madonna Lucrezia guessed the truth too, but was almost afraid to confess it to her own mind, much more to speak of it aloud; and had not the news, and the bustle, and her niece's fainting, furnished her with something to do, she could have fainted herself very heartily, out of pure consternation. Gossip Veronica was in a worse condition when the news reached her; and Ippolito's mother, who guessed but too truly as well as the others, was seized with an illness, which joining with the natural weakness of her constitution, threw her into a stupor, and prevented her from attending to any thing. The next step of Madonna Lucrezia, after seeing Dianora out of her fainting fit, and giving the household to understand that the story of the robber had alarmed her, was to go to Gossip Veronica and concert measures of concealment. The two women wept very sincerely for the poor youth, and admired his heroism in saving his mistress from suspicion; but, with all their good-nature, they agreed that he was quite in the right, and that it would be but just to his magnanimity, and to their poor dear Dianora, to keep the secret as closely. Madonna Lucrezia then returned home, to be near Dianora, and help to baffle inquiry; while Gossip Veronica kept close in doors, too ill to see visitors, and alternately praying to the saint her namesake, and taking reasonable draughts of Montepulciano.

In those days there were too many wild young men of desperate fortunes to render Ippolito's confession improbable. Besides, he had been observed of late to be always without money; reports of his being addicted to gambling had arisen; and his father was avaricious. Lastly, his groaning in the church was remembered, under pretence of piety; and the magistrate—who was of the hostile party—concluded, with much sorrow, that he must have more sins to answer for than they knew of, which in so young a man was deplorable. The old gentleman had too much reason to know, that in elder persons it would have been nothing remarkable.

Ippolito, with a grief of heart which only served to confirm the by-standers in their sense of his guilt, waited in expectation of his sentence. He thought it would be banishment, and was casting in his mind how he could hope some day or other to get a sight of his mistress, when the word death fell on him like a thunderbolt. The origin of a sentence so severe was but too plain to every body; but the Bardi were uppermost that day; and the city, exhausted by some late party excesses, had but too much need of repose. Still it was thought a dangerous trial of the public pulse. The pity felt for the tender age of Ippolito was increased by the anguish which he found himself unable to repress. "Good heaven!" cried he, "must I die so young? And must I never see—must I never see the light again, and Florence, and my dear friends?" And he fell into almost abject intreaties to be spared; for he thought of Dianora. But the bystanders fancied that he was merely afraid of death; and by the help of suggestions from the Bardi partisans, their pity almost turned into contempt. He prostrated himself at the magistrate's feet; he kissed his knees; he disgusted his own father; till finding every thing against him, and smitten at once with a sense of his cowardly appearance and the necessity of keeping his mistress's secret inviolable, he declared his readiness to die like a man, and at the same time stood wringing his hands, and weeping like an infant. He was sentenced to die next day.

The day came. The hour came. The standard of justice was hoisted before the door of the tribunal, and the trumpet blew through the city, announcing the death of a criminal. Dianora, to whom the news had been gradually broken, heard it in her chamber, and would have burst forth and proclaimed the secret, but for Madonna Lucrezia, who spoke of her father, and mother, and all the Bardi, and the inutilty of attempting to save one of the opposite faction, and the dreadful consequences to every body if the secret were betrayed. Dianora heard little about every body; but the habit of respecting her father and mother, and dreading their reproaches, kept her, moment after moment, from doing any thing but listen and look pale; and, in the meantime, the procession began moving toward the scaffold.

Ippolito issued forth from the prison, looking more like a young martyr than a criminal. He was now perfectly quiet, and a sort of unnatural glow had risen into his cheeks, the result of the enthusiasm and conscious self-sacrifice into which he had worked himself during the night. He had only prayed, as a last favour, that he might be taken through the street in which the house of the Bardi stood; for he had lived, he said, as every body knew, in great hostility with that family, and he now felt none any longer, and wished to bless the house as he passed it. The magistrate, for more reasons than one, had no objection; the old confessor, with tears in his eyes, said that the dear boy would still be an honour to his family, as surely as he would be a saint in heaven; and the procession moved on. The main feeling of the crowd, as usual, was that of curiosity, but there were few, indeed, in whom it was not mixed with pity; and many females found the sight so intolerable, that they were seen coming away down the streets, weeping bitterly, and unable to answer the questions of those they met.

The procession now began to pass the house of the Bardi. Ippolito's face, for an instant, turned of a chalky whiteness, and then resumed its colour. His lips trembled, his eyes filled with tears; and thinking his mistress might possibly be at the window, taking a last look of the lover that died for her, he bowed his head gently, at the same time forcing a smile, which glittered through his watery eyes. At that instant the trumpet blew its dreary blast for the second time. Dianora had already risen on her couch, listening, and asking what noise it was that approached. Her aunt endeavoured to quiet her with her excuses; but this last noise aroused her beyond control; and the good old lady, forgetting herself in the condition of the two lovers, no longer attempted to stop her. "Go," said she, "in God's name, my child, and heaven be with you."

Dianora, her hair streaming, her eye without a tear, her cheek on fire, burst, to the astonishment of her kindred, into the room where they were all standing. She tore them aside from one of the windows with a preternatural strength, and, stretching forth her head and hands, like one inspired, cried out, "Stop! stop! it is my Ippolito! my husband!" And, so saying, she actually made a movement as if she would have stepped to him out of the window; for every thing but his image faded from her eyes. A movement of confusion took place among the multitude. Ippolito stood rapt on the sudden, trembling, weeping, and stretching his hands toward the window, as if praying to his guardian angel. The kinsmen would have prevented her from doing any thing further; but, as if all the gentleness of her character was gone, she broke from them with violence and contempt, and rushing down stairs into the street, exclaimed, in a frantic manner, "People! Dear God! Countrymen! I am a Bardi; he is a Buondelmonte; he loved me; we are married; and that is the whole crime!" and, at these last words, they were locked in each other's arms.

The populace now broke through all restraint. They stopped the procession; they bore Ippolito back again to the seat of the magistracy, carrying Dianora with him; they described in a peremptory manner the mistake; they sent for the heads of the two houses; they made them swear a treaty of peace, amity, and unity; and in half an hour after the lover had been on the road to his death, he set out upon it again, the acknowledged bridegroom of the beautiful creature by his side.

Never was such a sudden revulsion of feeling given to a whole city. The women, who had retreated in anguish, came back the gayest of the gay. Every body plucked all the myrtles they could find, to put into the hands of those who made the former procession, and who now formed a singular one for a bridal; but all the young women fell in with their white veils; and instead of the funeral dirge, a song of thanksgiving was chanted. The very excess of their sensations enabled the two lovers to hold up. Ippolito's cheeks, which seemed to have fallen away in one night, appeared to have plumped out again faster; and if he was now pale instead of high coloured, the paleness of Dianora had given way to radiant blushes, which made up for it. He looked—as he ought—like the person saved; she, like the angelic saviour.

Thus the two lovers passed on, as if in a dream, tumultuous but delightful. Neither of them looked on the other; they gazed hither and thither on the crowd, as if in answer to the blessings that poured upon them; but their hands were locked fast; and they went like one soul in a divided body.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

Memoir of De Witt Clinton.—The death of Mr. Clinton is a public misfortune, which all who reason upon human affairs may, without any affectation, deplore. His powerful and persevering talents, directed by the purest patriotism and philanthropy, have exercised an influence upon the character and prosperity of this state, which unborn millions will gratefully acknowledge; and those of the present age, who justly appreciate his benevolent and generous labours in the cause of his country, cannot but deeply lament that one so gifted in mind, so lofty and dignified in action, combining in so extraordinary a degree the energies and genius of the statesman with the fine and graceful sensibilities of the man, has gone from among us for ever. We are warm upon this subject, partly from admiration of his merited fame, as it will read in the pages of the future historian, but more from the memory of the endearing virtues which marked him the ornament and the blessing of private life, and which a personal acquaintance of several years afforded us many opportunities to discover. It has been the lot of Mr. Clinton to be involved in the tumults of party, and to be often the point where conflicting passions and interests met in all the rage of warfare. But his high destiny led him on over all obstacles, and thousands were looking forward to his advancement to the highest post in his country's gift, when they were shocked with the information that he was no more. The tempests which the busy fiends of politics had conjured around his path were hushed, as the grave closed upon his stately form, and all parties and all denominations, merging prejudice and passion in the general grief, assembled in lamentations upon the spot which his genius and virtues had consecrated alike to all mankind.

We hazard little in the assertion, that Mr. Clinton was one of the greatest men of this age; although, perhaps, in this age it may not be universally acknowledged. There may be those who now occupy more of the common notice.

The achievements of the conqueror place him more immediately within the reach of fame: his actions are easily seen and remembered; they appeal to the senses and the passions, the actual hopes and fears of man; they agitate the interests of every class, and sometimes rend asunder the social body with the violent convulsion of an earthquake. But the influence of the statesman is silent, gradual, and uniform; his labours are hidden from common observation, and their consequences come imperceptibly over the country, and are continued to remote periods of time. Intelligence, benevolence, philosophy, are his weapons. He overcomes obstacles invisible to other eyes—he accomplishes moral revolutions—he acts upon society as the gradual and gentle spring upon physical nature, that goes on with its sweet and imperceptible changes, while forgetful mortals are at rest, till the sterile prospect is all clothed with verdure. Such is the virtuous statesman—such was Clinton. With all his comprehensive genius and busy virtue, he is no more to be seen among the multitudes with whom he mingled, and for whom he laboured.

The memoir of such a man is always interesting. The mind clings with strange interest to the slightest actions and most unimportant occurrences of his life, no matter how, or by whom related. It is then, with pleasure, that we receive his biography from one whom intimate friendship and acknowledged talents render fully competent. The Memoir by Dr. Hosack, with a fine bust and admirably written life of Mr. Clinton, contains an immense mass of information, welcome to all interested in the progress of our national institutions. It is a quarto volume, of upwards of five hundred pages, from the press of J. Seymour, of this city, and is one of the neatest specimens of typography ever executed in this country. Of the work, as a composition, we have little to say which can add to the fame of its author. It is clearly and often eloquently written. The style is graceful and easy, and the compilation of letters, &c. in the appendix, seems to have been the result of considerable care and ingenuity. It cannot but prove very acceptable to the reader, and will tend to elevate our reputation abroad, where we presume it must be very extensively read. We cannot pay a higher compliment to the talents and industry of Dr. Hosack, than by expressing our opinion that he has done ample justice to his important undertaking; and that, however other biographies may hereafter appear, advancing new particulars, and produced under more advantageous circumstances, this volume will ever possess an intrinsic value which no subsequent event can diminish, and will always occupy an elevated rank in the esteem of the public. Productions of this kind are not often properly executed. They require talents, knowledge, and opportunity, seldom united, and are frequently attempted by those whom the mere desire of praise, or of gain, rather than any peculiar fitness in themselves, or enthusiasm in the cause of virtue, have urged to the undertaking. Dr. Hosack has acted with different feelings. His desire to perpetuate the virtues of his friend, gives to the work an energy, and an ardour, and a warmth of colouring, not found in the colder efforts of a mere disinterested observer; and his own solicitude for the prosperity of his countrymen, prompts him to hold forth, in a very able manner, those enlightened views which marked the career of his distinguished friend, and which have so materially contributed to the prosperity of the state. There is an inspiring pleasure in the thought, that while the mortal remains of the great and good are mouldering in the earth, their influence is yet abroad in the world, promoting the improvement and happiness of their fellow-men.

Death of the Hon. John Jay.—This illustrious patriot and exemplary Christian, after a life devoted to usefulness, honour, and glory, died at his seat, in Westchester county, on Sunday, the seventeenth instant, at the ripe age of eighty-four years.

The state of New-York has the honour of giving birth to this great man; and few have equally contributed to its prosperity, and to the elevation of its character. But his usefulness here was comparatively limited. His country was the theatre on which he made the exhibition of his splendid talents; and the history of the one must be that of the other. His was the powerful mind to comprehend empire, and to perceive all the relations of the parts to each other, and to make the just application of correct principles to the harmony, fidelity, and utility of the whole. His doctrines, as well political as moral, were of the purest kind; and no man ever united in his character, in a more exalted degree, the distinguishing qualities of rectitude, sublimity, and grandeur. The observation made by the senate of the United States, on General Washington, is no less applicable to Mr. Jay: "Favoured of heaven, he has departed without exhibiting the weakness of humanity."

On Monday, the eighteenth, after the receipt of intelligence of Mr. Jay's decease, Chief-justice Jones, on the opening of the superior court, rose and addressed the members of the bar in the following pathetic and beautiful terms:—

"Information has just been communicated to the judges of the court, of the death of the venerable John Jay. When we consider the distinguished stations in life which have been occupied by this excellent man, with so much honour to himself, and benefit to the public—while we remember the ability with which he discharged his duties, when called upon to represent his country in a diplomatic character—when we view him upon the bench of the supreme court of the United States, as the first chief-justice under the federal constitution, presiding with the most entire dignity, intelligence, and impartiality—and, above all, when we look upon his bright example as a man and a Christian, the first impulse of every generous and reflecting mind is, to regard his death with sorrow, and his memory with the deepest respect. Few men in any country, perhaps scarce one in this, have filled a larger space, and few ever passed through life with such perfect purity, integrity, and honour. No man can point to a stain on his character or conduct; no reproach can be attached to him in any of the high stations which he so eminently filled; and when we look back upon his career, we see nothing but brightness on his path.

"This great man, thus honoured, thus distinguished, thus lamented, has passed away from among us.

"On the day when this deep-felt loss is communicated to those who knew him well, and with whom to remember is but to honour him, it is suitable that the ordinary business of life should give place to considerations which are suggested by this melancholy event.

"The judges of this court, therefore, will not proceed to-day in the business for which they are assembled; but direct an adjournment until to-morrow."

At an adjourned meeting of the members of the bar, on the nineteenth, the following interesting report was read:

"The bar of the state of New-York, now attending the sitting of the supreme court, met pursuant to their adjournment.

"James Tallmadge, esq. chairman of the committee appointed this morning, reported the following preamble and resolutions, which were unanimously adopted:

"The committee respectfully report,

"That the recent decease of the late venerable JOHN JAY is the cause of deep grief, and the present engrossing subject of private and public feeling.

"John Jay was a native of our state, and a member of this bar. The events of the American revolution called him early into public life. His inherent love of political and religious liberty made him an early and active agent in laying the foundation of this nation; of which he soon became one of the firmest, and continued one of its fairest pillars. In 1777, he was appointed the first chief-justice of this state, under the constitution which he had eminently contributed to frame, and most of which was drafted by his pen. He was a member of the first congress of the United States, and bore a conspicuous part in all its important duties, and presided, for some time, over the deliberations of that body. The exigencies of this nation required and commanded his great talents, discretion, firmness, and skill, in various interesting and important duties during the revolutionary struggle. At times, as chairman of the committee of public safety, he secured the domestic tranquillity, and at other times he was employed in important foreign missions and diplomatic trusts. He bore a prominent part in the negotiations for our independence as a nation, and the ultimate treaty of peace. He continued to represent his country at foreign courts for a number of years. He was, shortly after his return, called to preside as chief-justice of the supreme court of the United States, which place he afterwards left to accept the executive chair of the state of New-York. When he had performed that last and highest duty to his native state, he declined all further judicial or political employment, and retired to the calm shade of domestic retreat, where the evening of his days was spent in social and benevolent intercourse, and in the signal observance of that religion which had been the bright beam of the morning and the evening of his life; the rights and toleration of which he had secured to this people in one of the most important articles of our constitution.

"There is no place more fit, and no persons are more willing to express their sincere feelings on this occasion, than this bar, where the talents and acquirements of the deceased were so early and so often displayed. Therefore,

"Resolved, That the members of this bar are impressed with deep grief upon the decease of their illustrious brother, John Jay. They find, however, a consolation in the reflection that his conduct, through a long and useful life, has given a lustre to our profession, and to this bar; and that while his character for private virtues and public worth justly endeared him to the nation, his patriotism, his great talents as a statesman, and his great acquirements as a jurist—his eminent piety as a Christian, and probity as a man, all unite to present him to the public as an example whose radiance points to the attainment of excellence.

"Resolved, That the chairman and secretary are desired to transmit a copy of the proceedings of this meeting to the family of the deceased.

"Resolved, That the proceedings be signed by the chairman, and published in the different papers of this city.

D. B. OGDEN, Chairman."

Traits of Travel.—We have read these volumes of Mr. Grattan with great satisfaction. A considerable interval has elapsed since the appearance of the last series of "Highways and Byways," for which these Traits of Travel have furnished ample compensation. The stories are all short and extremely interesting; they are the result of desultory ramblings in various lands, and abound with pleasing incident, graphic description, and admirable portraiture of character, national as well as individual. We follow the writer pleasantly in his desultory wanderings, certain of gathering a rich harvest of instruction and amusement in his company. We sympathise with him in all the vexations and inconveniences, as well as the gayety and pleasures of his ramble; it is impossible to be even for a short time in his company, without feeling toward him as an old familiar friend; and even his dog Carlo comes in for a share of our good will. Some of the articles have already appeared in various periodicals; one in particular, which we well remember to have read some years ago, and relished as a fine specimen of burlesque extravagance and neat ridicule; we mean that entitled the "Confessions of an English Glutton," intended as a hit upon the prevailing mania for autobiographies which had just then been generated by the success of Mr. Quincy's "Confessions of an Opium Eater." "The One-handed Flute Player" we have also met before; and two or three others of the thirty-one pieces of which "Traits of Travel" are composed. They have met with great success in England, and will no doubt become equally popular on this side the Atlantic, with Mr. Grattan's former works. They deserve to do so, at any rate. We take great pleasure in cordially recommending these volumes to our readers.

To a Subscriber.—We thank "A Subscriber" for his kind intentions; but we cannot insert his communication. From most of the journals throughout the United States we have received marks of approbation and good feeling which we shall ever gratefully remember; but in a few instances we have met with an opposition, so ungenerous and unaccountable as to drown all indignation in contempt. We have no disposition to quarrel, and shall not condescend to dabble in the disputes to which private malice or public ignorance may invite. With the papers mentioned by "A Subscriber" we have no more to do than with the Chinese gazettes, and if we have passed silently over the several signs of unkindness exhibited toward us by their present conductors, it is not that we have not seen, but because we have not felt them. We have always said to them, with uncle Toby, "Go, poor devils, there is room enough in the world for you and me;" and lest the gentlemen here alluded to should be under any mistake relative to our feelings concerning them, we take the liberty to dismiss them from our columns and our mind with this remark, that we enjoy a positive pleasure in perusing downright personal abuse. It is better than swallowing a thousand smooth, oily, unmeaning puffs, which deceive nobody; but to be assailed with bitter, angry, noisy words, warms us into a good opinion at our growing importance. It is like splashing in a stream on a hot summer evening, and refreshes us like a bath. A few columns every morning upon our breakfast-table would give zest to our coffee, and send us merrily to the labours of the day.

ANDANTE PASTORALE.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

TO MISS CLARA FISHER.

WERT thou not born in fairy-land,
Young spirit of delight?
Or hast thou not at thy command
Some spell of power and might?

Enchantress! whence the witchery
That gives each motion grace,
And fascinates the willing eye,
While gazing on thy face?

To move our smiles and tears at will,
To bid our hearts forget
Their troubled thoughts of gloom and ill,
To chase away regret,

To bid, o'er the long-darkened heart,
Its early visions shine,
By the perfection of thine art—
Sweet Clara! this is thine!

There's magic in thy playful glance,
And in thy sportive smile,
The coldest spirit to entrance,
The saddest to beguile.

From thy sweet lip and azure eye,
The azure demons flee;
Grief does not dare to linger nigh
Thy laugh of frolic glee.

The forms which haunt our dreams in youth,
Can never come again;
Too beautiful and bright for truth,
We seek them still in vain:

So like art thou to these that we,
When thou dost greet our view,
Forget life's dark reality,
And deem its day-dreams true.

THYRA.

A COUNTRY WEDDING.

Oh, there is music in the bells
From yonder noisy steeple pealing,
That sweetly o'er the spirit swells,
And wakes the deepest chords of feeling.

It is not that this twilight hour
Blends softly with their melting tone;
Theirs is a deeper, holier power,
Whose echo's in the heart alone.

There's music in that merry voice—
The voice of peasants wild and high,
That bids the listener's soul rejoice,
And share in all their revelry.

It is not that those sounds proclaim
Some boastful conqueror's vain parade;
They swell not now the pomp of fame,
They hail no gorgeous cavalcade.

But, oh! they bear a mightier charm
Than shouts of triumph can express;
They spring from hearts with feeling warm,
Each voice a voice of happiness.

There's an o'erflowing tide of gladness
To-night, in all we hear and see;
A moment's passing dream of madness,
The heart's delirious jubilee.

Who recks, amid a life like this,
Of future grief, or toil, or pain?
To-morrow shall dissolve the bliss,
And care and reason wake again.

And it may be that yonder chime,
Which spoke to-day of hearts delighted,
May sadly tell, in after-time,
That death those hearts has disunited.

It may be—but away, away!
Forebodings dark, and dreams of sorrow!
Let mirth and music reign to-day,
And reason's voice be heard to-morrow.

I would not with most sage advice
Dispel this momentary fever;
For, oh! the world were paradise,
Could such delirium last for ever.

THE RECALL.

BY MRS. HEMANS.

"Alas! the kind, the playful, and the gay,
"They who have gladdened their domestic board,
"And cheered the winter hearth—do they return?"

Come home!—there is a sorrowing breath
In music, since ye went;
And the early flower-scents wander by,
With mournful memories blent:
The sounds of every household voice
Are grown more sad and deep,
And the sweet word—brother—wakes a wish
To turn aside and weep.

Oh, ye beloved, come home!—the hour
Of many a greeting tone,
The time of hearth-light and of song
Returns—and ye are gone!
And darkly, heavily it falls
On the forsaken room,
Burdening the heart with tenderness,
That deepens midst the gloom.

Where finds it you, our wandering ones?
With all your boyhood's glee
Untamed, beneath the desert's palm,
Or on the lone mid-sea?
'Mid stormy hills of battles old,
Or where dark rivers foam?
Oh, life is dim where ye are not—
Back, ye beloved! come home!

Come with the leaves and winds of spring,
And swift birds o'er the main!
Our love is grown too sorrowful,
Bring us its youth again!
Bring the glad tones to music back—
Still, still your home is fair;
The spirit of your sunny life
Alone is wanting there!

IT IS NOT SO.

It is not so, it is not so;
The world may think me gay,
And on my cheek the ready smile
May ceaseless seem to play.
The ray that tips with gold the stream,
Gilds not the depth below;
All bright alike the eye may deem,
But yet it is not so.

Why to the cold and careless throng
The secret grief reveal?
Why speak of one who was, to those
Who do not, cannot feel?
No! joy may light the brow; unknown,
Unseen, the tear-drop flow;
'Tis the poor sorrowing heart alone
Responds—it is not so.

LINES BY MOORE.

Ah! thine is not the brief array
Of charms that time is sure to borrow;
That accident may blight to-day,
Or sickness undermine to-morrow.
No! thine is that immortal grace
That ne'er shall pass from thy possession;
That moral beauty of the face,
Which constitutes its sweet expression.
This shall preserve thee what thou art,
When time thy blooming tints has shaded;
For while thy looks reflect thy heart,
How can thy charms be ever faded?

REMINISCENCES.

NUMBER I.

"Who would not, whatso'er his years,
"Or hope or lot hath been—
"The pathway long and down with tears,
"Or always smooth and green—
"Who would not, though the wish be vain,
"Wish for his young free heart again?"

THIS world is often beautiful. In the soft shadowy season of autumn, in the rich glow of summer, in the brilliant variety of spring, and even in the desolation of winter, the lover of nature finds innumerable charms, unheeded by the worldling, and despised by the misanthropist. And yet there are times when the heart is insensible to them all—when the breathing stillness seems like a reproach for its own gloomy wastes, and the gentle harmony of earth, air, and sky, in discordance with its own tempestuous feelings, heightens their darkness by the contrast. Where lies the secret of happiness? It has always been a favourite topic for discussion, but none ever felt the question satisfactorily answered. And yet there is happiness even in this world; but it is the happiness of moments only; and they are given, not to be enjoyed merely in the short period of their existence, but to be cherished for memory to dwell on in lonely hours, and for hope to fix upon, as the most convincing proof that, in another and brighter sphere, we shall enjoy the pleasure sought here in vain. I can remember well when such moments came not seldom; when many things which now oft pass unnoticed, would steal upon my heart with gentle influence, and wake its every spring to joy. I thought not then the cause was in myself. The fresh breeze of morning—the perfume of flowers—the melody of birds—the soft voice and gentle smile of welcome from a friend—each and all of these were sources of pleasure, and I exulted in the thought that I had placed my happiness upon things that could not fade. Not many years have passed away: spring still brings its flowers and breezes, but the "young free heart" that once bounded to meet and welcome them, sickens at the thought, that loved ones, who were wont to share with its joys and sorrows, now moulder in the grave; or, worse still, live for the world, but are dead to me.

Among the many friends whom I loved at school, there were two to whom I was particularly attached. They were very different, but I knew not to which I gave the preference. Clara Howard struck me, at first sight, as the most interesting girl I had ever beheld. She was tall and slender. Her features were regular, and animated by dark expressive eyes, which spoke the "ardent soul within." There was an air of melancholy in her countenance, and thought had set his mark upon her fair brow, and given it a dignity which those who observed not her smile might have deemed misplaced. But that smile—so pure, so brilliant! It was the illumination of soul, the glow of genius; and none ever saw its flash, but Clara Howard. That smile was rare; merry at birth, and the cold-hearted and the whom that smile was never wast proud and reserved, and wondered how

I know not how we became acquainted at first; for, to all else, she was cold and distant. Perhaps there was a secret sympathy in our natures; certain it was, there was a similarity in our tastes. Often, when I have wandered from the giddy crowd to some lonely spot, have I met Clara; and when I have heard with rapture some glowing sentiment from her eloquent lips, I have caught her smile, and showed her that she felt as I did. Thus our acquaintance grew to intimacy; and I became her confidant and her friend. With others, she was, almost invariably, silent; but when alone with me, I have listened for hours, while her feelings were poured forth in burning words, with a rapidity and eloquence I never knew equalled. Her imagination was enthusiastic, and she revelled in its luxuriance, and knew not that, like the lightning's flash, it was not less destructive than brilliant, and carried wildness and desolation in its path. The present was not for her. The occurrences of life were irksome to her. I had thought more than she had—for the wild dreams of her imagination could not be called thought—and I would tell her, that she was preparing wretchedness for herself; that it was wrong, that it was selfish, to live for herself alone; that she should interest herself more in the concerns of others, and it would in time conduce to her own happiness.

"Why should I?" she would answer, and her deep rich voice, like melancholy music, could always excite sympathy—"Who is there in this world to care for Clara Howard? I look around me, and see others of my age, with home, and friends, and parents; but I—the voice of interest is seldom heard by me. I sometimes endeavour to recall a dream almost forgotten. Methinks I was once the idol of a little circle; soft voices are heard now and then in dreams; and when I wake, the impression they leave seems very like the stain of sweet reality. But oftener still I dream of death—of sounds uttered by a dying mother. I fancy myself leaning over the pale corpse of a much-loved sister; and, starting from such visions, I feel that I am alone; that the world to me is but a splendid picture—I mean the moving, breathing world of animated beings; and why should I not dream of other worlds? Here, in the bright moonlight, with none but thou to listen, I can give vent to thoughts that are pent up during the long, long day. If it were not for this—this thinking of the future; if I did not believe that I should, in another world, realize that slight dream of the past, I would lay down the life I value not, and the bright moon I love so much should shine upon my grave."

Hers was no very uncommon character. She was possessed of genius: she had its pride and its ambition. Had she been man, she would perhaps have earned herself a name; but the timidity of woman would arrest upon her lips the feelings that sparkled in her eye, and shone in her smile. She was a poetess, but her poetry partook of the same wild melancholy as her conversation; and, too proud to give her character to the world, she would destroy every vestige of her muse ere it met other eyes than mine. She was one of those whose affections, not placed upon many, twine round the cherished one as the ivy round the oak. She loved me almost to idolatry, and I thought that hers was love that nought but death could change. But I had studied her enough to know that there was one leading trait in her character which was almost unknown to herself, but which, if once discovered and gratified, might alter her fate, and change that character materially. This was ambition. She knew she was disliked and shunned at school; she seldom heard the voice of praise; she never courted it, and she learned to think diffidently of herself; and though the thought could not give her humility, it quelled for a time her ambition.

But time passed away, and it became necessary for her to mingle with the world. She was an heiress, and though, while a child, her guardian thought but little of her, yet, when her education was finished, he was proud to present to the fashionable circles so accomplished a girl as his ward, and Clara became a favourite. Her guardian visited in the best society, his wife was a woman of fashion, and with them Clara found no opportunity to indulge her taste for solitude. She had dreaded the world, as a scene in which she should still find herself alone and neglected. She was mistaken; and, as I had feared, the discovery proved fatal to her. She found herself the centre of attraction. Insinuating voices whispered to her that she was beautiful and accomplished. She was not vain; for she despised the flatterers that offered incense to her beauty: but she was proud. She felt as if those of her own sex had neglected her; and the thought that they now envied the superiority they had formerly overlooked, was gratifying to a heart which the indulgence of a morbid sensibility had perverted from its original purity, and rendered suspicious and irritable. She became eager for admiration; but admiration did not satisfy her. She felt that she had swerved from the character she had marked for herself in early youth. She had loved to think of heaven. Her piety was then pure; but it was not based upon principle, it was but the ebullition of feeling, and it could not now preserve the fount of happiness in her heart from the unhealthy springs of worldly doctrines.

I had often thought that the fate of Clara would be an unhappy one. Her feelings were too deep, too passionate, for happiness. She knew that hers were such as should not be indulged; but she would not own it even to herself; and drank deeper of the intoxicating cup of worldly pleasure, vainly expecting to lose, in her delirium, the remembrance of the past, and the fear of the future. But there is no Lethe for the sorrows of the heart. She wandered through the world as if she were performing a necessary penance. She was admired and followed, but none loved her. She could smile, but the smile, like a sunbeam upon the water, warmed not the icy surface of her heart. How many are there who thus mingle in society, but are indifferent to its pleasures! To such as these, misfortune loses its sting. Friends may die around them, and grief for their death is soon lost in envy for their lot. The contemplation of their own wretchedness renders them careless of the happiness of others, but the heart must have some object upon which to rest.

Clara returned to her solitude; but her former studies gave her no pleasure. She had heard the efforts of genius derided. The passing sneers of the world upon romance and literary tastes, and upon the abstraction of the thoughtful votary of the muse, indirectly aimed at her, and coldly disre-could no longer lose herself in meditation, and be happy. She now loved to dip in the mazy labyrinths of metaphysics. She studied the various theories of skeptical philosophers upon the origin of creation. She inhaled the delusive maxims of Rousseau and Voltaire, and imbibed their principles. She had mistaken the wild visions of her romantic imagination for religion; and, because they could not give her the happiness promised to the votaries of religion, she loved to believe that this is a world of chance. It was a doctrine entirely opposite to the hopes of her youth; but where is the character that years do not change? Who does not wish, at times, for the pure feelings that have gone with former days?

I have not seen Clara for several months. The last I knew of her was, that she had sailed for England. But the breezes that waft her form from her native land, cannot purify her soul. Her education has been wrong, and there is no remedy for the evil. But perhaps I am in error. Some unseen spirit may breathe new life into her soul, and chase away the mists that hang around it, and inspire it with true and fervent piety.

"But when the heart is past its youth,
'Tis very hard to bring Back to its fount the joy of truth,
The glory of its spring;
But, keep it pure from hour to hour,
It has no blight like bird or flower."

THE CASKET.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

A CHAPTER ON GENTILITY.

"GENTILITY," my father used to say, "costs so little, that I wonder any body should be vulgar; and, indeed, so religiously did he adhere to his favourite maxims, that I doubt whether he was ever guilty of an ill-bred action. But what it cost him will be seen, if the reader pleases, by reading farther on.

As he died when I was quite young, my recollections of his person are not very vivid; but an old portrait, which I found a few days since in my aunt's garret, represents him as a very comely person, with a light complexion, a powdered wig, a high forehead, and of goodly proportions. I was not a little surprised at the youthful appearance it had, although he died under forty, for his idea was always associated in my mind with an amiable old man. Such is the vast difference there seems, to children, between them and their parents. He is painted in a violet coat, with large silver buttons, and ruffles at the wrists; pea-coloured pantaloons, and a striped satin vest, with one hand negligently thrust into the bosom. I remember my nurse used to tell me he was searching for a sixpence to give me, and I have waited whole hours, expecting to see him draw it out. It was done, I have been told, in Paris—for my father had travelled—and, I doubt not, by a court painter, for he never went half way where gentility was concerned. The reason of its being thrown among the lumber of a garret was, its having no eyes. Before I was old enough to know what revenge meant, I, one day, after having been denied something I had cried for, stole into the parlour, and mounting a card-table, poked my forefinger through both eyes of my father's unresisting portrait. I had forgotten the circumstance, but seeing the picture recalled it fresh to my memory. I have it now hanging in my bed-chamber, and when I feel revengeful, from any real or imaginary wrong, one glance at its rent eyes never fails to satisfy me. What a happy thing it would be if gentlemen of the duello school could thus revenge themselves on each other's portraits; what cool and deliberate aim they would take; no tremblings, no changing of colour, no blood running to the ground; but all would be smooth, bold and genteel! It would give great encouragement to the fine arts, and save many a worthy young fellow from an untimely grave.

My father's gentility was an inherent passion; he was born a gentleman, though why, I could never conceive, for his father was a plain, honest man, and who his father's father was, I believe, is still a secret to our family; and my grandmother was as notable a housewife as ever knit a stocking; but it was his genius, and a born prince could not have had finer ideas. Some mystery-loving philosopher might call it a recollection of a previous state of existence; and, if it was, I doubt not I might boast of a German baron, or a French prince, for an ancestor. He was an expert swordsman, a tolerable musician, and one of the most elegant dancers that ever stepped a minuet; but he never acquired enough of any accomplishment for it to look professional in him. He adored the fair, and worshipped them in fact, as fervently as Burn's has in song. I am inclined to think, from some fragments I discovered among his papers, that the delicacy of his passion sometimes led him to poetry. The following lines are the only verses that appear to have been finished:

TO PHILOMEL.

Teach me, sad bird, with tender moan,
My Delia's heart to move,
For ah, like you, I wear a thorn
Of unrequited love.

Or fly, sweet Philomela, fly
To Delia's charmed bower,
Tell her how sad and piteously
I mourn each silent hour.

Tell her, sad bird, how keen the woe
Of alighted love to bear—
Thou wouldst not sing so sad, but thou
A wounded heart dost wear.

Alas, each rustling zephyr's breath
May reach my Delia's ear,
Each rude wind blowing o'er the heath,
But me she will not hear.

The dewy flowers she plucks at morn
Might mind her of my eye,
For there the glistening tear-drops shone;
Alas, she would not dry.

O! happy winds that round her bowers
Can unforbidden sigh!
O! happy are the lowly flowers
That in her footsteps lie!

Sad bird, to Delia fair complain,
Let Delia hear thy moan;
I cannot bear to know thy pain,
It minds me of my own.

This tender address was not blistered by "foolish tears," though it spoke as much truth, no doubt, as verses generally do. I found another short epistle written in a different character, but affairs of the heart were never meant for broad daylight, and passing them through a printer's hands rubs off all the sentiment; so I will expose no more of these tender billets. I may want to use them, as Sterne did the corporal's letter, so let them rest until some love-inspiring eyes shall draw them to the light.

I have looked in vain among my father's papers for letters respecting his early life, but unpaid bills and billets-doux were all that I could discover; from which I concluded, that either Cupid or the sheriff held him in constant chains. He was relieved, however, from the thralldom of both by wedlock; my mother brought him a snug fortune, but it flew faster and higher than scandal, for my sire's gentility was an expensive passion; kind soul, had he been content, like a Frenchman, with a great deal of tinsel and very little substance, he might have lived for an age as genteelly as a prince, but he despised affectation in his heart. Neither was he a parvenu, borrowing his betters' manners outwardly, but retaining all his in-born meanness; his was "nature's aristocracy," and it fitted him like his own coat, not like his neighbour's. Shakspeare has drawn him in Timon; how could he miss him? for he was formed by nature, not by the crowd, though my father had none of the Athenian's cynical passions in him; he was, in truth, all gentleness, and when he could no longer invite his friends to a feast, he did not, like the noble lord Timon, summon them to a banquet like that when he bid "each man to his stool, with that spur as he would to the lip of his mistress;" nor, when his creditors pressed hard upon him, did he send so foolish a message as this to his friends:

"I am proud; say
That my occasions have found time to use them
Toward a supply of money."

For he knew well that,

"Since dishonour traffics with man's nature,
He is but outside."

Of my golden days of infancy I remember but just enough to make me wish for them again, and tradition is silent on the subject. By the time I had entered my eleventh year, my father had contrived, with the assistance of his friends, and by following his favourite maxim, to ruin himself, that is as the world has it; for if he had lost his property, he had not lost his sauvitur in modo, and he was, in truth, a much finer gentleman than ever, though a much poorer one. As I was from home during the winding up of our fortunes, I was not a witness to the melancholy bustle of selling off; so, when I was sent for to come home, I was filled with amazement upon jumping on the hall floor, to hear the sound made by my little feet reverberate through hollow sounding rooms; the carpets, the chandelier, and the pictures, were all gone; the doors all stood ajar; I looked into the parlour, but the curtains were all down, the floor bare, and the chairs and tables gone. I ran breathless down to the nursery, but there was fresh food for wonder. At a little round table sat my mother, doing the honours of the scurviest breakfast I had ever seen: a snoutless china coffee-pot stood on the table, and by its side a champagne glass for a cream-pot, and cups and saucers to correspond, not with each other, but with the rest of the equipage: my genteel sire was toasting a slice of kidney on the end of a fork, and Patrick, a faithful old servant, sat with my youngest sister on his knee, telling her stories of wild Irishmen and fairies, which, had she been able to have comprehended them, would have made her auburn locks uncurl, and stand on end.

The next morning—it was a dark drizzly day in April—two long covered wagons drove up to the door, and I was told we were going a long, long way off, up into the country. I held my breath, and looked at the preparations for setting out, with as much awe as if we were going to the moon. My father was as passive a spectator as myself; for he had not the smallest business-capacity in the world, and so he stood, and bowed, and smiled, to his creditors, as they occasionally passed, as unconcerned as if nothing had happened.

Into the first wagon was put the little furniture the law had left us, the pots and kettles hanging beneath; and into the other my father and mother, my two little sisters and myself, some boxes of baked meat, "funeral baked meats" they were, for this was the death of our gentility, an old hat-case, my mother's guitar, and my father's two pointers.

After the last farewell was taken of the last friend, and the reins were in Patrick's hands, I saw, for the first time, a tear starting in my father's eye; my mother's bosom heaved convulsively; her lips trembled, and turned deadly pale; she strove in vain to hide her emotion, the tears gushed from her lovely blue eyes, and, resting her head on my father's shoulder, she wept long and loud. The sympathy of tears is all-powerful, and my sister and myself now began to show it in no very ambiguous or gentle manner. Honest Patrick, who felt for all our misfortunes, though he had heretofore only administered to our pleasures, without sharing in them, showed his condolence by setting up a howl, such as he had probably practised at wakes. The two pointers hearing this unusual concert, commenced an accompaniment at the tops of their throats. In addition to these sobs and howlings, the rattling of the wagons over the pavements set all our crockery and tin-ware a jingling, so that we had the satisfaction of drawing the whole neighbourhood out of their beds, and of seeing the window-shutters thrown open, and curtains drawn half aside, as we passed along. The market-boy set down his tray, and the milk-man held his dipper suspended over his pail, to look at us. But it was better than a play to a cavalcade of ragged boys and little chimney-sweeps, who followed us, shouting and jumping in high glee, until we were fairly out of town, where, if the reader pleases, we will jog on in silence.

But one word—I will not hold thee, kind reader, long by the button. If my story has a moral—and all tales should have one—I hope it is too palpable to need pointing out; but if thou dost ever feel an inclination to crowd thy parlours with well-dressed and smiling friends, and haply take delight in seeing them eat jellies and pic-nics, and other costly things, at thy expense, I do opine, if thou hadst seen my father the morning he left his once-gay mansion, with no friend near him, it would have cured thee of a soiree—at least for one season. DESULTORY SELECTIONS.

DUTCH MAIL.

WHILE I was at Nottingham, I fell in with a plain elderly man, an ancient reader of the Leicester Herald, a paper which I published in the halcyon days of my youth. Its reputation secured me many a hearty shake by the hand, accompanied by the watery eye of warm feeling, as I passed through the midland counties. I abandoned it in 1796, for the Monthly Magazine, and exchanged Leicester for London. This ancient reader hearing that I was in Nottingham, came to me with a certain paper in his hand, to call me to account for the wearisome hours which an article in it had cost him and his friends. I looked at it, and saw it headed, "Dutch Mail," and it professed to be a column of original Dutch, which this honest man had been labouring to translate, for he said he had not met with any other specimen of Dutch. The sight of it brought the following circumstance to my recollection: On the evening before one of the publications, my men and a boy were frolicking in the printing-office, and they overturned two or three columns of the paper. The chief point was to get ready in some way for the Nottingham and Derby coaches, which, at four in the morning, required four or five hundred papers. After every exertion, we were short nearly a column. But there stood in the galleys a tempting column of pi. Now, unlettered reader, mark—pi is a jumble of odd letters, gathered from the floor of the printing-office, but set on end in any manner, to distribute at leisure in their proper places. Some letters are topsy-turvy, often ten or twelve consonants together, and then as many vowels, with as whimsical a juxtaposition of stops. I suddenly bethought me that this might be called Dutch, and after writing a head, "Dutch Mail," I subjoined a statement, that, "just as our paper was going to press, the Dutch mail had arrived, but that, as we had not time to make a translation, we had inserted its intelligence in the original." I then overcame the scruples of my overseer, and the pi was made up to the extent wanted, and off it went as original Dutch, into Derbyshire and Nottingham! In a few hours, other matter, in plain English, supplied its place in our local publication. Of course, all the linguists, schoolmasters, high-bred village politicians, and correspondents of the Ladies' Diary, set their wits to work to translate my Dutch; and I once had a collection of letters containing speculations on the subject, or demanding a literal translation of that which appeared to be so intricate. How the Dutch could read it, was incomprehensible. My Nottingham quidnunc was one of the number, and it appeared that, at times, for above four and thirty years, he had bestowed on it his anxious attentions. I told him the story—and he left me, vowing that, as I had deceived him, he would never believe any newspaper again! Sir R. Philips' Tour.

PARENTAL MURDER.

A few months ago, at the village Chang-yuen, in the neighbourhood of Canton, in the family of Lew, there was an only son, sixteen years of age, of a bad disposition, and given to thieving. The neighbours often complained to his parents of his petty thefts, and made them ashamed. In consequence of this, the father and mother of this only child, conceiving that it would be difficult to alter his disposition, agreed to put him to death, that they might not be disgraced by him. Accordingly, the same night on which they came to this resolution, they passed a cord round his neck, the father pulling one end, and the mother the other, and so strangled him. Husband and wife next day carried him beyond the precincts of the village, and interred him on the common. The neighbours all knew of the occurrence: Our native correspondent, a young man, writes, "Alas! though the youth was vicious, he might have reformed. There was no necessity to move the murderous hand and take his life. Where was the feeling of their hearts?" But an old Chinese, who stood by and read the account, fully justified the proceeding; and affirmed that he had a grandson whom he apprehended he must despatch in a similar manner. The power given by the law to parents over disobedient children is very great; and in this case, as there was none concerned to prosecute, the murderers remained undisturbed!

GENTLEMEN'S FASHIONS.

We read much of the luxurious effeminacy of the old Romans, their fantastically curled hair, their favourite robes, &c.; but what will posterity think of some of the modes of puppyism in our times, when they read, in a chronicle of fashion, dated one thousand eight hundred and twenty-nine, that gentlemen wore elegant drab opera manteau, lined with sash velvet, and confined at the collar with a gold chain? In another dress, the waistcoat is directed to be made of "a very beautiful white embroidered velvet." Some young men have appeared at balls with "blue dress gloves, embroidered with white." "The system of the cravat is to form the organisation of linen on the breast;" but the very "march" of foppery is "cloaks of the gentlemen lined with plush silk of celestial blue." At balls, our young exquisites sport pocket handkerchiefs "of fine lawn, with a hem as broad as their thumbs, the corners only are embroidered;" "shoes tied with a small rosette." "A young gentleman now suffers his hair to grow, has it curled, and parted on the left side of the forehead," &c. This is the very quintessence of foppery.

THE SPARK AT SEA.

"A friend," says the editor of the New-Bedford Mercury, "has handed us the following lines, with permission for their publication. They are the production of George Washington Adams, the circumstances of whose fate has awakened a peculiarly melancholy interest."

There is a little spark at sea,
Which glows 'mid darkness brilliantly;
But when the moon looks clear and bright,
Emits a pale and feeble light;
And when the tempest shakes the wave,
It glimmers o'er the seaman's grave.
When ocean's storms roar wild and high,
Most brightly we this light descry;
Amid the billows sparkling foam,
Onward it sails to seek a home;
Despite the elemental war,
The wave is its triumphal car.
Such friendship's beaming light appears,
Through the long line of coming years;
In sorrow's clouds it shines afar,
A feeble but a constant star;
And, like that little spark at sea,
Burns brightest in adversity.

BOLIVAR AND THE BARBER.

The following anecdote is from "Memoirs of Bolivar, by General Ducoudray Holstein," now in the press, and about to be published by Mr. Goodrich, of Boston.

"One night, as the liberator was standing on the piazza of his house, he heard the music of a guitar, accompanied by singing. The verses sung were composed in honour of General Bolivar, the liberator, &c. He listened attentively to the singer, and was so delighted, that he ordered him to be called up stairs. The man was a barber, and an Indian. Bolivar, surrounded by a numerous circle, assigned him a seat in the midst of the company, and told him to repeat his song. The verses were the production of the barber himself, and composed in his own way. Bolivar was set forth as the hero of heroes. He was compared to the gods, descending from heaven, and bringing, to poor mortals, welfare, peace, liberty, equality, &c. At the end of the performance, Bolivar being enraptured, the company burst forth in loud applause, and beside some money collected for him upon the spot, the Indian barber received, the same evening, by way of encouragement to his splendid genius, a present from the munificent liberator of a house and store, the property of a rich Spanish merchant, who had emigrated. Next day, the barber took possession, and still continues to sing his songs in honour of the liberator."

OLD LETTERS.

Reader, hast thou never pored over a budget of old letters, frail remembrancers of things frailer than they? traces of the hand that guided thine infancy, parental injunctions and fond anticipations? How well have they been answered? Some careless chirography too, from schoolmates and college cronies, filled with schemes of pleasure and plans for many a mad-cap frolic, and always some Tom Scamper was to join the party, and give it a double relish! Then a thousand plans for the years to come; promises of heart and purse; assurances of disinterested friendship; hopes of soon meeting—all marked with that freshness of feeling which grows faint, and withers, and passes away in the chilly atmosphere of after hours. Where now are the kind and light-hearted? Some risen to opulence, others crushed by disappointment—one had crossed the ocean wave—one sleeps beneath it—all were parted—all changed. The bright links had been displaced by other, "sterner stuff;" and yet, perchance, by those that bind closer and firmer. And yet—a pity 'tis—those bright things must pass away. They have, however; and for the past—peace to its ashes!

A KNOCK-DOWN ARGUMENT.

Some years ago, two persons in this town having a dispute relative to certain money concerns, submitted the matter to arbitrators. Instead of employing lawyers, each one pled his own cause. They spouted away in fine style for some time, until one happening to drop something offensive to the sober views of the other, he broke in upon him in the middle of his speech. Whether it was to enforce his argument, or whether it was merely accidental, report saith not; but the party on the floor was armed with a raw-hide. When, taking the interruption in high dudgeon, he drew the weapon across the head of his antagonist so forcibly, as for a few moments completely to upset his ideas. But he was not long in recovering his recollection, and drawing his fist, he gave the aggressor such a blow as sent him lumbering against the table, on the opposite side of which sat the honourable the arbitrators. The impulse given to the fallen orator upset the table; the table upset the arbitrators; and orator, table and arbitrators

"In common ruin lay."

"There, darn ye," said the victor, recovering his fist, "I guess that'll settle the hash!" And in fact it proved a very forcible argument, for from that day forward the suit was never renewed.

TOUCH OF THE SUBLIME.

The following is a literal copy of a speech delivered at a debating society, in one of the western towns of Pennsylvania. Corporal Trim's eloquence was no touch to this masterpiece: "Well—the subject to be excused is, wether ardent spirits does any good or not. I confirm it don't. Jist think of our ancestors in future days—they lived to a most numerous age—so that I think that whiskey nor ardent spirits don't do no good."—A long pause.—"Well—the question to be excused is wether ardent spirits does any good or not—so that I conclude it don't."—Another long pause.—"I can't get hold of the infernal thing."

ENVY.

The most curious specimen of envy we ever heard of, was exhibited by a London alderman. He was on his way to a turtle dinner, and was encountered by a half-starved beggar, who solicited charity. He looked at the applicant intently for a moment, and then burst out, "Confound you, I'd give five guineas for your appetite."

I once had a constant and troublesome visitor, whom I tried many ways to get rid of. First, I essayed smoke, which he bore like a badger; then I tried fire, which he endured like a salamander. At last, I lent him five dollars; and have never seen him since!

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

LINES.

"The fierce thirst of death, and still unslaked."

THE grave! the grave!—Oh, would that now
In its dark bosom I might rest!
That o'er this aching heart and brow
Its cold damp covering were prest!
For I am weary of the strife,
The heartless vanity of life.

I care not if the deep dark sea,
Or the green earth, should o'er me close;
I care not where my grave may be,
So that I there may find repose:
Oh! sweet it were to be at rest,
Whether in earth or ocean's breast.

Let me but die, I reckon not where
My ashes rest—it matters not;
The eye of love will come not there,
Nor friendship's footsteps seek the spot.
But vigils o'er my dreamless sleep
The spirit of neglect shall keep!

Still in my hopeless heart the same
Dark feeling dwells, whose Upas blight
Each hope and joy which near it came
Hath withered—all of fair and bright
That crossed my path have faded thence,
Beneath its deadly influence.

Thou poison in the cup of life!
From earliest youth my spirit's bane!
So long my heart unequal strife
With thee hath waged, that I would fain
Seek in the gloomy grave's recess
A refuge from thy bitterness.

The darkest and the brightest hour
Alike thy influence confess:
When sorrow o'er my heart hath power,
And evils closely round me press,
Thou com'st to bid my hours of gloom
A deeper, darker tint assume.

And when the hearts I love are glad
Around me, and I would be gay,
And smile with them, and drive each sad
And boding thought, and fear away,
Thou com'st to chill the burst of glee,
And make my smiles a mockery.

Yet still, while laugh and jest flow free,
None mark the spirit is not there,
None knew how much of agony
My heart hath learned at length to bear.
The spirit's utter recklessness
Oft springs from misery's excess.

Yet, but for thee, I could bear on,
Although my path is fraught with ill,
Were but this gnawing canker gone—
Dark thought! wilt thou pursue me still?
I cannot fly thee, for thou art
The spectre of my haunted heart.

The grave! the grave!—Oh, there alone
From thee my spirit shall be free,
And that which I have never known
Shall then be mine—tranquillity.
Oh, when shall that blest moment come,
Which calls me to my wished-for home? THYRZA.

LETTERS FROM EUROPE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE MIRROR.

London, April 16, 1890.

MY DEAR M.—I wrote you something of a letter this morning, for which I take it for granted that you are adequately grateful; but my benevolence is so far excited in your favour that I have determined, before I sleep, to scribble another sheetful for your peculiar edification. I might now, if I pleased, take unto myself much credit for this measure, by laying it entirely to the account of that benevolence which I have just spoken of; but honesty is the best policy, after all; so I may just as well confess the real reasons why I am, at this moment, doing what I am; to wit, in the first place, because the rain is descending in showers; in the second, because I expect soon to leave this place, on an excursion to the continent; and, before I go, it appears but reasonable that I should say all I have to say to you; for, during my journeyings, it is not probable that you will be troubled with any of my lucubrations. Thirdly, and lastly; I have nothing else to do. Nobody will call upon me now, because I want somebody to keep me company, and I have read till my eyes are tired, and my limbs weary of inaction. Apropos to nothing; what a dust you have been kicking up with that amiable and exemplary gentleman, who took such an unceremonious leave of absence from this city, some five months since; I mean the quondam banker, Stephenson. Do you know that our worthy countrymen have brought down upon themselves a pretty lot of compliments on this occasion? That just and reasonable man, John Bull, takes it for an assumed fact that the whole population of the United States were engaged in the abduction of the fugitive from Savannah, and he is amazingly delighted, of course, with the handle it has given him to belabour us with abuse. He quite forgets to remember the atrocious violations of law and justice that are perpetrated every day, and every hour in the day, in his own household, and under his very nose, and plumes himself delightfully upon the unheard-of wickedness of Brother Jonathan. As to Stephenson himself, his sins are altogether overlooked, and every body sympathises with him for his unhappy destiny in falling into the cruel hands of the barbarous, murderous, piratical, kidnapping, law-despising, blood-thirsty Yankees—they call us all Yankees here, whether we hail from Maine or Georgia. I had quite a sparring match, yesterday, with some friends of mine, upon this subject. They began the battle, and did not spare me, I assure you. "Is this the boasted morality," said they, "of which your countryman, Cooper, makes such a parade in his last book of notions? According to him, we must believe that in America there is no such thing as a violation of the law, or a breach of the public peace: that all the Americans are orderly and quiet, respecting every man's rights and privileges, and scrupulously abstaining from any thing like fraud or injustice."

"This does not look much like it, however," said a lively brunette, in whose good graces I am particularly anxious to stand well; "here has been as barbarous an instance of brutal and lawless violence as was ever committed by a savage. What have you to say, Mr. H. in exculpation of your countrymen?"

I will not detail to you, at length, the substance of my argument, but content myself with informing you that I did not come the worst out of the disputation. I made them observe, that the first instigator of the outrage was an Englishman; that there was some reason to suspect another Englishman, and he a public officer of his majesty, of an intended, at least, if not an actual participation in the offence; that the first kind treatment the fugitive received was at the hands of an American; and, finally, that his liberation was owing to the prompt interference of American lawyers, citizens, and magistrates. Then I alluded to the interest manifested by the inhabitants of the city in general; and so, I flatter myself, I succeeded in turning the tables upon my antagonists. For a time, Stephenson was quite the lion of the day—you know that London must always have at least one lion, and sometimes half-a-dozen. His property was sold at extravagant prices; though why Sir John should conceive a horse or a phaeton, a picture or a hair-brush that had belonged to an absconding and criminal debtor, to be more serviceable than another, I cannot, for the life of me, imagine. The mania has long since passed away; it was forcibly dispossessed by the catholic question, which gave way to Madame Malibran, who will, in turn, soon be succeeded by Miss Smithson, or some other man, or woman, or thing; and so the world of London goes on from miracle to miracle, wondering, crowding, running, crushing, and always paying, and that right plentifully. For some time past, the fashionables have been flocking to the colosseum, in the Regent's park; but they are beginning to turn their attention in other directions, and the humbler world of men and women merely has succeeded to the rage. The park is crowded every day with denizens of all sorts of unknown places—Farringdon without, and Bishopsgate, and Aldermanbury, and Crutchedfriars, and the Minorities. By the way, I wish you were here, just for a day or two, to see that colosseum. You can have no idea of the stupendous magnitude of the building; nor can, or shall I attempt to give you one. But it is almost worth making the voyage to see it alone. You have heard the story, I dare say, of one of your rich New-York gentry, an amateur of every thing pertaining to the fine arts, who went through the British museum and did not notice the Elgin marbles. He could hardly escape seeing the colosseum, even if he were to try.

I went, yesterday morning, to see a sparring-match at the Fives-court, and there I found our mutual friend, Richard S. He paid great attention to the sport, and spoke quite like a knowing one, at least so it seemed to me; but I have no great skill in these matters. I asked him, among other things, what brought him over, and he told me that he came expressly to get boxing-gloves and lessons. Pray, is the noble science of fifty-cuffs much cultivated among you? or is Richard a rare instance of devotion to it? For my own part, I prefer the exercises of the gymnasium to all the boxing-matches in Christendom. I have attended Voelker's school very constantly for the last two years. His former lieutenant is now, I understand, or was, lately, in your city; a very clever and scientific German, with the form of an Apollo, and as strong as Hercules? Have you seen any thing of him? His name is ——. If you have not, I advise you to find him out and cultivate him. Oh, send me Willis's new Magazine whenever it comes out. You remember you mentioned it to me in one of your letters. I showed some of W.'s pieces to M—e and C—ll, and they were much pleased with them. The remarks of these two poets were curious and characteristic. M. objected to the trifling nature of the subjects, and the flippancy of the sentiment. C. suggested that the writer took too much pains to polish his verses. I remember once showing Halleck's Fanny to M. and he had a fault to find with that too: His objection was to the occasional introduction of a ludicrous image, or idea, after a fine thought or sentiment; as, for instance, in those beautiful lines entitled "Music," he thought it much to be lamented that Mr. H. had ended one of the most exquisite stanzas with rain and Scudder's balcony. I quoted Byron, but he said it was a fault in him too. M. speaks very highly of the Americans now. Once, when I was at his house, he alluded to his former abuse of us, and apologized very handsomely indeed. I was with him, I remember, soon after the news arrived of the simultaneous deaths of Jefferson and Adams. He was delighted with the incident of their both dying on the fourth of July, and said, if we Americans could not write poetry, we could act it; that the happening of those deaths as and when they did, was true poetry. But I am weary of this gossiping, so farewell. Yours, truly,

THE ESSAYIST.

FROM A LATE LONDON PERIODICAL.

WEATHERCOCKS.

"Round he spun."

WE have a great respect for a weathercock! There is something about it so springy, so sprightly, and, at the same time, so complying and so accommodating, that we are not ashamed to confess that we have long taken it for our model. It changes sides perpetually, yet always preserves one unvaried elevation; it is always in motion, yet always remains the same. We could look at a weathercock for hours!

To us, however, it has another charm, independent of its intrinsic good qualities. Its name, not less than its character, recalls to our recollection a family which is entitled, in the highest degree, to our esteem; of which we should never cease to think, even if our memory were not daily sharpened by the little remembrancer, which is at once their namesake, their crest, and their model.

The family of the Weathercocks is one of considerable antiquity. The first of the name whom we find distinguishing himself in any extraordinary degree, is Sir Anthony Weathercock, of Fetherly, Staffordshire, who changed his party seven times during the unfortunate dissensions between the houses of York and Lancaster. And this he contrived to do with so much tact, that he was a considerable gainer by his six first defections. By his seventh he certainly sustained a trifling loss—he lost his head!

It is a well-known observation, that the descendants of surpassingly great men are often either blockheads or idiots. The present instance certainly affords us an exemplification of the truth of the remark. The successor of this genuine weathercock was a poor weak fellow, who had no more idea of turning to the right-about, without compulsion, than he had of breakfasting without beef. Upon his refusing to deliver up the castle of Nounhame to the celebrated Warwick, he was besieged, compelled to surrender, and immediately hung up upon the gates of the fort, to learn to behave like his forefathers.

The religious persecutions which followed the union of the white and red roses, afforded fresh opportunity for the manifestation of the merits of the Weathercocks. Theirs was almost the only family of any note in England, which did not lose one or other of its members from the indiscriminate fury of superstition. The head of the house appears to have embraced as many religions, and more wives, than Henry himself; and a younger branch is said to have been, within a week, a serving-man in the train of Gardiner, and a clerk in the household of Cranmer. But we are forgetting that we and our friends live in 1829, and that we shall weary the patience of our reader by tracing those dry historical facts ad orem.

The Weathercock family, or rather that branch of it with which we are at present concerned, resides on a large and productive estate in Leicestershire. We have spent much time with them, and have had several opportunities of studying their peculiar merits. Their mansion affords a perfect college for mutability; every thing is kept in readiness to be destroyed or refitted at a minute's warning. It is quite delightful to see how new fashions of furniture come in and go out; how the faces of the servants are continually altered; how the hour of meals, the regulation of the parterres—in short, the whole system of domestic economy is always subjected to some new ephemeral arrangement, which must soon give way to another equally new and equally ephemeral. To us, we say, this is delightful. But one seldom finds two tastes alike. Many pronounce the Weathercocks to be quite crazed; and many decide that "they are mighty good kind of people, but have very odd whimsies!"

The disposition for change, which is inherent in the family, has produced very strange effects upon their place of residence. The house was originally a good stout old-fashioned house, remarkable for nothing but the antiquity of its pictures and the size of its dining-hall. But its name and character have shifted considerably since it came into the possession of my worthy friends. It has been alternately a hall, an abbey, a castle, and a lodge; nay, during the life of the late Sir Adonis Weathercock, it became, for a few months, a cottage. The proprietor, however, in this instance, gave up his design before it had effected any thing beyond the windows. The mansion bears more permanent marks of its other metamorphoses. On one side it has the square turrets and battlements of the feudal system; on another, the flowery-pointed arch of a Gothic cathedral. One of the owners of the place thought proper to sink a moat round his habitation; but he afterwards filled it up, and converted it into a circular gravel walk. Another had a fancy for erecting some solid Doric pillars: he, doubtless, much improved their appearance by placing upon them a beautiful Chinese veranda. Similar observations are suggested by an inspection of the interior of the building. You may almost read a history of two or three centuries in the relics of their manners, which are scattered in every apartment. War has been carried on with tolerably equal success between Lely's portraits, Gainsborough's landscapes, and Bunbury's caricatures. A cast of a Hercules looks somewhat angrily upon a mandarin, who is his next neighbour; and a timorous Venus maintains her post with great obstinacy, although her divine presence is invaded by the scaly folds of an enormous dragon. There are bonzes and cupids, oaken tables and mahogany tables, drab papering and crimson papering, high mantel-pieces and low mantel-pieces, Dresden china and French china; every thing is superb, every thing incongruous, every thing unfinished.

The old park has been reduced to the same state. A scrupulous homage has been paid to every new mode of cultivation; a thousand emendations, and additions, and improvements, have been successively introduced. But it is easier to plant new customs than to eradicate the old. Lycan was turned into a beast, but he retained his old habits of atrocity. Arachne was transformed into a spider, but she did not forget her spinning. The park of the Weathercocks has, in like manner, assumed various novel shapes, without losing the traces of its old ones. At one time it was dressed out in all the stiff regularity of alleys and arcades; at another, it was dubbed a "wilderness," and was immediately laid waste by a terrible inroad of shrubs and weeds without number. In one part, your eye rests upon the muddy vestiges of an artificial cascade; in another, your foot stumbles over a heap of rubbish, which has been produced by the demolition of an artificial ruin. Some people object to these things; for my part, I own I am delighted with them. They show a proper distrust of one's own opinion; a decorous compliance with the unstable will of the world; an eager spirit of enterprise; in short, they prove that the Weathercocks have not an ounce of obstinacy in their composition.

Sir Wilfrid Weathercock, the present head of the family, is a cheerful and hale man, between forty and fifty years of age. He is about the middle stature, although upon some occasions, by the affectation of a fashionable stoop, he appears somewhat dwarfish; while, upon others, by the assumption of a military gait and a pair of high heels, he bids fair to be accounted a giant. With a self-denial worthy of a Cincinnatus, he has avoided all offers of place or pension, all invitations to embark in public life; he has confined his manifold talents and his extraordinary versatility to the limits of his own estate. Perhaps, indeed, his determination, in this respect, may have been a prudent one; for, although any ministry would have been benefited by the unusual facility with which Sir Wilfrid would have flown from patriotic speeches to taxation and gagging bills; from prayers for peace to declarations of war; from professions of economy to measures of profusion; yet it must be confessed that his reluctance to remain a minute stationary would have driven him from one side of the house to the other, oftener than is seemly in a public man. Let it be understood that we speak with all due deference and respect for the numerous precedents which are to be found in our English history. Leaving great statesmen to settle this point, we can only express our opinion that our friend has certainly acted best for his own comfort, by choosing a quiet privacy, where he may "change every hour," undisturbed by the malevolence of envy, or the violence of faction.

His education was, in his youth, sadly neglected. Indeed, his father fluctuated so long, first between Eton and Westminster, and afterwards between Cambridge and Oxford, that it is marvellous to me how little Wilfrid picked up any education at all. He has, however, obtained just so much learning as enables him to cry up the Greeks and the Latins alternately, and to flirt with all the nine Muses in succession. He escaped the fatigue of deliberation in the choice of a profession, by the death of his father, who left him, in very early life, the heir to all his fortune, all his friendships, and all his follies. He spent his first two years upon the estate, occupied in reflections of no very serious import: such as, whether his coat should be red or green; whether his hunter should be bay or brown; whether his equipage should be a barouche or a curricle. So far all was sunshine; but some tempestuous days were approaching. It was suggested to him that the ancient family of the Weathercocks ought to have an heir to its honours and possessions. No evasion would serve; Sir Wilfrid must take a wife. He was now in a novel and a disagreeable dilemma. In any trifling part of his domestic economy, in the livery of his servants, in the arrangement of his dinner-table, in the fashion of his plate, he would have bowed without a murmur to the decision of his friends; but to inflict upon himself a wife, was a thing so utterly unlooked for and unprepared for, that Sir Wilfrid paused. He hesitated and decided, and hesitated again, through three years; at the termination of which he broke his leg in a fox-chase, grew quiet in consequence, sold his hounds, and looked out for a wife. Then another perplexity occurred. Who was to be the happy woman? He could never resolve to make so invidious a distinction.

"It is very true," said poor Sir Wilfrid, "that Miss Dormer has a very fine face, but then I never much admired her nose. I certainly have always preferred her cousin, although that unfortunate cast of the eye—well, well, I am a young man, and, as my aunt says, 'there is no hurry!' Miss Rayner is very beautiful, and has such charming dark hair; I always liked dark hair; yet I don't know if light is not as pretty—prettier sometimes—as, for instance, Miss Chevier's—only she is so insipid; I think Lady Mary is more fascinating, but then she is so terribly satirical. Perhaps her sister would make a better wife—if she was not such a fool!"

He consulted in this manner with himself for a long time: half the belles of the county were ready to pull caps for him, but he "prattled with fifty fair maids, and changed them as oft—" At last, in a fit of courage, he flung himself at the feet of his chosen one—talked some rhapsodies—sighed some sighs, and awaited his sentence. The lady was sorry, very sorry—and she was flattered, highly flattered—and she was sure, quite sure—it would only be attributed to her own want of discernment, that she declined the favour, the honour, the distinction—the—He heard no more; he hesitated; should he leave the room?—yes!—no!—yes!—and he escaped as well as he could.

He has continued to this day a bachelor. In spite of all solicitation, all persecution, he has remained, in this one instance, obstinate. In all others, he is a real Weathercock. He builds cottages, apparently with no object but that of pulling them down; and pulls them down, apparently with no object but that of building them up: he is a tory one hour, and a whig the next, and takes in the Chronicle and Courier alternately: he seldom reads more than half a number of a periodical work, and never wears the same coat above a month. In his conversation, he pursues the same plan—or rather want of plan. In short, in manner, in language, in business, and in pleasure, he sets an admirable example of mutability, which we shall always make it our study to imitate—especially when we take up our pens.

Of Sir Wilfrid's nephew and heir we shall here say nothing. We pass on, therefore, to the baronet's maiden sister, Lady Rachel Weathercock, who is nowise deficient in the peculiarities for which family is remarkable. Lady Rachel has now attained her fiftieth year; the caprices and follies of her youth have gradually subsided; and, in many points, she has become more stationary than a Weathercock ought to be. Her character, however, is just saved by one little ingredient, by which a person who is unacquainted with her habits may not be a little puzzled. Lady Rachel is an inveterate reader, an inveterate talker, and an inveterate arguer. You might, therefore, suppose that few subjects could be started upon which the lady would not ground a dispute—but it is no such thing. Her ladyship possesses such a delightful pliability of opinion, that it is hardly possible to differ from her upon any topic. We have heard her advocate and abuse every school of painting or poetry in almost immediate succession. She combats to-day the very opinions she maintained yesterday; yet, upon the very first semblance of a contradiction, she veers round forthwith, and proves herself a more accommodating antagonist, if possible, than the Neapolitans. Mr. Oakley was three hours in conversation with her; and though the burden of his song was No, No, No, he was unable to pick a quarrel. Like Sir Robert Bramble and Job, "they couldn't disagree—and so they parted."

The only remaining member of the family is Sir Wilfrid's niece. How delightful is your mutability, charming Leonora! You are like a chess-board, which is checkered with black and white squares alternately—or a melodrama, in which the tears of tragedy are relieved by the follies of farce—or a day in April, which blends rain with sunshine, summer with winter—or a periodical, in which the serious is united with the absurd, and pathos is intermingled with puns. What a wardrobe must be yours! To-day you assume the costume of the victim Mary—to-morrow, that of the executioner Elizabeth; you put off the diamonds of the queen for the garland of the peasant; the curls of the coquette for the veil of the nun. Your voice has a thousand tones; your lips have a thousand smiles; all of them distinct, yet all of them engaging! You are always the same, yet always varying; consistent only in your inconsistency! Be always so! we will build a fane in the most beautiful region of fancy; where no two flowers shall wear the same hue, no two days be of the same length or temperature: light gales shall breathe from all points of the compass by turns, and clear streams shall vary their course every hour; stability shall be sacrifice—and Leonora shall be the goddess of the temple.

THE ROMANCE OF JESSIE, THE FLOWER OF DUNBLANE

"Who would bear the whips and scorns of time,
"The oppressor's wrong, the proud man's contumely,
"The pang of despised love, the law's delay,
"The insolence of office, and the spurns
"That patient merit of the unworthy takes,
"When he himself might his quietus make
"With a bare bodkin?"

THE poet Tannahill is justly celebrated for his many sweet Scottish songs. His short life of poverty and unfortunate death are probably known only to the peasantry of his own country and the curious in biography. Poor Tannahill, stung with indignation from a sense of mortified pride, and, as he conceived, hopes blasted irre-rushed from a merry circle where he had spent the evening, and rashly put an end to all his earthly troubles, by drowning himself near the place of his nativity.

Many months previous to his death he had become gloomy and abstracted, and contemplated self-destruction with a fearful composure. The following words, solemnly addressed, and written by a brother poet on the eve of committing a similar act, were ever on his tongue:

"Good heavens! the mystery of life explain,
"Nor let me think I bear the load in vain;
"Lest, with the tedious journey, cheerless grown,
"Urged by despair, I throw the burden down."

Tannahill had long been the sport of wayward fate, occasioned, in some degree, by faults within himself; but more particularly by the apathy and remissness of his countrymen, who, with all their boasted generosity, neglected him. Like most poets, he was sensitive to excess, and deadly jealous of his fair fame. Always suspicious of the motives of his patrons, he was reserved and unamiable before them. That they should look down on him as an object for their commiseration, or entertain him as they would a paid creature for their amusement, was to his haughty spirit mortifying in the extreme; and, rather than submit to the humiliating caprice of patronage broadly assumed, he chose to clasp poverty to his aching heart, and, in the ragged abode of misery, was pleased to utter those brilliant strains of imagery and sentiment which have beguiled many a weary hour, and yet shall enliven the social circles in his native land—if there be any thing in immortality—to the "crack of doom."

The cause for irritation which immediately preceded his act of self-destruction was a supposed insult given by one of his associates on the fatal evening. Talent will always create envy, and, consequently, beget enemies, who will seize opportune moments to mortify and annoy. This is according to human nature, and poor Tannahill ought to have estimated it with the mind of a philosopher; but, unfortunately for himself, he carried within his bosom the heart of a poet, tremblingly "alive all o'er" with a high sense of honourable feeling, rendered still more intense by a vivid imagination.

Of his songs, none have been more universally esteemed than his "Jessie, the Flower of Dumblane." The beautiful imagery of the verse, and the plaintive sweetness of the air,* gained it an immediate popularity, which promises to be as lasting as the language in which it was written.

The fair subject of this song was a bonnie lassie in Dumblane. Her family were of poor extraction, and Jessie was contented with a peasant's lot. When Tannahill became acquainted with her, she was in her "teens," a slight dimple-cheeked, happy lassie; her hair yellow-coloured and luxuriant; her eyes large and full, overflowing with the voluptuous languor which is so becoming in young blue eyes with golden lashes. The tinge which lit up her oval cheek was delicate and evanescent, and her pulpy lips bubbled with bliss as she gave utterance to her heart.

Tannahill was struck with her beauty, and, as in all things he was enthusiastical, became, forthwith, her ardent worshipper. But her heart was not to be won. Young, thoughtless, panting to know and see the world, she left her poor lover "to con songs to his mistress' eyebrows," while she recklessly rambled among the flowery meads of Dumblane, or of an evening sang his inspired verses to him with the most mortifying nonchalance. This was a twofold misery to the sensitive poet. A creature so sweetly elegant, so dear to him, so very lovely and innocent, and yet, withal, so encased in insensibility as apparently neither to be conscious of the beauty of the verses trembling on her dulcet tongue, nor caring for the caresses of her lover—it was too much, to mark all this, and feel it with the feelings of a poet, was the acme of misery.

But the "Flower of Dumblane" was not that unfeeling, unimaginative being which Tannahill pictured her. She was a creature all feeling, all imagination, although the bard had not that in his person or manners to engage her attention or to arrest her fancy. The young affections are not to be controlled. Love, all mighty love, must be free, else it ceases to be love. Tannahill was plain in his person and manners, and felt and expressed discontentment at the cruel disappointments which it had been his unhappy fate almost invariably to encounter. Jessie, on the contrary, looked upon the world as a brilliant spectacle yet to be seen and enjoyed, as a vast paradise full of the beauty of heaven and of earth, where men walked forth in the image of their Creator, invested with his attributes, and where women trod proudly amidst the lovely creation, an angel venerated and adored. To express dissatisfaction under all these circumstances was to her mind the extravagance of a misanthrope, the madness of a real lover of misery, and a sufficient cause for her not to respect him. Both viewed the world through a false medium, and their deductions, although at variance, gave colour to their minds and accelerated their fate.

Jessie could not comprehend what appeared to her the folly of her suitor. She relished not his sickly sentiment; and as all woman-kind ever did so, she scorned a cooling lover. The bard was driven to despair, and, summoning up an unwonted energy of mind, departed, and left his adored to her youthful aberrations.

Soon after this period, the song of "Jessie, the Flower of Dumblane," together with the music, was published; and became a public favourite; it was sung every where, in theatres and at parties; a world of praise, was showered upon it from woman's flattering lips, and men became mad to know the adored subject of the lay. In a short period it was discovered. Jessie Monteith, the pretty peasant of Dumblane, was the favoured one. From all quarters, young men and bachelors flocked to see her, and her own sex were curious and critical. Many promising youths paid their addresses to her, and experienced the same reception as her first lover. Nevertheless, at last poor Jessie became really enamoured. A rakish spark, from Mid Lothian, adorned with education, being of polished manners, and confident from wealth and superiority of rank, gained her young affections. She too credulously trusted in his unhallowed professions. The ardour of first love overcame her better judgment, and abandoning herself to her love of passion, she made an imprudent escape from the protection of her parents, and soon found herself in elegant apartments near the city of Edinburgh.

The song of neglected Tannahill was to his Jessie both a glory and a curse; while it brought her into notice and enhanced her beauty, it laid the foundation for her final destruction. Popularity is a dangerous elevation, whether the object of it be a peasant or a prince: temptations crowd around it, and snares are laid on every hand. "Who would be eminent," said a distinguished child of popularity, "if they knew the peril, the madness and distraction of mind to which the creature of the popular breath is exposed?"

When the poet heard of the fate of his beloved Jessie, his heart almost burst with mental agony, and working himself into the enthusiastic frenzy of inspiration, poured forth a torrent of song more glowing and energetic than ever before dropped in burning accents from his tongue. It is to be lamented, that in a fit of disgust, he afterward destroyed those poetic records of his passion and resentment.

Ere three years had revolved their triple circuit after Jessie left her father's home, she was a changed woman. The companion of her flight had forsaken her. She was destitute in her splendid habitation. Her blue eyes looked pitiful on all things around her; her oval cheeks were indented by the hand of misery, and her face and person presented the picture of an unhappy, but amiable being. How changed was the figure clothed in silk, which moved on the banks of the Forth, from the happy, lively girl in Dumblane, dressed in the rustic garb of a peasant! But this is a subject too painful to dwell on: let us hasten to the catastrophe.

It was on an afternoon in July, a beautiful sunny afternoon, the air was calm and pure. The twin islands of the Forth, like vast emeralds set in a lake of silver, rose splendidly over the shining water, which now and then gurgled and mantled round their bases. Fifehire was spread forth like a map, her hundred of inland villages and cots tranquilly sleeping in the sunshine. The din of the artisans' hammers in Kirkcaldy and Queensferry smote the still air; and Dumfermline's apron'd inhabitants scattered forth their whitened webs beneath the noontide sun. On the opposite shore, Leith disgorged her black smoke, which rolled slowly in volumes to the sea. Edinburgh castle, like a mighty spirit from the "vasty deep," reared her gray bulwarks in air; and Arthur's Seat rose hugely and darkly in the back ground. The choruses of the fishermen, like hymns to the great spirit of the waters, ascended over New-Haven; and down from Grainsmouth, lightly booming o'er the tide, floated the tall bark. The world seemed steeped in happiness. But there was one, a wandering one, an outcast, wretched and despairing, amidst all this loveliness; her bosom was cold and dark, no ray could penetrate its depths; the sun shone not for her, nor did nature smile around but to inflict a more exquisite pang on the unfortunate. Her steps were broken and hurried. She now approached the water's edge, and then receded. No human creature was near to disturb her purpose—all was quietness and privacy; but there was an eye from above who watched all. Jessie Monteith—how mournfully sounds that name at this crisis! But Jessie sat herself down, and removing a shawl and bonnet from her person, and taking a string of pearl from her marble-seeming neck, and a gold ring, which she kissed eagerly, from her taper finger, she cast up her streaming eyes, meekly imploring the forgiveness of heaven on him, the cause of her misery and death. Scarce offering a prayer for herself, she breathed forth the names of her disconsolate parents, and ere the eye could follow her, she disappeared in the pure stream!

The sun shone on; the green of the earth stirred not a leaf; a bell did not toll; nor did a sigh escape from the lips of one human being, and yet the spirit of the loveliest of women passed away.

THE DRAMA.

FOR THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

PARK THEATRE.

For two months past we have daily turned over the southern papers, to read the accounts of the triumphant progress of every body's favourite, Miss Clara Fisher, through that part of the country, and busied ourselves from time to time with calculations of the interval that would elapse before she returned to gladden our northern eyes. At length she came—we went night after night to witness her delectable performances, and, sinners that we are! have not so much as indited a single worthless paragraph on so memorable an occasion; so that the countless myriads of people who peruse this invaluable paper, may have "burst in ignorance," if they have not had some more trust-worthy means of receiving the important intelligence. We hope, however, that Miss Fisher will be immediately re-engaged, or at all events before the end of the present season, which is now drawing fast towards a close. The manager can present no greater attraction, for there are people who will go and see Clara Fisher, though the thermometer stood at one hundred and twenty, and a state of "continual dissolution and thaw" were the inevitable consequence. During her present engagement she has not appeared in any new character, excepting as a lively widow and a peasant girl, in the new musical drama of "Home, sweet Home," a pretty trifle, translated from the French, and as light and pleasant as that light and pleasant people. French tragedy is the dullest and stiffest of all tragedy, and there is not much chance of its being any better so long as they dislike Shakespeare and laugh at the witches in Macbeth; and French comedy, with the exception of Moliere's, is not much better; but in "airy nothings," like the present—a combination of farce and melo-drama, with the broadest features of the one and the bloodiest of the other omitted—they are unrivalled. The French dramatists, like the French cooks, can furnish forth a pleasant entertainment out of very slender materials. A cook once made an incomparably rich soup out of Louis the Fourteenth's old listen slippers; and a dramatist of that nation will take a little bustle, a little intrigue, half a grain of wit, and quarter of a grain of humour, a particle of love, and an abundance of sentiment, and, with the help of a few cottages and peasants, a vineyard, some indifferent music, and excellent dancing, will compound a more agreeable mixture than an English dramatist with ten times as good materials. Why this is we cannot tell, but it is so; they have the knack of it, so there is no more to be said about the matter.

The plot of "Home, sweet Home," is sprightly enough: Maria, a peasant girl, of the mature age of fourteen, and a boy named Henry Le Roche, swear eternal constancy, and separate; the boy goes for a soldier—the girl stays behind, and remains constant, after the French fashion; that is, marries another, but is still true to her first love, merely, as she says with considerable naivete, giving her hand without her heart. Her old husband dies, and leaves the poor peasant girl a rich and dashing widow. The boy, after an interval of ten years, returns a man and a colonel; but having some misgivings that his pretty Savoyard will not suit the drawing-rooms of Paris, resolves to visit her in disguise. But what are the contrivances of a man to those of a woman, and that woman a widow? She discovers his plan, and way-lays him as Madame Gernance, and, in five minutes, the constant colonel is incontinent in love. He, however, tears himself away, and sets out to visit his first love; but the widow arrives at the village before him, and in the dress of the peasant Maria, by dint of singing and sentiment, again makes him prisoner. The worthy colonel is now in a quandary, being in love with two ladies at the same time—his heart is split in twain—he “owes a divided duty,” which is at last happily reconciled, by Maria and the widow very conveniently turning out to be one and the same person. Barry, as the colonel, was handsome and agreeable, and Clara, as the widow, gay and graceful enough to have seduced any man from his allegiance; but her acting as the innocent light-hearted Savoyard was better still; it only lasted one scene, but what there was of it was truly delightful—a perfect gem. The effect she gives to her songs with such limited powers of voice is wonderful. We could write a column on this subject, but a sincere respect for the feelings of our readers restrains us. There is an underplot, which, we presume, gives its name to the piece. A sentimental corporal, wishing to see his sweetheart and his “Home, sweet Home,” deserts from his regiment, the consequence of which is, that he nearly gets sent off to his long home, his commander not entering into his feelings on the occasion. A going-to-be-shot scene ensues, but a pardon arrives at the exact period when it always does, namely, when the culprit has marched three quarters across the stage, and a quantity of love, gratitude, thankfulness, with a merry finale, concludes “Home, sweet Home.” Mr. Richings, as the corporal, was highly respectable, and repressed that exuberance of passion and violence of jesticulation which characterizes the acting of Kean and Mr. R. There was a beautiful song, “When the Pilgrim returns,” allotted to him, which he sung with taste and feeling, and with all the effect that his voice is capable of giving. One of the most amusing things in the piece was a servant of the colonel’s, played by T. Placide—a brother of the popular actor of that name—though the whole humour of the part consists in the repetition of the word “enthusiasm” in season and out of season. This, together with the good acting of Mrs. Sharpe, Mr. Simpson, and Barnes, sent the audience away in great good humour with “Home, sweet Home.” The music, by Bishop and Lee, is of itself well worth going to hear. This is really a fine time of day to give an account of a new piece; but as it was highly successful, and will, doubtless, be frequently repeated, it may serve to give an idea of it to those who have not seen it, and refresh the memories of those who have. AMERICAN OPERA HOUSE.

* The air is composed by R. A. Smith, of Edinburgh. The verses, too, are indebted to his critical acumen, the manuscript song having been twice the length of the printed one. The writer of this received the intelligence of the fact from Mr. Smith, who was on intimate terms with Tannahill, and often endeavoured to cheer up the drooping spirit of the bard.

Accident alone has heretofore prevented our bestowing a passing remark upon this new establishment. We say new, because its name, its front, its manager, and its company, are new. Who does not remember Chatham theatre, which, in the days of its original projector and proprietor, was the most popular place of amusement in this city? But the eccentric little Frenchman was called to a more permanent scene of action, and the Chatham, after passing successively through a variety of hands, and as many internal changes and mutations, has recently been resuscitated from a death-like lethargy, to a state of vigorous activity. Mr. Hackett has converted the establishment into what he denominates the “American Opera House,” for the representation of operas, farces, melo-dramas, &c. A handsome new front, in imitation of marble, has been erected in Chatham-street, and the corridor leading to the main building widened and embellished. A company, comprising some first-rate talent, has been collected. Every one knows what a cool, pleasant summer theatre it is, and we sincerely hope Mr. Hackett will have a profitable season. The Chatham garden, which has also been opened for the season, is a pleasant resort. The fountain has been repaired, and bordered with a rich belt of verdure, while the brim of its basin is tastefully fringed with flowers in full bloom. The trees have leaved forth in luxuriance, and the paths are all ornamented with shrubbery. A wall of separation has been placed between the two establishments.

We understand that Mr. Gilfert has succeeded in obtaining another lease of the Bowery theatre, and that he is again making his “little arrangements for the whole United States!”

NATURAL HISTORY.

SINGING BIRDS.

An English naturalist observes, that those who have attended minutely to the singing of birds, may have distinguished a provincial accent in those of different English counties; and that hence the chaffinches of Essex are much more highly valued than others. He quotes our favourite ornithologist as saying, that birds differ as widely as men in tone, energy, and expression. “There was one wood-thrush,” says Wilson, “with whose notes I was so familiar that I recognized him the moment I entered the woods. He serenaded the forest with notes as clear as those of the nightingale.”

THE MOCKING BIRD.

Mr. Rennie, in an article on American song birds, in the January number of the Magazine of Natural History, has an interesting account of the mocking bird, which he says seems to be the prince of all song birds, being altogether unrivalled in the extent and variety of his vocal powers; and besides the fulness and melody of his original notes, he has the faculty of imitating the notes of all other birds, from the clear mellow tones of the wood-thrush to the savage scream of the bald eagle. In measure and accents he faithfully follows his originals, while in force and sweetness of expression he greatly improves upon them. His own notes are bold and full, and varied seemingly beyond all limits. They consist of short expressions of two, three, or at most five or six syllables, generally expressed with great emphasis and rapidity, and continued with undiminished ardour for half an hour or an hour at a time. While singing, he expands his wings and his tail glistening with white, keeping time to his own music, and the buoyant gaiety of his action is no less fascinating than his song. He often deceives the sportsman, and even birds themselves are sometimes imposed upon by this admirable mimic. In confinement he loses little of the power or energy of his song. He whistles for the dog; Caesar starts up, wags his tail, and runs to his master. He cries like a hurt chicken; and the hen hurries about, with feathers on end, to protect her injured brood. His imitations of the brown thrush are often interrupted by the crowing of cocks; and his exquisite warblings of the blue bird are mingled with the screaming of swallows or the cackling of hens. During moonlight, both in the wild and tame state, he sings the whole night long. The hunters, in their night excursions, know that the moon is rising the instant they begin to hear this delightful solo. His natural notes partake of a character similar to those of the brown thrush, but they are more sweet, more expressive, more varied, and uttered with greater rapidity.

THE NEW-YORK MIRROR.

The Collegians.—This is among the best, if not the very best, of the Irish novels; by which appellation we mean to designate those tales of which the scene is laid in Ireland. The characters are almost exclusively Irish, and the spirit entirely so; for there are novels possessing the two first requisites, without the last, obviously written by Englishmen, and giving incorrect views and notions of Irish feeling, character, and manners. The collegians are two young men of the same rank in life, educated alike, and similarly situated, so far as externals are concerned; but in disposition wide as the poles asunder; as are their destinies, if it be not a perversion of language to apply that term to what are merely the results of the respective characters and actions of the individuals. If we are not deceived, this tale is founded upon facts; it is strongly impressed upon our mind, that we have read a narrative of the leading features of the story, in the unembellished but interesting form of a law report. It is but justice to the unknown writer to say, that he has made most excellent use of his materials; that from them he has constructed a story of deep and touching interest, abounding with natural and well-told incidents, felicity of expression, and fine touches of individual character, strongly marked, indeed, but not surpassing nature and experience. There is scarcely one of the personages of the story, of whom the reader cannot say, “I have known a being like this.” The purpose of the author has not been merely to write an attractive tale, but to exhibit some of the innumerable varieties of human disposition, governing, or strongly influenced by, circumstances, and the effects of passion, when unrestrained by principle. In this object, he has entirely succeeded; and the result is a valuable, instructive, and highly entertaining book. In his style we think we have discovered a resemblance to that of Mr. Galt; and that many of the characteristics of the “Entail,” and “Sir Andrew Wylie,” may be perceived in the “Collegians.” In conception and delineation of character particularly, there is no inferiority to those popular novels; Hardras Cregau, and Polly Naughton, and Danny the lord, will bear a comparison with almost any of Mr. Galt’s creatures. Would our limits permit, we should be pleased to make some extracts; but, as it is, we must be content with expressing the pleasure with which we have read the “Collegians,” and with recommending them to our readers as a means of procuring to themselves an equal degree of gratification. The work is in two volumes, and is published by the Messrs. Harpers.

Twelve Years of Military Adventure.—We have read these well-written volumes, which, though not of so exciting a nature as the preceding, are still very entertaining. The author appears to be a man of good plain sense and some power of observation, and has wisely confined himself to giving, in unpretending language, the results of his dozen years of service. The first volume consists principally of the early campaigns of Lord Wellington—then General Wellesley—in India; the second, of the masterly career of the same illustrious commander in the Peninsula. This last is, of course, the most interesting portion of the work, at least to us Americans. There is nothing, indeed, particularly new contained in it, so far as the general operations of the campaigns are concerned, but the details of these are agreeably interspersed with anecdotes and accounts of private adventures of the author, forming altogether a pleasing narrative, with which the reader may wile away his leisure hours very satisfactorily. As a book of reference, moreover, “Twelve Years of Military Adventure” is not without its value; for there is every reason to believe its details to be strictly and invariably authentic. Seymour, Fanshew, Sleight, Clayton & Van Norden, are the publishers.

Tales of Military Life.—We regret to say, that we cannot join with the English periodicals in the commendations which they have been pleased to bestow upon this work. The first and longest story, “Vandaleur,” is interesting, and this is all that can be said of it. There is no striking discrimination of character; no fine knowledge of human nature displayed in it. The good people are all angels, and the bad people all devils incarnate; the former are in tribulation for a time, and the latter are finally exposed and punished for the especial benefit of the reader, who knows that it must be so, from the very beginning. In short, we cannot help considering these “Tales of Military Life” as very stupid affairs, regular catchpennies, such as any hack-writer for the London press would contract to furnish at the rate of four per annum for a moderate compensation.

Christian Examiner.—Among the periodical publications which confer honour on this country, this one deserves a pre-eminent rank, for its independent opinions, its liberal, yet manly tone, its pure morality, and its vigorous thoughts and chaste style. Dr. Channing, one of the first didactic writers in the English language, is its editor, and he is likely to elevate it to a high and splendid popularity. He has lately enlarged the work and amplified its general plan, so as to admit all subjects of literary, as well as of strictly theological discussion.

Reminiscences.—The communication of Imogene is interesting to all, but particularly so to those who understand its allusion. The ladies of New-York will perchance recognize the resemblance. No personal feeling shall ever be wounded, nor shall the retirement of private life be ever violated in the Mirror, but the world of fashion as it moves by us, affords many subjects which may be slightly sketched without any unkind feelings or disagreeable consequences, and we solicit from our fair correspondent more characters drawn from real life. There is an ease in her writings which renders them welcome to all, and the plan of selecting subjects from the immediate world around us cannot fail to prove both amusing and instructive.

Strawberries and Green Peas.—Our friends of Philadelphia are boasting of their early strawberries and green peas. One of their papers informs us, that “notwithstanding the supposed backwardness of the season, vegetation seems going on as in a Russian summer!”

ADDITIONAL LINES BY OUR FAIR CORRESPONDENT, THYREA.

May all the dreams that gaily now
Glide through thy youthful fancy,
Still to thy life their charm bestow,

And evermore entrance thee:
May the blessings round thee beaming,
Be more than fancy's dreaming!

Though life has clouds that, dark and deep,
Frown on their victim sadly,
For thee may all their terrors sleep,

And sunshine ever glad thee;
May friendship's smile, and love's caressing,
Make life to thee a blessing!

THE LOST PLEIAD.

WHY, when a thousand stars, less bright,
Were lonely wandering through the sky,
Shouldst thou, fair daughter of the night,
Be singled out so soon to die?
Thy lovely sisters linger still,
Although the place which thou shouldst fill
Is vacant now. Wilt thou return,
Again among that band to burn?
Their hymn thy sisters nightly pour,
In pensive notes, out on the air,
In tones of sadness, that no more
Thy rich voice mingles with them there.
The dewy gems that fill the flowers,
Through all this bright green land of ours,
Are tears of grief thy sisters shed
For thee, the loved, the lost, the dead!
Perhaps thou still art in the sky,
From thy beloved home afar,
Beyond the reach of human eye,
A lone and melancholy star;
Pining with grief among the throng,
Ne'er mingling in their joyous song,
Nor holding converse with the few,
But palely burning 'mid the blue.
'Tis always thus—the loveliest
On earth, as well as in the sky,
Are shining marks above the rest,
To fade away, and droop, and die.
Canst thou behold from thy lone stand,
Those lovely ones linked hand in hand,
And hear the deep and plaintive song
They've nightly sung for thee so long?
When this our world shall melt in gloom,
Its joys all sink to rise no more,
Its lovely things all find a tomb,
Amid the last conflicting roar;
Then shalt thou find a long-lost home,
No more to part, no more to roam,
From that beloved and happy band,
So long as heaven's broad dome shall stand.

Thus the cold spectre-hand of death
Parts friends from all they love below;
Breathes on their hopes his poisonous breath,
And lays their joyous prospects low:
But they, at length, like thee shall rise,
And meet again where purer skies
Float over brighter lands than this,
Where all is love, and joy, and bliss.

TO A FRIEND.

I dare not think that, when years depart,
No change will be found in thee;
I dare not believe there is yet one heart
That will still remain true to me.
I dare not hope that the future scene,
Which so fair in the distance appears,
Will be brighter than all the past has been,
When joined to those vanished years.
The visions that shed o'er my earliest days
A brilliant and beautiful light,
Were the visions of friendship and love—and their rays
Have set in the darkness of night.
Then why should I think that a later beam
Less transient and fading will be?
Or why should I hope that a wilder dream
Will have more of reality?
It is, that there seems such a promise of truth,
And candour and faith with thee,
That I cannot doubt—though the lessons of youth
Have been a sad warning to me.
But ah! I will yield to illusion still,
Or trust to the confidence
That friendship's pure and unbroken spell
Has given for thy defence.
There is that in thy calm and open brow
That tells me I am not deceived,
That assures me these thoughts and feelings now,
Are, by thee, understood and believed.
Then fare thee well—when the evening star
Shines over the deep blue sea,
Thou wilt think of thy home and thy friends afar,
And oh, then, remember me!

SONG.

Say a kind farewell, my Mary!
Here's a kind farewell to thee!
'Tis the last time ever, Mary,
Thou'lt say farewell to me.
I'll not depart in sorrow,
Nor mourn upon the shore;
But I'll smile upon to-morrow,
And the sea-wave and its roar.
I dreamed a heart was mine,
With its passion and its joy;
And oh! the heart was thine,
And I loved it as a boy.
But all is over now, Mary,
The dream and the delight;
And I'll bury all beside, Mary,
In forgetfulness to-night.
I'll sing the song that others sing;
I'll pass the jest with all;
And I will not tame my spirit's wing
In banquet or in hall;
But I'll fill one cup alone, Mary,
To drown thy maiden spell;
And I'll drain that cup to thee, Mary,
For a health and a farewell!
When the snow-white sails are set,
And the seaward gale is blowing,
My eyes shall not be wet;
My tears shall not be flowing;
But when England fades away, Mary,
And I'm lone upon the sea;
Oh! I'll look tow'ards England, then, Mary,
And sigh farewell to thee.

THE TWO EMILIES.

"WELL! this is sufficiently tantalizing," exclaimed young Harry Ponsonby, as he sat at his solitary breakfast, sipping a cup of very indifferent tea, and perusing a letter which had just been brought him. "Now, here have I been for this month past, thinking, dreaming, and talking of nothing else than my expected meeting with my dear little Emily; and at the very moment I am going to set off post on this delightful errand, comes this confounded letter, to quash all my hopes!—Deuce take me if I go at all," said the impatient youth, tossing the unwelcome epistle from him to the furthest corner of the room.

The letter which called forth this burst of impatience from the youthful lover, was from his guardian, Mr. Devereux, and we shall give its purport in his own words as follows:

"DEAR HARRY,—We are rejoiced to hear of your success at Cambridge, and at the near prospect of seeing you here. Had your little mistress been with us at present, we should no doubt have had mighty preparations for your reception at Stokely, and you might have had the satisfaction of throwing yourself and your laurels at the young lady's feet in the true heroic style. But joking apart, my dear Harry, though sorry for your disappointment, I think it may be just as well that my ward and you should not be thrown together until the childish impressions received when you were last here shall have undergone the test of time, and till the influence of society, and the attractions of others may have had free scope to act upon the unfettered hearts of both.

"You no doubt thought me a surly fellow, when I forbade all childish promises; but you may live to thank me for my obduracy, and mean time you must console yourself as best you can, or if much at a loss, may practise pretty speeches at the expense of my Emily, who, though not perhaps so gay as her lively cousin, is very much what her father could wish her to be; and who, together with Mrs. Betty and myself, will be delighted to see you at Stokely Priory," &c. &c.

"Well! perhaps Mr. Devereux was right, and I was wrong after all," said Ponsonby, as after another perusal, he crumpled the letter into his pocket, and threw himself into the carriage which had been in waiting for some time. "But unfortunately the promise was given before I was aware of his intentions, or at least before I had done more than half suspect them. And now, what if Emily should have grown up coarse!—but surely that is impossible;—she was so pretty and so playful.—Let me see, it is just five years since I saw her last—she was then but thirteen; and now she is eighteen—what a charming age!"—and in contemplation of that golden age, and on the change which five years must have made upon his Emily—the hours rolled on, and so did the carriage until he arrived at Stokely Priory.

It was a bitter sharp evening in the end of February; the ground was covered with snow, and the sound of the carriage wheels was scarcely to be heard as it swept round the circle, and stopped at the door of his guardian's mansion.

Ponsonby was one of those youths who delight in surprises, and who love to throw the whole precise arrangements of a quiet family into confusion. He congratulated himself, therefore, that no one appeared at the door to receive him, except the old butler, a favourite domestic of the family, and was still better pleased, when old John assured him, that he might, if desirous of so doing, steal upon the family quite unawares.

"For," added he, "master always makes Miss Emily sing to him after dinner until the candles come, while he sits listening with his eyes shut, in one arm-chair, and Mrs. Betty is sleeping in t'other; so if you go in by the anteroom, sir, you may hear Miss Emily sing, and she be never the wiser; but you know, sir, it's not your Miss—I mean, sir, that it's t'other Miss Emily, master's daughter, that's at home now."

"I know, I know, John; I shall be very happy to see Miss Devereux, and to make acquaintance with her."

"So saying, Harry stepped lightly up the stair-case, and softly opened the door of the apartment which led to the drawing-room, he stopped for a moment, lest the noise of his footsteps should arrest the sweet sounds which met his ear from thence. Oh, what a voice was that! so soft, so full, so sweet!—but it was not his Emily who sang, and a pang of disappointment thrilled through his breast.

Harry was passionately fond of music, and he stood chained to the spot, drinking in the rich melody which seemed formed to penetrate his soul. The air was one he well knew,—it was a beautiful French air from the opera of Joconde—"Dans un delire extreme." There was something in the tenderness with which the words

"Et l'on revient, toujours, toujours,
A ses premieres amours!"

were breathed, which thrilled through his heart. Had it been his Emily who sung, what a moment of delight would this have been! But he had no time to sigh or to think about the matter, for old John entered the room with candles, and at this moment an exclamation of surprise, and, as Harry fancied, of pleasure, escaped the lips of the lovely songstress—for lovely she indeed appeared, as she started from the instrument, her cheek suffused with the brightest blushes, while she hastily extended, and as hastily drew back, the prettiest little hand in the world.

"Papa, it is Mr. Ponsonby," said Emily, "and I have almost introduced myself to him."

Mr. Devereux rose to welcome Harry, and complete the introduction, while Mrs. Betty rubbed her eyes, and, putting on her spectacles, exclaimed,

"Bless me! Master Harry! it surely can't be;—why, he is a finer man than his father was, and that I thought hardly possible."

"Do spare my blushes, dear Mrs. Elizabeth," said Ponsonby, grasping the old lady's hand with much kindness; "you know I was always a modest youth, and I would not have my fair cousin think me otherwise now, although I have been so bold as to steal upon you unannounced; but the temptation old John held out was not to be resisted, and the sounds I have heard not easily to be forgotten."

"What, Mr. Ponsonby, and you have been a listener," said the blushing Emily; "well, my cousin Emily told me many of your faults, but she did not give me reason to believe you were so very unprincipled."

"Did Emily speak of me to you?" inquired Harry with eagerness; "and what did she say?—You must tell me what faults she said I had, that I may set about reforming them."

"Come, come," said Mr. Devereux, "we shall not enter upon so ample a field at present; see the urn is smoking on the table, and no tea in it yet. Why, Emily, you are getting as giddy as your cousin; and I have been telling Harry here, that you are a paragon of steadiness and regularity."

An arch smile played for a moment around the rosy lips of Emily, as, without farther reply, she rose and began to busy herself in the duties of the tea-table. Harry and his guardian talked about his Cambridge studies and future views; and thus, between the grave and gay, the evening quickly passed in pleasant conversation.

When Ponsonby had retired at night to his old quarters in the blue room, he cast around him a glance of cheerful recognition upon every familiar thing, grown dear from the recollections and associations of childhood.

"Well," said he mentally, "were my little Emily but here, I should feel just as I used to do, and we might be as happy as possible."

But Harry was at that moment aware that in truth he did not just feel as he used, or as he ought to have done. The beauty and attractions of the present Emily had filled his heart with a troubled delight, and he felt the necessity of wishing for the presence of the absent Emily, to protect his plighted faith.

"Then this Emily is so like her cousin," reasoned he with his own conscience, "that I almost forget myself in her presence; and yet she is different too—more grave, more thoughtful. My Emily's face was ever speaking, even when her tongue was silent."

Thus making out a catalogue of his little Emily's charms, and confusing them gradually with those of her lovely cousin, the bewildered Ponsonby fell asleep.

A week had passed away, and Ponsonby was forced to acknowledge that his uncle's acquaintance with the human heart was greater than his own, and that it would have been far better for himself, had he submitted to be governed by it. But the fault of Harry Ponsonby had ever been impetuosity, and it required all the generosity of his disposition, and all his high sense of honour, to atone for the imprudences which he too often committed.

Little Emily as she had always been called to distinguish her from her cousin, who was a few months older, and formed upon a larger scale, was the orphan daughter of a younger brother of Mr. Devereux. He had filled a high situation in India, and upon the death of his wife, sent home his only child to be educated with her cousin. His own death quickly followed, and Emily's recollections of her parents and of India, were but as a dream, while all the bright realities of youth were connected with Stokely Priory, and the kind friends she had found there. Mr. Devereux was a widower, but the two Emilies passed their earlier years under the tuition of an excellent governess, between whose attentive solicitude, and the caresses of good aunt Betty, the loss of a mother was never felt. Mrs. Elizabeth Devereux was an unmarried sister of Mr. Devereux's father, and consequently grand aunt to the children. She was the kindest of women, and the sweetest of old maids. She did not attempt, with her old fashioned habits and ideas, to reform the ways and manners of the young; but she entered into their tastes, and made allowance for their feelings and their manners, for which she was repaid by the tenderest affection and the most watchful care.

As the cousins grew out of childhood, Mr. Devereux found it necessary to alter his plan of educating them together. Their governess had accepted an advantageous offer of superintending a limited establishment for young ladies; and the increasing infirmities of his aunt, made Mr. Devereux unwilling to deprive her of the society of both the little girls at once. A plan was therefore arranged, that the cousins should each alternately be for a year with their former governess, Mrs. Hartley, and with their grand-aunt at Stokely, until their education should be completed. Thus it happened, that during the twelve months which Harry had passed with his guardian, previous to his quitting him for college, the younger Emily had been his only companion, and the natural consequence of their being thus thrown together, was a growing affection for each other. Ponsonby then thought that his love for Emily was the sweetest, and would be the most enduring feeling of his existence: he had cherished it during five long years of absence, and had been proud to feel that it never was stronger than at the moment when he expected to be restored to her. All this was true—and even now he felt that sweet and young affection warm at his heart!—ah no!—how different from this was the wild tumultuous feeling which now swelled his breast and beat in every pulse, as woman, lovely, full-grown woman, asserted her sway, and burst upon him in all her charms!

But not unchecked did young Ponsonby permit himself to indulge in this sweet intoxication; severely did he take himself to task, and yet he scarce could say whence the blame had arisen. He had come prepared to love his own long-cherished mistress, yet ere one wandering thought had sprung within his breast, he had listened to that voice which could never be forgotten, and gazed on those bewitching eyes which still would follow him wherever he went. Yet was it long before the youth would admit the painful, humiliating truth, that his first love was extinguished, or had never deserved the name of that omnipotent passion. His upright honourable heart turned with pain from the possibility of such unfaithfulness, and he shut his eyes to the danger, and resolved to struggle with it, if it indeed existed.

Thus passed the time away, and Ponsonby felt his task becoming more difficult every hour, nor did Emily appear to aid him in it. It was true, she rather encouraged than checked him in any allusion to his youthful attachment; nay, she dwelt with emphasis upon the minutest circumstances regarding it, which had been confided to her by her artless cousin; and Harry thought she almost took a malicious pleasure in attaching importance to them, at the very time when he was wincing under the recollection of his fetters. Yet it was difficult to reconcile this mischievous triumph with the deep blush of pleasure which would suffuse her cheek, when she herself was the exclusive object of his attention. Thus, as the conduct of Emily became every day a greater enigma to Ponsonby, and consequently fixed more of his observation, his heart became more and more filled with her image. He tried to satisfy himself as to the state of her feelings, but his efforts were vain. Her character was much too open, and her disposition too generous to admit the imputation of coquetry, and yet at times her conduct was inconsistent—almost capricious. Puzzled with Emily, and dissatisfied with himself, Ponsonby resolved to turn from the dangerous contemplation. He would busy himself with books—he would only make his appearance when the assembled family party would render the meeting less dangerous to him.

It was after having thus absented himself for some days, that he chanced to meet with Emily on her return from an early walk, and though he had resolved on striking into an opposite path, such is the weakness of a lover's forbearance, that his resolution failed him at the moment, and he could not resist joining the enchantress. He even induced her to prolong her walk, by observing that the day was too inviting to allow of her returning to the house, and requested permission to accompany her. But no sooner had he made the request than he repented of it, for it seemed as if the lady was more disposed to resent his unlooked for attention than to accept of it.

"Pray, Mr. Ponsonby," said the provoking girl, "to what am I indebted for this unusual piece of gallantry? I rather think the sun has shone quite as brightly for this week past, but neither it, nor any thing else has been able to draw you from your room. I hope my absent cousin has had more of your thoughts of late than we of your company, or I fear she may have reason to repent of her early preference. Does Mr. Ponsonby avoid thinking of the absent, as studiously as he does talking of them?"

"What can you mean, Emily? Surely I have never avoided talking of your cousin when an opportunity has offered."

"But you have avoided the opportunity," said the saucy girl, "which comes to the same thing.—Poor little Emily! I fear she runs much risk of being forgotten altogether; and yet it's no fault of mine, for I am sure when we were together, I reminded you of her daily, hourly—did I not, Harry?"

"Oh, Emily!" exclaimed the agitated Ponsonby, grasping her hand, "you do indeed remind me of her, and that so powerfully, that at times I scarce know which Emily I am thinking of or speaking to. I look on you as I should look on her! I think of you when I should think of her, and wish, and wish—what is impossible—that there was but one Emily in the world for me, and she was—"

"Oh, do not say it, Harry!" exclaimed the now trembling girl, placing her hand upon his lips, as if to stop the words she dared not hear.

"Come, come, I must not listen to this nonsense.—I shall go to Mrs. Hartley's and send Emily to you, and then you will have your wish, and I shall have mine; for believe me, dear Harry, there is nothing I desire so earnestly as that you should continue true to your first affection."

With these words Emily returned to the house, leaving Ponsonby more bewildered than ever.

"Nothing that she desires so much as that I should be true to my first affection!" repeated Harry.

"Strange, unaccountable girl!—But be it so!—The task becomes easier, now that I know that she does not love me. And now I have but to school my own heart, and avoid the dangerous pleasure of being alone with this bewitching creature while she remains here."

But this schooling of the heart, Ponsonby found no easy task. Every member of the family appeared to have a plot to bring this unfortunate couple together. Even good Mrs. Elizabeth innocently lent her aid,—she could not make out her evening walk unless supported by an arm of each; and when she had reached her accustomed distance, she would urge Harry and Emily to continue their way a little farther, giving them frequently some commission of benevolence to perform, which she herself was unable to accomplish.

It was while proceeding one afternoon, on a mission of this nature, to the cottage of an old Scotchwoman, a pensioner of Mrs. Betty's, that Emily and Ponsonby had been induced to prolong their walk. The evening was sultry, almost to breathlessness; and as Emily leant on the arm of her companion, slowly pursuing their way, a more than usual constraint seemed to weigh on the spirits of both. Few words had been uttered by either, until they reached blind Margaret's door, and they felt it a relief when the old woman appeared, seated in her usual sunny corner at the end of the house. She arose, and spreading down her apron, seemed prepared to welcome them long before the silent pair believed it possible for her to be aware of their approach.

"Well, Margaret, and how are you to-night?" said Emily advancing; "I have brought a friend with me to see you, and you must tell who it is before he speaks. You know I always said you was a witch, Margaret, and now I am sure of it, for you rose to-night to receive us before even 'Fine Ear,' in the fairy tale, could have told we were coming."

"Na, na, Miss Emily, I'm no a witch, nor as little a fairy," said the old woman; "the gifts which witches and fairies possessed are no bestowed on mortals now-a-days; yet heaven has given a sense to the blind which amais makes up for that which he has seen fit to deprive them of, and I dinna think it needed any witchcraft to tell that it was Maister Harry coming up the loan, switching the thistles and nettles wi' his cane, as he used to do when he was a laddie, and little Miss Emily would aye be trotting after him. His step is no sae light to-night as it used to be in ither days, and yet I would hae kent it among a thousand!"

"Thank you, Margaret, for your kind remembrance of me and my boyish tricks," said Harry, kindly shaking hands with the old woman. "I was not aware that I was disciplining the thistles to-night. I think I might have been cured of that bad habit ere now."

"And I thought sae too, Maister Harry, for ye may mind weel it cost you a sair heart when you was younger than you are the day, and you nearly whipped out little Miss Emily's een, driving about you with your switch—ay, I mind weel how you brought the dear bairn in to me, and I couldna mak out which of you had got the hurt, for you was crying and she was comforting you—till the sweet bairn said, 'Never mind, Harry, for if I am blind, you will lead me about and promise never to leave me; and I shall be far happier than poor old Margaret, for she has nobody to be kind to her'—And then you promised!"

"Oh, Margaret, you must not be remembering all the foolish things I said and promised when I was a boy," said Ponsonby, colouring deeply; "one gets wiser as they get older."

"Aweel, aweel, see that it be sae, my young gentleman; but remember it's ae thing whiles to be wise, and anither to be honest, and I never saw muckle good come of the wisdom that made folk no like to hear of their youthful promises.—But winna ye step into the house, Miss Emily, as ye used to do, for I feel an unco weight in the air, and I'm thinking we'll no be lang without a shower?"

"Indeed," said Ponsonby, looking at the sky, "it is darkening all round us; Emily, we must hurry homeward."

Emily, who saw that her companion was impatient under the ill-timed recollections of poor old Margaret, availed herself of the threatening appearance of the clouds, to shorten their visit; so with an assurance to the old woman of visiting her soon again, they took their leave, and left the cottage.

They were nearly two miles distant from the Priory, and Ponsonby observing the fast increasing darkness, and feeling the sulphurous oppression of the air, began to fear that the storm would break before they could reach its shelter. He would have urged Emily to strike across the wood, as affording a nearer path, but just when about to propose this measure, the first flash of lightning broke from the clouds, and he thought it safer to keep the open fields, even at the risk of exposure to the coming rain. Emily was no coward, but the rattling peal of thunder which immediately followed the vivid flash, declared how alarmingly close the danger was, and clinging, pale and breathless, to her companion, she felt the blessing of having such an arm to support her trembling steps.

"Lean on me, dearest Emily," said Ponsonby: "try to hasten your steps; if you can reach the old barn at the end of the field, it will afford you shelter from the rain;" and they quickened their pace with this hope. But now the clouds burst at once over their heads, the rain descended in torrents, and when they reached the old barn, they found that all the protection they could gain was from the outer wall, for the door was fastened so securely as to resist all Harry's most powerful attempts at forcing an entrance. In vain he led her to the most sheltered side of the wall, the violence of the gale made it impossible for him to screen her from the drenching rain, and Ponsonby saw with dismay, her light garments wet through, and clinging to her slender form.

In a moment he stripped off his coat, in spite of Emily's entreaties to desist, and holding it between her and the blast, he placed himself as a further shelter against its fury. At length came a flash of such startling brightness, that Emily clung to her companion with convulsive fear, and Ponsonby himself was thoroughly alarmed. He drew the trembling and almost lifeless girl to his bosom, and gazing earnestly on her pale face, he conjured her to open her eyes and look at him!—to speak to him if but a word!—for her silence and death-like paleness had filled him with unutterable terror.

"Emily! you are not hurt?—you are only frightened? Oh say so, dearest! speak to me if it be but a word!"

"No, I am not hurt, and I ought not to be frightened," said the still trembling girl; "but, dearest Harry, that flash—that awful flash! it seemed to fall so frightfully near to where you stood. Oh, heaven! if it had fallen on you!"—and she looked up at him with an expression of tenderness and anguish that thrilled to his inmost soul.

"Emily, dearest Emily! and was it for me you feared? and would you have regretted me—would you have grieved for me had I been taken from you?—then grieve for me—then pity me now! Oh, Emily! believe me that the stroke which would have laid me at your feet—which would have purchased for me those precious tears, would be less terrible than what I now feel—the bitter, bitter pang, that now we must part for ever! Yes, Emily, in this moment of terror the sweetest, yet the saddest of my life, I must be allowed to speak to you—to say all, and then—Emily, I love you!—deeply, fondly love you!—nay, do not stop me now—when I have said this, I have said all. You know my faith is pledged to another;—I have been rash—imprudent—against my will unfaithful. But dishonourable or unprincipled, I cannot and I will not be—I cannot offer you my heart; worthless as it is, it is the property of another, although filled with your image alone. Hers it is to keep, or to reject; but faithless, rebellious as it is, it cannot be a gift for you. I now must lay it open to that injured one. Oh that I had never seen her, or seen but her alone!"

He paused, overcome with contending feelings: he looked at Emily, but her countenance expressed no recoiling horror—there was no cold disdain in her tearful eyes; she still clung to him with confiding tenderness, and though she wept, they did not seem bitter tears. He clasped her to his heart: he felt he was beloved, and tasted for a moment the deepest bliss this world has to bestow.

It was but for a moment—the next he almost thrust her from him.

"Oh, Emily! do not look upon me thus, or I shall be a villain!" and he tore himself shuddering from her arms. At this moment, the voice of Mr. Devereux was heard approaching them, and Ponsonby hailed it as that of his guardian angel. Too much agitated to speak, he placed Emily in her father's arms, and was hastily retreating, when his guardian caught him by the arm.

"What has happened, Harry?" inquired the anxious father; "are either of you hurt?"—But still receiving no reply, he looked more suspiciously at the conscious pair—the truth appeared to burst upon him.

"Go, young man," said he, in a tone of displeasure—"go and order the carriage here—it is well for some that it is at no great distance, for neither of you seem very able for much exertion. It will be well also to assume a little more composure before reaching home; for there is one waiting your arrival who may as little comprehend your present agitation as I do. Emily, your cousin is come, and Mrs. Hartley's carriage now waits for you."

Ponsonby remained to hear no more. Darting from his guardian, he beckoned for the carriage to attend them, and plunging into the wood, he took a path which led him in an opposite direction to the Priory.

The rain had now ceased; the blue sky appeared once more, and the last rays of the setting sun were reflected from a thousand sparkling gems, which bent the heavy branches to the ground. But the unhappy Ponsonby heeded not the beauty of the sky, nor yet the wetness of the tangled wood through which he forced his way. To remove from Stokely, and from all it contained, was the only distinct feeling of his heart. Yet the freshness of the air, and the fragrance of the woods, allayed by degrees the fever of his mind, and cooled his burning brow. He reached a summer-house in the furthest part of the wood, and resolved to remain there, until all chance of meeting with Emily should be over. He could not bear the thought of seeing together the two beings whom on earth he had best loved and most deeply injured.

Many were the agitating thoughts which tortured the brain of Ponsonby during this anxious interval; but none of them was so painful as the recollection of the earnest persuasion, by which he overcame the reluctant timidity of his young and gentle Emily, and forced from her a promise of being his, and his alone; and this too without the permission of her uncle. He well remembered that this promise was mutual, and could he hesitate a moment to perform his part in it?—No! he hated himself for the very thought; and rose, determined that the night should not close until all had been confessed to her who held his plighted faith.

As he drew nigh to the priory, he was thankful that the deepening twilight would conceal in some degree his agitation; but still reluctant to enter, he sought a momentary respite by passing into an adjoining shrubbery, which surrounded the house. A glass-door from the drawing-room opened upon a little lawn, fringed on both sides with flowering shrubs, and Ponsonby knew that from this opening he could observe, whether the room was yet lighted up, or if the family were assembled there. All was dark within; but his attention was soon drawn to another quarter by hearing the voice of Mr. Devereux in earnest conversation with another person at no great distance; in the next moment he saw the figure of his guardian, with that of his now dreaded Emily, at the end of the walk into which he was about to enter. Ponsonby hesitated for a moment whether he should approach them: but hesitation came too late—he saw that he was observed; for Emily, the justly offended Emily, hastily pulled over her face a veil, which till then had been thrown back.

"She dreads to look upon me," thought Harry; "perhaps she already knows how unworthy I am of her—but meet we must," and without farther delay he advanced towards the bench upon which they were seated.

His guardian arose to meet him, and, with more of emotion than of anger in his countenance, held out his hand to the agitated young man.

"Harry," said he, "I am glad you have come at last. Shame and self-reproach could alone excuse your absence at such a time; but if you are forgiven here, I must not be obdurate. From this lady I have heard all—all that I ought to have heard from you long ago; but I will spare my reproaches; you have a powerful advocate in her breast, whom it would be in vain for me to gainsay. Take then the heart you gained in infancy—it has never wandered from you—and may heaven bless you in each other!"

With these words he took the trembling hand of Emily, and placing it in that of Ponsonby, he left them there alone.

"Emily! Miss Devereux! can you forgive me?" said Ponsonby in extreme agitation, as raising the passive hand that lay in his, he put it to his lips.

"Oh, call me not by so cold a name," exclaimed a voice which thrilled his soul with rapture.

"Oh, Harry, forgive my part in this deception, and look upon me," said the blushing girl, as she threw back the veil from her face; and Harry gazed upon each well-known feature, and clasped to his heart his only love—his first loved—last loved Emily.

The moon was high in the heavens before Emily and her lover recollected the hour. It was the sound of music in the drawing-room that first drew their attention.

"It is my cousin singing to her father," said Emily; "and now, Harry, you shall see for the first time this dreaded Emily, of whom, poor innocent thing, we have made such a cat's-paw; but it was all my uncle's doing, and I believe he did it as much to punish us for our fault as to prove our affection."

"Thank heaven, the punishment and the probation have ended both so happily," exclaimed Harry. "Oh, Emily, with what unmingled pleasure shall I now listen to those sweet words,

ORIGINAL ANECDOTE.

Two young physicians on their return home after having received their diplomas, were astonishing the weak nerves of the passengers on board the steam-boat, as well with their display of technicality as learning. The passengers were all dumb. An old gentleman, more bold than the rest, however, ventured to address the following question to one of these sons of Esculapius. "Pray, sir, is the section of country in which you are about to settle, sickly?" "Very much so, indeed," observed the Doctor, "I expect to witness a great many death-bed scenes in the course of the next summer." "I have no doubt but that you will," replied the old gentleman, "provided you get much practice."

AN ANCIENT CUSTOM.

It was a practice common among the Greeks, to cut off their hair (which they usually wore very long and always ornamented) as a mark of grief on the death of a friend. It is related of Helen, that on her return to Argos, she repaired to the tomb of her sister, Clytemnestra, where, instead of divesting herself of her hair, she merely clipped the ends, so as not to injure her good looks, (quere, locks?)

See, she hath shorn the extremity of her locks, Anxious of beauty, the same woman still.—Eurip. Elect.

The English laws punish vice, the Chinese laws do more: they reward virtue.
